Besides, another very important amendment has been added to the bill since it came from the Committee on Military Affairs; and that is a limitation as to the term of service. The bill, as reported by the committee, contemplated the permanent organization of thirty companies, as a regular portion of the military establishment. An amendment has been adopted by the Senate, on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BIGGS,] which has been modified, at the suggestion of other Senators, limiting the service of the companies to two years; and the bill, as it now stands, declares that at the expiration of two years, unless Congress shall intervene, and prolong the existence of the companies, they shall be absolutely dismissed from the service. It thus appears that the only addition which this bill contemplates, as it now stands before the Senate for its vote, is an addition of about two thousand men to your regular Army, for the term of two years, and no longer.

The Senator from Tennessee says that this is not an Administration measure; and he takes the Committee on Military Affairs to task for having reported a measure not in conformity with the recommendations of the Executive. Sir, what did the Executive ask for? The President asked for an increase of the regular Army, and so did the Secretary of War; but the Senator says the Secretary asked for regiments, and not for companies. Well, sir, this is the first time in my life I ever heard that regiments were not composed of companies. I thought it took companies to make regiments. When the Secretary of War called for an addition of five regiments, I supposed that he wanted fifty companies; and that if we gave him fifty companies, it was a matter of no consequence in what shape they were granted. The President wants an increase of the regular Army, and it is a matter of no consequence to him in what form you give the increase. He wants the men, the bone and muscle, to do the service of the country. That is what he has called for. To be sure, he put his request in the form of asking for regiments; he prefers that particular organization. The committee differed from him on that point, and proposed to give him the increase for which he asked, but in another form of organization, to wit: by adding thirty companies to the existing regiments. Is not that in conformity with the recommendations of the Executive? The Executive asked for an increase of the regular force. The committee respond by proposing to give an increase of the regular force.

But the Senator says this is not an Administration measure, because the President has declared that he wants the five regiments for the Mormon war, and the committee propose a permanent increase. It is true, the President in his annual message brings forward the Mormon war as the ground of the present increase; as the particular motive for increasing the Army at the present time; but he does not say that he will not want them beyond the Mormon war. He says no such thing. The commanding officer, Lieutenant General Scott, in his report to the President, desires an increase of the permanent military establishment. He calls for five regiments, as a permanent increase of the Army, and so does the Secretary of War. The President has sent to Congress the reports of the General-in-Chief and the Secretary of War with his approbation and indorsement; and we must take it for granted, although the President does not say so in terms, that he does want this increase as a permanent establishment, and not as a mere temporary one, to answer the purpose of the Utah war. This bill, therefore, is an Administration measure, if you call anything an Administration measure.

The committee, however, were not regulated by the mere wants of the Executive, although the other members of the committee and myself believed that the President, the Secretary of War, and the Commanding General, knew better what the public service demanded than we did. The President, the Secretary of War, and the commanding officer of the United States Army, are the persons intrusted by the Constitution and laws with the duty of looking into the condition of this department of the public service, and they better understand what is wanted for the public service than any Senator on this floor. I was willing to trust something to the faith of those officers, and to their recommendation that the Army ought to be increased by the addition of five regiments.

But whether the bill of the committee or that of the Senator from Virginia be an Administration measure, I can tell the Senator from Tennessee one thing—that his proposition is not an Administration measure. The President does not want volunteers; the Secretary of War does not want volunteers; General Scott does not want volunteers. When that gentleman takes us to task for not conforming to Executive recommendation, I commend to him the old maxim: take the beam out of your own eye before you attempt to extract the mote out of your neighbor's."

The Senator from Tennessee has attacked this bill on the score of extravagant expense. Now, let us compare the two propositions—that of the Senator from Tennessee, and that now under the consideration of the Senate from the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill proposes to add two thousand two hundred and twenty men to the regular service for two years, and no longer; that is to say, two thousand two hundred and twenty provided every company shall be filled up to the maximum point. It proposes to add no field officers; it proposes nothing but the addition of thirty companies to the Army, with company officers, without a solitary additional field officer. What is the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee? He proposes that for these two thousand two hundred and twenty regular soldiers, without any field officers, there shall be substituted four thousand volunteers, with a whole mass of field officers—the field officers of four regiments—and they are to be selected by the troops and appointed by the President. Who ever heard of the President appointing the officers of the militia? The gentleman confounds the idea of volunteers with regular troops. Volunteers are not regular troops. Volunteers are nothing but militia. There are but two characters of soldiers known to your Constitution and your laws: one, regulars, and the other, militia. Volunteers are nothing but militia; and when the militia are called into the service, the Constitution requires that they shall be officered according to the laws of the States from which they are called, and the President has no power to appoint officers to those regiments.

But the Senator says that although his proposition authorizes the raising of four thousand volunteers it leaves it discretionary with the President not to call out four thousand if he does not want them. The Senator cries out against the expense of twenty-two hundred regulars for two years; and yet he is willing that four thousand volunteers shall be called out. Is not that his proposition? Although they may not all be called out, it does not alter the fact that he expresses his willingness that they shall be called out. While he objects to this bill because of the expense of twenty-two hundred regular troops for two years, he consents that the President shall call out four thousand volunteers with all their field officers, not only for twelve months, but for all time, as long as the President may think proper to call them into service and keep them there. The service of these volunteers is to be limited to twelve months; but the moment the twelve months expire the President can, if the exigency of the service requires it, call another four thousand into the service.

Let us look at the proposition of the Senator further. It is not only for the Utah war that these men are to be called out, but they are to be called out to protect the citizens on the routes of emigration to the Pacific; so that these four thousand volunteers are not only to be kept in the field as long as the Mormon war exists, but when that is over they are to be kept by the President on the emigrant routes, to protect your emigrants going to the Pacific coast. When is that emergency, if you call it an emergency—I beg pardon of the Senator from New Hampshire for using a term so obnoxious to him—to end? When will your emigrant routes be in such a condition that they will require no protection from the military arm of the United States? This proposition of the Senator authorizes the President not only to call out the volunteers for the Utah war, but to keep them in service, to change them at the expiration of every twelve months, and call others into service as long as the necessities of the emigrant routes shall demand their maintenance in the Army. Is not that so? And yet the gentleman talks about economy, and about the danger of standing armies!

On the subject of economy, as a comparison between the cost of these two arms of service, I desire to make a statement to the Senate to which I trust they will listen. From authentic documents in the Government offices at Washington city, it appears that for the last twenty-two years the difference between the cost of the employment of volunteer troops and that of the same number of regular troops for the same time has been over thirty million dollars. Here in black and white, in the official documents, we have the difference between the same kind of troops employed as volunteers and the same kind of troops employed as regulars for the same time twenty-two years past; and I say from these documents the additional expense of the volunteers has been $30,000,000. Let us see how this is. The Adjutant General in this report says:

"If we go back beyond the Mexican war, as far as the year 1835, we shall find that in the intervening time not less than fifty thousand two hundred and ninety-three volunteers were mustered into the service of the United States for periods varying from one to twelve, but usually of three or six months."

During the last twenty-two years over fifty thousand volunteers have been mustered into the service of the United States, costing this enormous amount and why has it been? It is because you have not had regular troops to perform the service which the country demanded, and you were necessarily driven to call volunteers into the service at this enormous additional expense to the country.

Now, sir, I will put an instance or two to show how your system has worked. In 1836 a portion of the Indians inhabiting the State of Alabama broke out into open insurrection, and there was a very great sacrifice of individual property as well as of blood attendant upon that insurrection. My colleague [Mr. Toombs] well remembers it, as he stated the other day—for he figured there, I think pretty largely; almost as largely in that extraordinary enterprise as he does on the floor of the Senate. He was a captain, if I am not mistaken, in that army. On that occasion, to save the lives and the property of the people, there were some four or five thousand volunteers called out from the States of Alabama and Georgia; and even from the "volunteer State of Tennessee" there came down a whole brigade of mounted volunteers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Whenever there is any fighting to be done, our folks are on hand.

Mr. IVERSON. I will touch on your prowess before I get through; and my opinion is that you will not have much to brag of, if you look at the circumstances impartially and properly. Because you had not regular troops there to protect the people, that outbreak occurred, and it involved the Government in an expense of more than a million dollars for the volunteer troops carried there for the purpose of protecting the frontiers of Alabama and Georgia, and suppressing that Indian outbreak. I remember that once there was an encampment of two thousand five hundred men under a brigadier general in the State of Georgia, not one mile from where I now reside, besides others on the frontiers below Columbus, Georgia, and over on the Alabama line. The necessity of calling out those volunteers resulted from the fact that you had no regulars there to protect the lives of your people. The Government had one company at Fort Mitchell on the frontiers, but that was not more than forty or fifty men. If the Government had stationed in that country, as it ought to have done and was bound by every principle of propriety and honor to the people there to do, a sufficient military force, that Creek outbreak never would have occurred; there would have been no necessity for calling out this large force of volunteers, and the expense which it involved would never have been visited on the Government.

Again, look at Florida. For the last fifteen or twenty years, and more than that, you have called out the militia and volunteers in Florida every year, to prosecute the Seminole war. Why have you done this? Where the necessity for it? Because you had not regular troops to perform the duty which volunteers were called upon to perform. In the State of Texas, large numbers of volunteers have been called out for war purposes. Why? Because you have not had a regular army to put there to protect the frontiers of Texas. And so it has been on the Pacific, in the country represented by the Senator behind me, [Mr. GWIN], who has just made such an eloquent speech in favor of volunteers. No wonder that he should be in favor of volunteers; it is not at all surprising, for it has not been two years since we passed a law appropriating a million of dollars, to be refunded to the State of California for expenses incurred by that State in employing volunteers to suppress incursions of hostile Indians. It gives the woolly-hatted boys of the Senator from California and the Senator from Tennessee employment—very good employment. They want it; they are anxious to get it; and the Senator is but doing his duty in trying to accommodate the "boys," upon whom he perhaps depends, to some extent, for his seat in this body. That is all very well; but what does it show? It shows that if you had regular troops there to defend the frontiers of California, this immense expense of a million of dollars, which the Government has had to refund to California, never would have been incurred.

How much has the Rogue river war cost, so far as the volunteers are concerned, and the recent Indian war in Oregon and Washington Territories? I presume when that bill is footed up, you will see what volunteers cost. I apprehend that if we get clear of the expenses of those wars for something less than six or eight million dollars we shall be very fortunate. It has been the absence of your military force and the small amount of the Army of the United States that has rendered it necessary to call out a large volunteer force; so that, as exhibited in the document before me, in twenty years fifty thousand volunteers have been mustered into the service of the United States.

Now, sir, there is a requisition on your Treasury for $385,000 just come in from Florida to pay the volunteers in the service of the United States in Florida, and the Secretary of War says that if they are to be retained another year in the service $385,000 more must be appropriated, making in all $770,000 to pay the volunteers now in the service of the Government in the State of Florida, fighting the Seminole Indians.

A SENATOR. Not fighting them!

Mr. IVERSON. The ostensible object is to fight them, or, at least, to defend the frontiers; and I have no doubt they are quite as efficient as volunteers ever are. I do not consider volunteer militia, raw militia, very effective under any circumstances, or anywhere. I do not think they proved very effective in the Mexican war; for I think that one of the regiments from Tennessee, that vaunted State of volunteers, ran at the very first fire at the battle of Cerro Gordo. That is my reading of the history of that battle. You cannot expect raw militia to stand fire like regulars. Although they had somewhat the advantage of discipline before they went into that engagement, yet the very first fire from the Mexican batteries behind the intrenchments drove the Tennessee regiment from the field, commanded by Colonel Haskell, and under the charge of General Pillow, of Tennessee. They left the field in disgust, if not in disgrace.

One reason why I favor a bill to increase the regular Army, and to increase it permanently, is to obviate the necessity for calling militia into the service of the country at the enormous expense which is always attendant upon militia troops. Here is a statement, which was read the other day by the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Military Committee, showing the comparative expense of a company of regulars of dragoons and infantry, mounted and foot, &c., and precisely the same description of volunteer troops for six months. Whilst regular infantry cost $4,662 a company for six months, the same description of foot soldiers of volunteers cost $7,287—nearly double. Does the Senator desire to know how that occurs? It is considered extraordinary. General Towson, the late Paymaster General, states how it occurs. He says:

"This enormous disparity in the expenses of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are not better paid than regular troops, and altogether insufficiently compensated to reimburse them for the pecuniary sacrifices they make in leaving home and employment, to say nothing of the danger and hardships they encounter. It is caused principally by expenses for traveling to and from the place where the services of the volunteers and militia are required; to the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses; and to furnishing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expense of volunteers serving on foot, and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months, unless specially provided for.

"There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures; and that is, the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces. The immense importance attached to this subject by European Governments, as a principal means of sustaining war, has led to the most rigid economy and the strictest accountability in everything connected with the material of an army. We have profited by their experience, and it is probable a more perfect system of accountability is nowhere to be found than in our little Army; but it requires the study of years to understand, and the exercise of martial law to enforce it."

There is the ground for the difference of expense. Let us take the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee; and suppose the volunteers for this service should be selected from Tennessee, which, par excellence, is the State of volunteers, according to the statement of the Senator. I am not disposed to dispute that statement, because I believe the Tennessee boys are ready for a fight, any time and anywhere, and they will go where ever they can be put on a horse to ride, but I never heard of any of them being very anxious to go on foot into engagements; they are great hands for riding. Take these four thousand volunteers from Tennessee, and carry them away up to Salt Lake, keep them in service there twelve months, and then discharge them. Many of them will be discharged long before that time. In the Mexican war it is a fact, that out of all the irregular troops that were sent to Mexico, of all the regiments of volunteers who went into that service, not three months passed over their heads before one half of them died or were discharged and sent home on account of sickness. There was not a volunteer regiment in the whole Mexican war that went into battle with more than two hundred and fifty or three hundred of its original number, and long before the twelve months expired, the regiment had been reduced down to a mere omnibus full—two or three hundred men. The Palmetto regiment, one of the best organized and regulated regiments of volunteers in the service of the United States in that war, went into the battles in Mexico with only two hundred and fifty men, although they started from South Carolina with a thousand.

This is the character of volunteer troops; but the expense is increased every time, it is doubled every time, you have to call new troops into service. They serve for the stipulated time, and are discharged. Then new troops are called into the service, and all the transportation, all the clothing, and all the necessary outfit and expenses of beginning a campaign of this sort have to be gone over again.

Then look at the excesses of volunteers, and how improvident they are. The reason why regulars are more economical than volunteers while in service, is this: regular troops are under the command of regular officers, who make their men mind them, but volunteer troops are always in command of men selected by themselves, members of their own household, their own fraternity, their own neighborhood; men dependent for their offices on the suffrages of the company, and hence they do not enforce order and obedience, but let the volunteer troops do just as they please.

When some of the volunteer regiments were marching up from Vera Cruz to Mexico, as an evidence of their improvidence and want of subordination, and the excesses to which they have a tendency, I will state a fact. In going up, one of the volunteer regiments stopped at the private residence of General Santa Anna, near the city of Jalapa. They stopped on their way and went into the hacienda, the walls of which, with his magnificent and elegant taste, were covered with costly and extensive paintings—paintings that would have done honor to any age and any country; but these volunteer troops went in there and cut, and slashed, and stuck their bayonets into every one of those beautiful works of art, because they belonged to the President of Mexico! Why, sir, such a proceeding as that outraged the country and disgraced the nation from which they came. Would regular troops have done that? No, sir; not a regular soldier in the Army of the United States would have attempted to do such a thing as that. They would have been punished instantly if they had attempted it. But the volunteers cared about nothing; they were not to be punished; they paid no respect to their officers, and probably the officers were quite as bad as the men. They performed an act there which disgraced them, and disgraced the country from which they were sent.

Mr. PUGH. Where does the Senator say that happened?

Mr. IVERSON. At Santa Anna's hacienda, above Vera Cruz—I do not remember the name of the place. I was not there, and do not speak from personal knowledge, but I have been informed of the fact by a number of gentlemen who saw the pictures mutilated after the regiment passed along. I cannot say what regiment did it, but it was a regiment of volunteers. The regular Army would not have done such a thing.

The Senator from Tennessee proposes to raise volunteers. I object to volunteers. I do not think they are the right sort of troops to send to Utah. The Senator thinks the Mormons of Utah will not fight, and other gentlemen have expressed that opinion. That is not the opinion of the President, or he would not call for the additional regiments. It is not the opinion of General Scott; it is not the opinion of the Secretary of War; it is not the opinion of Colonel Johnston, who has now command of the Utah army, and who certainly has better means of information, and whose judgment is more to be relied upon than that even of the Senator from Tennessee, or mine, or any other Senator on this floor. Those men all believe the Mormons are prepared to fight; and I believe they will. There is only one contingency in which they will not fight. If you increase your Army and send a respectable force into Utah, a force that will strike the Mormons with the idea of the uselessness of resistance on their part, they will not resist; but my word for it, if you send a small force, such as Colonel Johnston now has, and such as it is proposed to reinforce him with, so far as we have any indication of the reinforcement to be sent to him, they will fight, and, in my opinion, fight desperately, and probably fight successfully. If, however, you send four or five thousand well disciplined troops, it is possible that the Mormons will give way and not fight, and then the effusion of blood will be spared; but if you send a small army even of regulars, and more especially if you send raw militia from Tennessee or elsewhere, I give you my word for it they will fight, and then fight successfully. Of what effect are raw troops, undisciplined militia, in the field? Of what use will they be against the Mormon army, an army that has able officers, that is well armed and equipped, and that will be by the coming June, at the time our troops are to enter the Territory, as well disciplined as any members of your regular Army? Are these people to be despised? Are they to be overcome with raw militia taken from their homes without discipline, with officers without experience, who go there to fight these men intrenched behind barricades and fortifications; men who pick their own ground, who select their own battle-places? Do you suppose that troops like these, even valiant Tennesseans, can withstand the Mormon forces under such circumstances? No, sir; nothing but disgrace and disaster will attend them.

If you want to put down the Mormon rebellion without bloodshed, you must send to Utah a large and imposing army of regular troops, who will overawe the Mormons and drive them into obedience. If you do that they will not fight. If you do not do it they will fight, and we know the advantage possessed by troops who select their own fighting ground. In the battle of Buena Vista, General Taylor, with four thousand American troops, overcame an army of twenty thousand Mexicans; and why? If he had been out on the open field he would have stood no earthly chance to win that battle; but he selected his own ground, and the advantage of his position was equal to more than three times the number of troops which he commanded. So with the Mormons. Send your troops to Utah, and you have to fight under the greatest disadvantages. You have to meet fresh disciplined troops; men well armed and equipped; men who are fighting for their firesides, for their country, for their religion; men who will fight bravely and desperately, in my opinion; and if you do not take great care, will fight successfully. I would not intrust this war to volunteers. I believe the result will be nothing but disaster and defeat to your army if you intrust it alone to volunteer forces.

But, sir, the Senator from Tennessee proposes to send volunteers, and to make a contract to whip the Mormons for one half of what it will cost the Government. We heard yesterday a long dissertation from the Senator from Tennessee on the subject of Mormon morality; and judging from the tone and temper of his remarks on that occasion, I should say that he has not the most exalted objection to the Mormon practices. He entered into a somewhat labored defense of Mormon morality.

Well, sir, that is a matter of taste, and de gustibus non est disputandum. I shall make no point with the gentleman on that subject; but I will take occasion to say this: that if I understood the sentiments of the Senator, and if his constituents entertain similar opinions, they are the last men in the world who should be sent to quell the Mormons; for, instead of whipping the Mormons, they would be very apt to join them—especially if Brigham Young should be able to offer them half a dozen wives apiece. [Laughter.] I apprehend it will be a long while before the Mormon rebellion will be crushed if Tennesseans are sent there with the sentiments which seem to have been elicited from the mouth of the Senator yesterday. I do not pretend to say that these are his genuine sentiments; I only infer them from the tenor of his remarks. I want to put down the Mormon rebellion. I want to crush this impudent and infamous insurrection which has raised its crest in Utah. As long as you have a Government, the laws enacted under the Constitution ought to be enforced everywhere; and, if necessary, at the point of the bayonet, if you cannot do it in any other way. I am one of the last men who would attempt to enforce an unconstitutional law anywhere; but a law that is borne out by the Constitution—a legal enactment of Congress—ought to be enforced everywhere where the Constitution authorizes it to go. The dignity of your country, the honor of your Government is broken down, destroyed, and worthless, unless you enforce your laws. The Mormons, we know, have put at defiance the laws of the United States; they have driven your officers from the Territory; they say that they will not obey the laws of the United States; and they have an armed force now for the purpose of vindicating the position which they have taken. They have set up an imperium in imperio—a government within a government; they say that their government shall rule, and that the President of the United States shall not enforce the laws of the United States within their Territory. I am for putting down this rebellion; but not by the employment of volunteers—not even by the employment of the valiant and brave volunteers from Tennessee.

Why, sir, from the way the Senator from Tennessee talks about his Tennessee militia, one would suppose that a few regiments of Tennessee militia could go to Utah and swallow the Mormons at a single mouthful: eat them up at once. Sir, I should have no earthly objection to that. I should have no objection to the Tennesseans going there, and eating up all the Mormons—the women as well as the men; provided, however, that they do not eat up the Treasury; but my opinion is, that in eating up the Mormons, they will eat up the Treasury, and instead of an annual expense of seventy millions, we shall have a bill of a hundred millions a year, if we send four thousand volunteers to Utah. That is my opinion.

Mr. President, I am opposed entirely to the use of volunteers. I believe they are much more expensive and infinitely less efficient than regular troops. If you wish to diminish the expenses of the Army, if you wish to keep down the extraordinary expenses of your military operations against which gentlemen have so much cried out in this debate, you must increase your regular forces and cut down the volunteer force you are driven to call into the field; you must increase the regular Army and obviate the necessity of calling for militia. When you do this, the expense of your military establishment will be diminished; but until this is done, until the necessity for volunteers is entirely obviated by a sufficient increase of your Army, the extraordinary expenditures for your Army must go on increasing every year of your national existence; because you must have your frontiers protected; you must have your garrisons and your fortifications manned; you must have the lives and property of your people protected in passing from one portion of the country to the other. These are necessary things which the Government cannot do without; these are duties which the Government is compelled by every sense of obligation, of honor, and of duty to itself and its people, to perform.

These are my opinions. I did not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate so long as I have; but, believing as I do, that this is the very worst form in which you can send troops anywhere for the service of the Government, I trust the motion to substitute a volunteer force for a regular force will not be adopted.

While I am up, I will make a remark in relation to the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. That proposes to add three regiments, and with a subsequent amendment which he will present, and which has been drawn up by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it will obviate the necessity of adding any new field officers to the regiments. The only difference then between that bill and the one of the committee will be that the committee propose to add thirty companies to the existing regiments, and his proposition is to add three regiments without additional field officers because he proposes to take field officers from the line of the Army. That amendment has not yet been presented, but the Senator from Virginia has it in his possession to offer. I am authorized to say by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that he will yield to that amendment of the Senator from Virginia. I am also willing to take it. Although I believe that the proposition of the committee to add thirty companies to the existing regiments is a better one, yet for the sake of harmony and conciliation and to get the increase of the Army which I think is absolutely necessary for this occasion at least, if not for future time, I am willing to waive my predilections as the chairman is willing to waive his, and I accept the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. We shall vote for that when it comes up, and if that does not pass we shall insist on the passage of our original bill as amended by the Senate.

MR. SEWARD. Mr. President, if there ever was a bill that was well debated, I think this must be that one; and if there is anything in the art of war, or the art of peace, or any question of civil government, or even ecclesiastical organization, that could have any relation to the subject, and has not been presented, I am entirely unable to specify the omission. I therefore do not intend to detain the Senate with any further debate upon the subject, than simply to state, as briefly as I can, the votes I shall give in the present aspect of the case, with the reasons upon which they are founded. In doing so, I shall not stop to answer the reflections which have been made here upon the positions which I have assumed. It is a long time since I found out that if I took good care to state my own positions and views accurately, I had very little reason to apprehend that I should be misunderstood, by allowing misapprehensions of my positions to go uncorrected. On the first day of the session of Congress, the President of the United States informed us, in regard to the Territory of Utah, that—

“Brigham Young was appointed the first Governor on the 20th September, 1850, and has held the office ever since. Whilst Governor Young has been both Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs throughout this period, he has been at the same time the head of the church called the Latter-Day Saints, and professes to govern its members and dispose of their property by direct inspiration and authority from the Almighty. His power has been, therefore, absolute over Church and State.”

“The people of Utah, almost exclusively, belong to this church; and believing with a fanatical spirit that he is Governor of the Territory by Divine appointment, they obey his commands as if these were direct revelations from Heaven. If, therefore, he chooses that his government shall come into collision with the Government of the United States, the members of the Mormon church will yield implicit obedience to his will. Unfortunately, existing facts leave but little doubt that such is his determination. Without entering upon a minute history of occurrences, it is sufficient to say that all the officers of the United States, judicial and executive, with the single exception of two Indian agents, have found it necessary for their own personal safety to withdraw from the Territory, and there no longer remains any government in Utah, but the despotism of Brigham Young. This being the condition of affairs in the Territory, I could not mistake the path of duty. As Chief Executive Magistrate, I was bound to restore the supremacy of the Constitution and laws within its limits. In order to effect this purpose, I appointed a new Governor and other Federal officers for Utah, and sent with them a military force for their protection, and to aid as a posse comitatus, in case of need, in the execution of the laws.”

Sir, I never knew what was to be in that message; but so soon as I heard it pronounced, I rose in my place, and said that I should sustain to the utmost of my ability and judgment the President of the United States in restoring the supremacy of the laws in Utah. I have thus far maintained the position which I then assumed, which I think was loyal, and which I think was dictated by a due regard to the ultimate preservation of this Union. I deem the question thus important. I apprehend little disturbance hereafter in the States. The troubles in every extended empire are in the provinces and dependencies. Authority overthrown there, is to be not long maintained in the Capitol. At the same time that I assumed this position, I also took another, that I would on no occasion, if it could be avoided, unnecessarily increase the standing Army of the United States.

These are the positions on which I have stood thus far throughout the session on these questions. I stand upon them now. It is not necessary to deny or repel the charges made here that I am for persecuting the Mormons on the ground of their religious faith. It is sufficiently apparent that there is no United States Government in Utah; that there is a despotism there maintained by Brigham Young. My simple object is to restore the Government of the United States. That is the sole object of the measure under consideration. It is not an open question whether this effort shall be made. We have had intimations that we might send commissioners to Utah to treat; that we might send schoolmasters and missionaries to convert the Mormons. That is all well. I see no objection to sending commissioners to treat, and schoolmasters and missionaries to teach, preach, and convert the Mormons; but there is no Government in Utah except that of Brigham Young, and that is a despotism, existing in defiance of the authority of the United States, which has been supplanted. Therefore it is necessary to display the power of the United States in that Territory, in order to open the way for any effective communication with the Mormons in any other manner.

However, this may be, as I have said, it is not an open question whether the demonstration shall be made. The President of the United States, in the month of October, I think, dispatched a new Governor to replace Brigham Young, in Utah, and with him a military force. Then that force must be displayed in the Territory, in order to produce the result, or it must be recalled, so that it cannot be displayed there. Congress has only these alternatives, because the President informs us, because all military men assure us, because we all know that that small force, consisting when it was dispatched of only fifteen hundred men, and now reduced probably to twelve hundred or thirteen hundred, is locked up in the mountains, between the settled parts of the United States and Utah, and is incapable of proceeding to the capital of Utah. It must be reinforced, so that it may pursue its journey and effect its object, or it must be recalled.

Thus, those who say that nothing shall be done must have made up their mind to let that force perish, or to recall it. What, then, is to be the condition of the United States in that Territory? Defied, supplanted, overthrown; the force dispatched by the President of the United States to reduce it to subordination, retracing its steps, and abandoning the effort to establish Federal authority in the Territory. The responsibility for this would fall on me if I should support that policy. Increasing or reinforcing this small force is necessary for its own preservation. Whatever may be our feelings, and the sentiments of humanity in regard to the Mormons, as a religious society, we are interested in every way in the fate of that small portion of the Army which is thus exposed. We must send it forward, with reinforcements, or we must recall it immediately. It seems to me, then, it devolves on those who will do nothing to reinforce it, to take some measures to induce the recall of the troops, and to announce to the President of the United States that Congress is of opinion that Federal authority ought to be abandoned in Utah. Thus much as to the merits of the question.

Having made up my mind that that body of men was to be reinforced, I have been of opinion that it ought to be reinforced with such additions as would enable it to accomplish its object without the effusion of human blood. If you increase it by fifty men it is no augmentation, and it will be as ineffectual as it was before; if you increase it by a thousand it will be too small; if you increase it by two thousand, it may be enough and it may not. It is impossible, under the circumstances of the case, to adopt any other rule but that which you always adopt in military operations; and that is the prudent one of always dispatching, if you can, a force certainly large enough to effect the object. Now, the object is to effect the restoration of authority in Utah peacefully—without war, without bloodshed. If that is to be done at all it is to be done by an imposing demonstration.

Having arrived at that conclusion, I was willing to trust, as I am now, those who have charge of the military power of the United States with the designation of the amount of force which is necessary. I was further willing to trust them with the designation of the kind of force, leaving to them the responsibility which the country has devolved on them. But, on behalf of the President, very soon was sent into Congress a recommendation for five regiments, and this recommendation, which was made by the Secretary of War, was based on the necessity of a permanent increase of the Army, by the addition of five regiments. I do not know what was the fate of that proposition in the House of Representatives; it is no matter what it was. But it had no sooner come here, and been presented by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] than I then submitted to that honorable Senator, that if we were to add new regiments to the United States Army, and permanent regiments, we must give up the project of a Pacific railroad for as long as he or I should live; because there are two antagonistical systems for maintaining the power and carrying on the operations of Government in the United States, between the Atlantic States and the Pacific. The one is a railroad, which is pacific, and the other is an armed power or police. For that reason, without hesitating one moment, I voted against the five regiments. It was distinctly an addition to the standing Army of the United States, unnecessary in this emergency of Utah.

Precisely the same reason obliges me to say now, that in any shape in which the organization shall be, or shall appear to be, in the nature of permanent additions to the Army, I shall vote against it. Now I understand from the honorable Senator who last addressed the Senate, who belongs to the Military Committee, that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has agreed to accept the proposition of the honorable Senator from Virginia, to substitute regiments in place of companies. I am then thrown back on the question of what other description and amount of force can be supplied consistently with the principles which I have maintained, and on which I intend to stand.

The amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, revised and perfected by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, proposes to raise within certain limits so large a number as the President of the United States shall, in his discretion, think it necessary to call out. It may be four thousand men. The number is not too large, in my estimation, for a contingency which may happen. It may be too large in contingencies which may happen. The provision leaving it to the discretion of the President of the United States, therefore, seems to me to be wise. Only one other thing remains in relation to it. This will be a force of volunteers; the other one, proposed by the committee, would be a part of the regular Army. This, however, is a distinction without a difference. The men proposed by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, will be men who are enlisted to serve two years, and to serve in Utah. They will be dragoons and infantry. They are to have rations, and clothing, and arms exactly like those which the regular Army has; they are to receive precisely the same pay; while the men who shall be enlisted under the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, will be men who are raised for two years; they will have just the same clothes, the same rations, the same pay, the same term of service, as the men who might be enlisted under the name of volunteers, under the proposition of the honorable Senator from Tennessee. There is no real difference; and in both cases they are to be disbanded at the expiration of two years, peremptorily, and without the intervention of Congress.

I see no difference between them except this: if the troops to be raised shall belong to the regular Army, and are attached to it, the President will appoint officers; and if they are called volunteers, they will elect their own officers. Such is my faith in the capacity of the American citizens who will be volunteers in this case, that I am quite willing to trust them with the election of their regimental officers as well as of officers of the line. I find myself brought to prefer this proposition, again, by the remarks which have been made by the honorable Senator from California; for at the beginning of this session, when I declared my intention to support the President in this movement, I also submitted and suggested for his consideration, as well as that of the public, that volunteers from the California side might probably be employed more readily, more speedily, and with better effect, than to take an armed force from this side of the mountains.

I have tried hitherto so to act with regard to this bill as to come into no serious conflict with the duty which I owe in regard to the Territory of Kansas. I am happy to say that this bill, in its present shape, will do something towards relieving the question of that embarrassment. I do not think that the Army ought to be retained in Kansas. If I had the power, I would direct that all troops now in Kansas should be transferred to Utah. I have no power to do that. These volunteers are to be used only in Utah. If they are insufficient, the President must choose to send the Army from Kansas to Utah, or bear the responsibility of disasters that may occur.

I may be allowed to say that what has happened is already a disaster. It redounds to the discredit—I will not say the disgrace—of the Government of the United States, that with the Territory of Utah in rebellion, with no Federal authority there whatever, a small band of twelve or fourteen hundred soldiers, with a civil Governor, are left in the mountains, to perish on their way there. I think this is humiliating to the country. I should have said so earlier, if it had not been that, inasmuch as the whole subject involves the reestablishment of Federal authority now overthrown in Utah, it did not seem to me wise, it did not seem to me patriotic, to take that time to arraign the Government for the blunders by which this singular state of things had happened. It seemed to me that, if I meant to restore Federal authority in that Territory, I must defer criticisms on the management of the relations of the Territory until that is done.

But we have arrived at that pass when the President of the United States will not, otherwise than by his declaration I have read from his message, maintain or acknowledge that the object of the reinforcement of the Army which he seeks is for the especial purpose of this emergency in Utah. Therefore I have taken occasion to say that I think we are already arrived at a point where the national power is in abeyance, and the national arm paralyzed. The movement of Colonel Johnston's command was too early or too late, and the force is too small in any case. I wish to give it efficiency. I know that if it is not done by reinforcement it cannot be done at all; and then the expedition must end, not merely in this dishonor, but in disaster, and in suffering of brave and innocent men. I cannot conceive it possible that this small body of men can be marched to Utah without danger from the Mormons and from the Indians to whom they will be exposed; and I cannot conceive it possible that it can be marched back again to the settled parts of the United States and put into garrison, without a disgrace which will consign this Administration to the contempt of the whole country, and expose the country to the scorn of the world. Still it looks to me as if that was to be the finale of all these debates. It looks to me very much, with the reluctance I see on the part of Congress to grant any reinforcements, that just this disaster is to happen. If so, I wish barely to say, that by the votes I shall give I shall manifest my determination to bear no part of so painful a responsibility.

Under these circumstances, carrying out the same principles which I have applied hitherto in this matter, I shall vote for this amendment of the honorable Senator from Tennessee; not as some say they shall vote for it, for the purpose of defeating the bill; but in good faith, and for the purpose of relieving the command of Colonel Johnston, and of sustaining the authority of the United States in the Territory of Utah. If that shall be overruled, whatever may be the proposition, however obnoxious on the ground of theory or otherwise, I shall then vote for such a military power as will accomplish the end if it be possible. Content with having advised a better way, I shall acquiesce in any other if overruled.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. President, after the protracted debate which we have had on this question, it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to submit any remarks to the Senate; but in order to put myself right, I think it proper for me to say a few words in regard to my position, and the difficulties I have encountered in coming to a conclusion on this question. In the first place, I understand, from the indications we have had in the Senate, that it is the settled judgment of this body that there ought to be some increase of the military force. In the next place, I believe it to be the settled judgment of the Senate that that increase of the military force should be temporary in its character, and intended to meet the emergency that has now, as we all think; arisen on account of the necessity of maintaining the Constitution and the laws of the United States in the Territory of Utah. I have arrived at the conclusion that we need no additional force, except of a temporary character, to suppress the insurrection in Utah.

The first inquiry that presents itself is, from what authority have we the best information as to the kind of force we ought to raise? The President has suggested the raising of four additional regiments of regulars; and the Secretary of War has suggested the raising of five regiments. These propositions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, who must be presumed to have the best information on the subject. That committee has reported a bill which has undergone revision in the Senate, and has been cut down to almost nothing. They differ in opinion from the President and the Secretary of War as to the character of the force that ought to be raised. The bill before the Senate, the proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs, is now reduced to a simple measure for raising thirty companies—two additional companies for each of the fifteen regiments of the Army. The Senator from Tennessee has proposed an amendment in the nature of a substitute, striking out the whole of the bill and inserting a measure which provides for raising a larger force, in the shape of volunteers, than the bill proposes, and to that our attention is invited. Behind that is another proposition which has not yet been offered, but has been suggested by the Senator from Virginia; and that is to raise three additional regiments of regulars.

I confess that I have some difficulty in my mind because of the different shapes the question has assumed in its progress through the Senate. In the first instance, the Committee on Military Affairs, in whom I confide with a great deal of confidence as to the best mode of raising a force for this emergency, reported the original bill with two sections, each of which provided for increasing the Army. The committee then retired the second section of the bill—the section which I had thought of voting for in preference to the first; but after the remarks of the honorable chairman of that committee last week, I concluded that he had better information on the subject, and that as the committee wished to retire the second section, I would vote for the first section with a proviso, making the increase proposed by it temporary in its character; but now I understand from the Committee on Military Affairs that after the debate, and in consequence of the information which has been elicited from all sides of the Chamber, they are willing to adopt in place of their bill the proposition of the Senator from Virginia.

I am brought, then, to the conclusion that I must vote either for the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, or for that of the Senator from Virginia; and to enable me to get at the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, I must of course vote against the substitute offered by the Senator from Tennessee, which is now pending. I do this, expressing at the same time my entire confidence in the militia, the volunteer force of the country, to do any military service that may be required of them. But the point is, whether, for the particular service for which a force is now needed, volunteers will be the most effective, or whether it is better to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia to raise a temporary regular force?

It has occurred to me, on a comparison of the two propositions, that that of the Senator from Virginia is to be preferred. Both provide only for a temporary increase; and now nobody goes for a permanent increase of the Army. At any rate, the judgment of the Senate is against a permanent increase. Some individual Senators may prefer a measure of that kind; but I am looking at the question in a practical point of view. The increase is to be temporary merely. Then, if I understand the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, there is to be by it, not only an increase of four thousand men, organized in regiments, but there is to be an increase of all the officers necessary to officer those regiments. This is to be done by the men themselves electing their officers. The proposition of the Senator from Virginia, instead of providing for four thousand men, provides only for raising upwards of two thousand, and they are to be put in regiments, and the officers to take command of those regiments are to be detailed by the President of the United States from the present regular Army; so that, if his proposition prevails, we are to have no increase of officers, but an increase of privates only, and an increase of privates not to exceed two thousand four hundred men. The proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, however, is to increase the Army four thousand men, and to have a sufficient number of additional officers to officer four regiments.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state to my friend that my proposition will be that there shall be no new field officers, but that they shall be detailed; and that the President may, if he chooses, detail all under field officers, from captain down; but not necessarily constraining him to do so.

Mr. BIGGS. That is what I understand, and that is one difficulty I had in my mind; and on that point I desire to obtain information from the Committee on Military Affairs, or any gentleman who can give me the information. I desire to know whether or not we have in the Army at the present time a sufficient number of officers to officer three more regiments? If we have, it seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from Virginia is much to be preferred to the amendment now pending. It is to be preferred for several reasons. So far as the question of efficiency is concerned, it is to be preferred; for it must be evident that officers who have gone through a regular military training are much more competent to take charge of new regiments than volunteer officers just coming into the service.

But there is another and very important consideration which, it seems to me, makes the proposition of the Senator from Virginia preferable to that of the Senator from Tennessee. It is, that we get rid of the payment of the officers of the three regiments, so far as the expense of raising the regiments is concerned, which is a very important item. I understand (though on this point I may be in error, and, if so, I desire to be corrected) that the greater portion of the expense of raising regiments results from the payments we have to make to the officers. The Senator from Virginia proposes to officer the new regiments by detailing persons now in the service, and now in the pay of the Government.

Then, it being intended to be a temporary measure only, and it being suggested by the President of the United States, by the Secretary of War, by the Committee on Military Affairs, by all who have the best means of knowing how this force ought to be raised, and how it will be most efficient for the service required, that it is proper to raise regulars, I shall most unquestionably vote for the proposition of the Senator from Virginia in preference to that of the Senator from Tennessee. To enable me to do so, I shall have to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, although originally I was for the proposition of the Military Committee, to raise additional companies.

It is a matter of vast importance, while we obtain an efficient force, that it be such a force as will cost as little as possible to the country. I am not one of those who will count dollars and cents where the necessities of the Government require that the honor of the country or the laws of the country shall be vindicated; but I apprehend the settled judgment of the Senate, after hearing all that has been said on this subject, is that an additional force of three regiments is sufficient for all the present exigencies of the public service; and if in doing this we can get the best force at less cost to the Treasury, I think the time has arrived in the present situation of the public Treasury when we should adopt that which shall cost the Government the least.

I am gratified at one portion of this debate which contemplates some little reduction in the public expenditures. From what I had seen in the Senate and the Congress of the United States, I had supposed that discussions on retrenchment and economy had become rather obsolete. I am gratified to find that the Senator from Tennessee has introduced that question here; and I ask him maturely to consider the two propositions before the Senate in an economical point of view, so far as expenditure is concerned. Until I heard the remarks of the Senator from Georgia, it was my intention to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with a view of obtaining from them the lights of their experience and their military knowledge as to these various propositions. Now I understand the Senator from Georgia to say that the Committee on Military Affairs prefer to adopt the proposition of the Senator from Virginia.

I am glad that we are to have some assistance from the Senator from Tennessee, who has just come into the Senate, in restoring the reign of economy in this Government. I entirely adopt one maxim which he has laid down for his guidance, that "the revenue of the State is the State." I wish to make that impressive, so far as I can, upon the Senator from Tennessee himself, for future reference and future action; because, if I understand the Senator's position, he proposes to violate that cardinal maxim in an important point in which my constituents are deeply interested. I refer to it now, so that we may stick a pin there for future action in the Senate of the United States. "The revenue of the State is the State in effect;" and I hope that will be remembered when the celebrated measure which has been pressed so earnestly in Congress heretofore, and which at the present time is in the special charge of the Senator from Tennessee, and which proposes to take away a very large branch of the public revenue for the purpose of distributing it to individuals throughout the country, shall come up for consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the Senator from North Carolina to state that the Committee on Military Affairs have assented to the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. Am I right?

Mr. BIGGS. I understood the Senator from Georgia, in the remarks which he made to-day, to say that the Committee on Military Affairs preferred that proposition to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and were willing to acquiesce in it in place of the bill reported by them.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from North Carolina is somewhat mistaken as to the purport of my remark. I did not say that the Committee on Military Affairs had agreed to the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, but I said the chairman and myself had. I stated that I had consulted the chairman on the subject, and that he was willing, as a matter of conciliation and compromise, to agree to the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. He believes, as I do, that the bill of the committee is better than that of the Senator from Virginia. We believe it is better to add thirty companies to the existing regiments, than to form three new regiments; but as the chairman understood from the Senator from Virginia that there were several gentlemen opposed to the original bill who were willing to take his proposition, we were disposed to consent to it in order that we might obtain as large a support for the measure as possible. We still, however, entertain the opinion that the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs for the addition of thirty companies, is better than the proposition of the Senator from Virginia; but we do not consider it of any great importance whether there be three regiments of ten companies each, or thirty companies added to the existing regiments, more especially if one provision of the proposition of the Senator from Virginia be adopted, that no new field-officers shall be created, but that the old officers of the line shall be assigned to duty in the new regiments.

Mr. WILSON. I am satisfied with the explanation made by the Senator from Georgia; but I wish it distinctly understood that the Committee on Military Affairs, as a committee, have taken no action on that proposition, and the members of the committee are divided in the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I will also add that another gentleman, a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] accords with the chairman and myself. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels called upon to state the position of the questions before the Senate, particularly in reference to the relative position of the two propositions: the one pending, and the one proposed to be offered by the Senator from Virginia, in consequence of a suggestion from the honorable Senator from North Carolina, indicating his impression that it would not be possible to reach a vote on the proposition of the Senator from Virginia unless the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee were first voted down. The position of the question is this: the pending question before the Senate is on the bill offered as a substitute for the original bill of the committee by the Senator from Tennessee, and accepted by the Senator from Massachusetts in lieu of the one that he himself had proposed; that is open to modification before the vote on substitution shall be taken. It is competent, therefore, for the Senator from Virginia to move his bill as an amendment, or a substitute, which is in the form of an amendment, for the bill pending presented by the Senator from Tennessee. It is a motion to strike out and insert, so that the sense of the Senate can be taken between the proposition pending and that proposed to be offered by the Senator from Virginia, before the vote on the substitution in place of the original bill shall be taken.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Virginia not having been present when the remarks of the Chair were made, I will take occasion to say, that on consultation with him he came to the conclusion to permit the vote to be first taken on the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts before he offered his; and then, if that be voted down, he will present his proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I regret, Mr. President, to find myself situated as I am, to be compelled to make a reply to the Senator from Georgia, in consequence, as I think, of some unkind allusions that have been made to my State. But before I approach that portion of the subject—and I shall look at some one or two, or perhaps more, of the positions assumed by the Senator from Georgia—it occurs to me, that perhaps I had better answer a single point to which the Senator from North Carolina has called my attention. He, in the conclusion of his remarks, stated that I had, in the debut I had made in the Senate yesterday, laid down as a text, or called the attention of the country to the great fact enunciated by Edmund Burke, one of England's greatest statesmen, that "the revenue of the State is the State." I now promise and assure that Senator that I intend to act on that principle; and when the measure comes up, to which he has alluded, I pledge myself now, in advance, if there is truth in figures or sound argument, that I will demonstrate that the measure to which he alludes, instead of being a waste of the public revenue, is a revenue measure, and will increase the revenues of the country instead of diminishing them. I will demonstrate to him, also, that it is not my intention gratuitously to give away the public lands. I do not believe that the Government has the power to make gratuities in the general acceptance of the term; but I will show, when the time comes, that the man who takes one hundred and sixty acres of land under the homestead bill, and goes to a frontier country to cultivate it, pays the highest consideration in reclaiming the land and reducing it to cultivation.

I will demonstrate still further, that if we grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to a man on condition that he occupy and cultivate it for a period of years, in the process of time it will yield twenty times the revenue to the Federal Government that it will while you permit a man to enter it and let it lie without cultivation for a series of years, or while you permit it to remain uncultivated without being entered at all. I will redeem every intimation of principle or position that is given out in what I stated yesterday in reference to the revenue of a State being the State. But I will let that pass.

The Senator from Georgia, it seems to me, has manifested more feeling than he has displayed sound argument and judgment on this occasion. I remarked yesterday, and I repeat now, that it is natural for a parent who has a deformed offspring to feel concerned for its fate; and his sensibilities are easily touched when there is an unkind remark made about the deformity. I did not intend that any allusions I made to the bill reported by the Military Committee should have this effect. My reference was to it as a measure.

The gentleman congratulates me upon indicating some distinguished ability in the assault I have made upon the bill reported by the Military Committee, and then he qualifies and corrects that by saying, no, it was not upon that bill. He says the argument I have made was against the bill which they reported, and not against the measure before the Senate. What is the illustration he gives of the great ability I manifested? It was that I had manufactured a man of straw, and then, to show my extraordinary gladiatorial powers, physical or intellectual, had crushed the man I had created. To what man of straw is it that the gentleman alludes? The bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs? If I have demolished a man of straw, it is a man of your manufacture, not mine. If I have not shown any very great ability in the assault I have made on this man of straw, I have shown all that I could show in a contest with such an adversary as I had to contend with. It was at least sufficient for the occasion. I think I have nailed this man of straw, torn him to pieces, and exposed him to the country and the Senate. So much for the gentleman's man of straw.

But the Senator seems to pride himself on some calculations he has made, and he speaks sneeringly and disdainfully of volunteer forces. He says they are not the proper force to use for the service required by the Government. He reads from documents furnished by the War Department to prove that volunteer forces cost more than regulars. I imagine that if the gentleman will analyze that report, (and sometimes it is best for us to analyze documents that we use, and go into their details before we use the aggregate figures,) he will find that it embraces the additional expense incurred by calling out the militia for short periods, and then dismissing them. I imagine the great item of increase has been brought about by calling out the militia for very short periods of time.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator is mistaken there. The report is in relation to volunteers. That term is used, not militia. I do not know an instance named in the report from the War Department to which I alluded, in which the militia have been called out; volunteers have been.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. General Washington called them out. They were called out on various occasions. They were called out in the last war, I think.

Mr. IVERSON. No.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I thought there were a great many militia in the last war.

Mr. IVERSON. I spoke of the last twenty-two years—from 1835 to the present time. That is the period the report embraces. I did not go back beyond that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. But while they can make estimates and calculations at the War Department, we can lay down data here that will enable us to reach something like a correct conclusion, or a conclusion that will promise accuracy, as well as they can at the War Department. I propose now to put a question to every Senator here, and to the distinguished gentleman who reported this bill. If two thousand volunteers be called out for two years, to receive the same pay, the same clothing, and to be disbanded at precisely the same time as two thousand regulars, I ask, in the name of common sense, I ask in the name of all mathematical calculations, how it can be demonstrated that they will cost more than two thousand regulars?

Mr. IVERSON. I will ask the Senator a question. The bill before the Senate proposes to enlist the soldiers for two years. He wants to know how much more expensive it will be to bring volunteers into the service for two years? There might not be a very great disparity between the mere pay of the two forces for that time, but his substitute does not provide for keeping the volunteers in service two years. They are to be accepted for twelve months. Then, if you wish to run out the comparison, the first portion must be discharged at the end of twelve months, and a new set put in for the next twelve months. How much will that cost? We can all calculate how much the new outfit would cost.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Senator's explanation shows that he has not made himself familiar with the provisions of my substitute. It provides expressly that the volunteers shall be received into the service of the United States during the pending difficulties of the Mormons, and in no event shall they be continued in service longer than two years.

Mr. IVERSON. I will read the amendment of the Senator, if he will allow me:

To serve for twelve months, unless they be sooner discharged, after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, or been mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. What bill is that?

Mr. IVERSON. Yours.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I reckon not.

Mr. IVERSON. Here it is.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Read it.

Mr. IVERSON. "Substitute to be proposed by Mr. WILSON;" and that is the same thing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Ah! that is another matter. So the Senate will discover that the Senator from Georgia has made a speech without a subject. He has missed the subject entirely. He shows that his argument was made upon another amendment. If a certain number of volunteers, say two thousand, be called out to serve during the pending difficulties in Utah, and in no event to serve longer than two years, can they cost more than two thousand regulars called out for two years specifically? In no event can they cost more, but they may cost less. It strikes me that that is just as clear as that two and two make four. What, then, becomes of the Senator's argument? what becomes of all the feeling he manifested? The feeling manifested was as unnecessary as the argument was absurd.

But the Senator, in another portion of his speech, said there were only two kinds of troops known to this Government—militia and regulars. I wish to refresh the Senator's recollection on that point. No longer ago than 1846, we passed a law providing that, "for the purpose of enabling the Government of the United States to prosecute said war to a speedy and successful termination, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ the militia and naval and military forces of the United States, and to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding fifty thousand." It seems to me that that looks as if we had had volunteer service. I do not know anything about the technicalities of military affairs, for I know but little about military matters; and I am free to say that if I belonged to any party as a general thing, I should belong to the peace party. As Lucius exclaimed when consulted, in the play of Cato, I must confess that about this time "my thoughts are turned on peace." I am not quite so belligerent in my nature as some other gentlemen. My thoughts are turned upon the arts of peace. I want the energies, the talents, the physical power of this country directed to developing the resources of the nation. I want the power of the Government employed in adding to its wealth, instead of being wasted in armies, whether in the shape of volunteers or regulars.

After having met these positions of the gentleman, let me refer to the President's message. Certainly if the President had any distinct description of troops in his mind when he penned his message, we shall answer the purpose by placing volunteers at his discretion, to be used by him in suppressing the rebellion that is existing, or that is anticipated in Utah. It most clearly meets his idea. Why, then, this great resistance to volunteer service? Why these sneers at volunteers? If I had time to gather up the many gallant incidents of the brave volunteers of the many wars we have had, and to present them in regular train before the gentleman, I think he would be almost horror-stricken with regret at what he said to-day in reference to the volunteer service of the country. In the war of 1812, where is there a battle-field in which volunteer ability was not displayed, and volunteer blood shed? Go from Maine to Louisiana, go from the Atlantic coast to the golden shores of California, where is there a battle-field on which volunteer blood has not been poured out as an evidence of their high appreciation of their country? Are these men, who have rallied to your country's standard in all her perilous conflicts, and upon whose efforts victory has uniformly perched, to be regarded as occupying an inferior position to the regular soldiery, composed out of this lower, "cheaper material," of which you want your Army composed?

Let me ask the Senate, let me ask the country, if the destinies of this Government were at issue upon a single military contest, what service would you most rely upon? Would you not rely upon the volunteer who went at his country's first call; who responded to the first sound of the tocsin; who went to fight his country's cause; who went to fight for wife, for children, and for home? Would you rely upon the man that has an interest in his country, that has somebody to care for, and somebody to care for him; or the rabble soldier, that has no home, that has no country, whose highest ambition is a few sixpences and a little grog? These are the men that are eulogized and extolled, in comparison with the volunteers of these United States. God save the mark!

But, not content with that invidious comparison between regular and volunteer troops, the State which I represent must be arraigned; she must be attacked. It is true that I am not her native son, but I am her adopted son. She took me by the hand, and that generous, that brave, that patriotic people, have made me all that I am, be that much or little. Having placed me here, I intend to stand by her through evil and through good report. Come weal or come woe, I will be found standing by her interests, her honor—her sacred honor—let the consequences be what they may. Yes, I love her. The tenderest sympathies of my soul are entwined with her. There is where I live; there is where I hope to die; and beneath the clods of some of her valleys I hope my remains will be deposited. It is the home of my children; it is the home of all that is sacred to me. There, upon her soil, and beneath her sky, the infant vision of those that are bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh, first saw the light; and I will stand up and defend her.

The gentleman being hard pressed, must needs lug in an unkind allusion. I will not be invidious to the citizens of the different States. I will not go to Georgia and arraign her prowess. I feel that my position is too elevated for that. I love Georgia; I love her people, and I admire many of her institutions; and if I should be hard pressed here or elsewhere in discussion, by way of covering a retreat, even were it in my power to do so, I would make no unkind allusion to her as a State, or to her people. The prowess, the valor of Tennessee is arraigned; and it is said that I, speaking in behalf of the volunteer State, have indicated some predilections for Mormonism. I ask those who heard me yesterday, the first time I attempted to make a little effort in this Chamber, whether that inference can fairly be drawn from what I said. Perhaps I spoke hurriedly and crudely, and I may have said something by inadvertence; but take the tenor and scope of what I said, and can the gentleman, even with magnifying glasses, discover the slightest hint or word that favored the institution of Mormonism? He says that if that is my theory and if my people entertain the same views, they might, when they got to Utah as volunteers, unite with Young and desert the standard of their country. So far as the honorable Senator's allusion is concerned, I am willing to compare theory with him on the subject of Mormonism, and I would not care much to compare practice. I will take him in theory or in practice, just which ever dilemma suits him best. I spurn the imputation as being unfounded and untrue in reference to my State or myself.

I remarked in the little speech I made yesterday, that we need not be so squeamish, or have our tender sensibilities so extraordinarily shocked at the Mormons, when the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (and I intended it as no imputation on him,) had just reported a resolution—doing what? Providing for receiving, entertaining, and conferring extraordinary privileges upon the representative of the Grand Turk of Constantinople. History informs us that polygamy exists in Turkey to a very great extent, but because I alluded to it, did I say I justified it? I alluded to it as a palliating circumstance, and to show why we should not be so eager, in hot pursuit of the Mormons, either in reference to their religion or the institutions which they may have among them.

I intended to say then what I shall say now, that we have a striking illustration of the doctrine of our fathers, in regard to religious freedom, by the provision which is ingrafted in every constitution of the States of the Federal Union, that all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience. I act upon this great principle of civil liberty. Charles V., the Emperor of Germany, when he became tired of the cares of State, resigned his vast possessions to his son, and, to amuse the evening of his life, retired to a monastery, and there undertook to regulate the movement of watches; but finding it impossible to make any two of them keep precisely the same time, he was led to reflect on the crime, the folly, the wickedness he had committed in attempting to make men think alike. I am willing to be tolerant. Standing upon those great principles laid down and inculcated in the constitutions of all the States, I think that we should adopt other means, we should act towards the Mormons as Christians ought to act—go with the Bible in one hand and the torch of reason in the other, and dissuade them if we could from their course.

I might refer to the various instances of impostors who have sprung up from the body of mankind, and raised organized communities, from the beginning of the world to the present time. They have had their day; they have risen and fallen. They are past and gone. But how do the honorable Senator and myself compare in practice? When the vote came up on the proposition to appropriate money to entertain, I suppose in magnificent style, the representative of the Turk, by way of expressing our high appreciation of the institutions of Turkey, how did the Senator vote? My recollection is, he will correct me if I am wrong, that he voted for that resolution, which is to take out of the Treasury the money of the people of the United States, who have such a great abhorrence of Mormonism, to be spent in entertaining the representative of the Grand Turk?

Mr. IVERSON. Does the Senator allude to me?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir; I ask whether the Senator voted for that resolution?

Mr. IVERSON. I am sorry to spoil the eloquent rhapsody the Senator has delivered by saying that I voted in the negative on that proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am very happy to hear it; that is some evidence that the Senator is getting right. I referred to it to show why we should not run into extremes on questions of this kind. As to "rhapsody," that is a thing I do not know anything about. When I deal with figures, they are not figures of speech, but the figures used in the arithmetic; and as far as we have gone in this matter, I think we have shown that the gentlemen who urge this bill here are wholly wanting and at fault in their figures.

But, sir, the Senator has referred to my State. I ask the Senate, I ask the people of this nation, if it is any part of Tennessee's history that her people have ever been wanting in prowess or in courage. She needs no vindication from me. It exists in her own history. I could recite many of her military deeds that would be ample, if her reputation was not beyond the assaults of the Senator. I could begin with the battle of King's Mountain, which was fought before Tennessee was a State. It was then a portion of the territory of North Carolina, but the people went from the eastern counties of Tennessee to the battle of King's Mountain; and there, amidst the din and the dust and the heat of battle, they showed themselves to be brave men. Is it necessary to allude to the Seviers, the Shelys, the Hardings, and the long list of those gallant patriots who participated in that battle? When you examine the history of the country carefully, you will find that it was that battle which turned the tide of the Revolution. The country had been laid waste; disaster had attended our arms; but from the battle of King's Mountain down to the surrender of Cornwallis our troops triumphed everywhere.

How was it in the war of 1812? Go to the cold regions of the North, and do you not find Tennessee soldiers, in connection with their compatriots in arms, traversing the frozen ground, and pouring out their blood freely in defense of the northern frontier? Go to your southern campaigns, in an inclement climate, beneath a burning sun, where disease and death cut them down; and were not Tennessee's sons there? Go through your Indian campaigns, and were they not there? Go to the battles of Talladega, Emuckfau, Horse-shoe, and Hickory-ground, and wherever it was necessary to make a display of bravery and gallantry, were they not there? I could hardly undertake to name her gallant sons who have distinguished themselves in your military service, because they are so numerous that their names do not now occur to me. Where is your Carroll? Where is your Houston, that was wounded in the battle of the Horse-shoe? I claim him as a Tennessean.

How was it in the Mexican war? Go to Monterey; go to any point where there was fighting to be done, and were not Tennesseans there? Where was your Campbell? Where was your Anderson? Were they not at Monterey, leading on their gallant followers in the thickest and the hottest of the fight? On what occasion is it that the sons of Tennessee have faltered? Was it at the battle of New Orleans? There were Jackson and Carroll, and a long list of others. On the 23d of December, 1814, they were gallantly engaged in the contest with the enemy, in the swamps and the lagoons; and on the memorable 8th of January, 1815, the sons of Tennessee, in connection with those of Kentucky and other States, distinguished themselves. When the embattled host was advancing, when the rockets were going up, indicating the commencement of battle, Tennessee's gallant leader, her own noble and glorious Jackson, who stands in this great forest of men the admiration of the American people—where was he? In the thickest and hottest of the battle his stern voice could be heard rising above the roar of artillery, urging his men on to the encounter.

Is this the State, is this the people that is to be taunted? Are taunts to be thrown out upon her volunteer forces? And now to be more direct and pointed, I ask does the Senator from Georgia intend to impute cowardice either to Haskell or General Pillow, or the gallant men who were led on to that bitter, to that desperate, to that fatal charge which was made on Cerro Gordo?

Mr. IVERSON. I will take this occasion, perhaps it may save me a speech in reply to the Senator, to say that I did not intend to impute cowardice either to those gentlemen, or to Tennessee troops, or to the Tennessee people in general. I accord to the people of Tennessee as much bravery and personal courage as any people in the United States. I believe they are at all times as ready for a fight as almost anybody, and from my observation are more anxious than most people. But the Senator seemed yesterday to vaunt a great deal about the prowess of Tennessee people; and he told us how easy it would be for them to take a contract from the Government to whip the Mormons at half price; and he seemed to lay so much stress really on the invincibility of Tennessee raw troops, that I took occasion to refer to an incident in history which showed that raw troops, although they may come from Tennessee, a brave State—and I mean to accord to them as much bravery as anybody—even Tennessee raw troops cannot stand fire like "mercenary" regulars who are drilled into obedience. I referred to the battle of Cerro Gordo, where General Pillow himself, in his report, states the fact, that the first and second Tennessee foot regiments, who were engaged in that battle, faltered and retreated from the ground on the first fire of the Mexican batteries. He does not say the "first" fire; but on the fire of the batteries they retreated from the ground, and went to a position where he stood with his troops, and did not make another attack until a message was sent to him stating the surrender of the main army of the Mexicans, and then he marched over to the main road.

I merely cited this as an evidence of the inferiority of raw troops, undisciplined militia. Those troops were not altogether undisciplined, for they had been in service some months; but they had been on the march all the time, and had probably very little opportunity of discipline. I cited it as an instance of the danger of depending on raw troops, militia, volunteers, who are just taken from the plow-handle and organized into companies and regiments. They cannot stand fire. It is not one time in a thousand that they can do it, if the fire is such a one as was received from the Mexican batteries, and such a one as I apprehend they will receive from the Mormons if they go there. I make no imputations on the courage of the Tennessee people. I accord to them, I say again, as much courage and personal bravery as any people. Still, I do not think Tennessee people, brave as they are, can stand fire like regulars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am very glad to hear the Senator make the explanation, disclaiming any intention to impute cowardice either to General Pillow, Colonel Haskell, or the men whom they led up to this masked battery. There are no troops on the face of the earth who could have stood it. Those who are familiar with the position say that the only alternative was to fall back or to be mowed down where they stood. It was the most impregnable point of the whole Mexican line. There is no man, taking the history of Tennessee and the facts connected with this particular transaction, who is disposed to be impartial, who can entertain, for a moment, the belief that there was a want of bravery on the part of the officers or men at this particular part of the battle of Cerro Gordo.

I will now say, what I was going to state in the absence of the gentleman's explanation, in which he has entered a disclaimer, that if his intention was to pass an imputation of cowardice on the people of Tennessee, or her officers or men, I must pronounce the imputation as wanton, unjust, and unfounded in truth; but I am not reduced to that alternative. In the absence of the explanation in which he has entered his disclaimer, and which I was proud to hear, I should have pronounced the imputation as false, absolutely false; and then as to the bravery of General Pillow and Colonel Haskell and others who were engaged in that contest, should have turned the Senator over to them for demonstrations that might have taken place in the future entirely satisfactory to him.

Yes, Mr. President, I am proud of my adopted State; and while here, or elsewhere if need be, I will vindicate her interest and her honor, let the consequences be what they may. I love her institutions; I am devoted to her people; and I will speak in strong language and upon high authority that "Whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." I will stand by her here, I will stand by her at home, as I have already said, come weal or come woe.

I now offer the Senate an apology for the remarks I have made on this subject; but I have felt, under the circumstances, that I was called upon to say this much in reference to the character, the reputation, and the military renown of the people of Tennessee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn. We cannot get the vote to-day.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Donnell, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Mason, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wade—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Hale, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I am very glad that the Senate has refused to adjourn, because it must be evident that this question has detained the Senate quite as long as it ought to do. I am not particularly tenacious that we shall have a final vote to-day; but certainly, in view of what lies before us, we ought to come to a conclusion as to when we are going to settle this Army question. If we can adjourn with the full understanding that to-morrow we are to conclude it and then adjourn, as we shall do, to Tuesday, beyond all question from to-morrow, I am satisfied; but if we adjourn now, it will be to Monday, to meet simply to adjourn again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we adjourn now, it will be to to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. But you will meet to-morrow, and will go on the same way, and do nothing. You will meet to-morrow and have the same thing over again, and adjourn without settling the question. If we meet to-morrow to settle the question—if it be the determination that we shall have no further adjournment after to-day until we dispose of the Army question—I am willing to adjourn; but if we are to go on from day to day in this way, the bill will consume the whole session.

I beg Senators to consider that every day wasted in the winter is a day of detention here during the summer. We are wasting away now the pleasant season, when we can legislate and transact public business with comfort, to be detained here when the hot days come. I do not want to do it. For one, I am tired of adjourning over from Thursday to Monday every week, when business lies in our way undisposed of.

Here we have had this Army question for more than a month. Let us get clear of it. If we are going to increase the Army let us do it; but if we are not going to do it, let us determine that we will not, and take up something else. There is no propriety in it, and the judgment of the country will not sustain this mode of doing business. When the Administration is appealing to you to say whether you will grant or refuse an increase of the Army, you devote but four days a week to the consideration of the question; give up two entire days, and pass the subject over from week to week until the spring, when it will be too late to get these recruits for any practical or useful purpose. The chairman of the committee has said to the Senate time and time again, if you mean to grant the additional troops, do it, and do it now. If you do not mean to grant them, say so, so that the Government can dispose of the force now provided for by law in the best possible manner. If you mean to say that there shall be no additional regiment, let them make the best they can of what they have; but if you mean to grant others, do it at once.

I do not mean to say anything to my honored friends from Tennessee and Georgia, but I do think their speeches to-day would have been much better suited to the latitude of Georgia and Tennessee than here, in the present aspect of the question. They were eloquent and able speeches—such speeches as would have taken Georgia and Tennessee perfectly captive; but I beg leave to say to them that I think this boasting about the chivalry of Georgia and the prowess of Tennessee, is a little out of place here.

I am prepared to vote, and I dare say every other Senator is, if you just give us a chance to do it. ["Question, Question." "Let us do it."] I am going to say but one word more. I am utterly opposed to your volunteers. I am not going to vote for volunteers in any form. If that is the only way in which you are to have an increase of the Army, I will have no increase of it. Now allow me to state one or two reasons for it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I wish to see him advocate a distinct proposition on this matter, and I suggest that we fix an hour to-morrow when we shall have a vote, with the understanding that the bill shall then be disposed of. But, if gentlemen wish to continue the debate further, let them go on this evening. I believe it is the general sentiment of the body, that there is no necessity for debating the measure farther. Let us fix on one or two o'clock to-morrow for taking the vote. Then the Senate will be full; at present I believe the Senate is not full.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would prefer to have the bill disposed of now, if that is the disposition of the Senate. If it is the disposition of the Senate to reject the bill, let them do so, and take the responsibility.

Mr. BROWN. If we can have a vote without further debate, I shall give my vote without assigning a reason for it, because I do not believe the world is going to be much influenced by my reasons. My reasons are satisfactory to myself, but I do not care a sixpence whether the world knows them or not. Just let us come to a vote, and get clear of this bill. If the Senate will do that, I have nothing to say. I will not insist on a vote this evening, but I am opposed to an adjournment, unless it be with the understanding that when we meet to-morrow we shall adjourn no more until we have disposed of the Army question. I see that Senators shake their heads. Very well. If others can go on and give their reasons why they are for this proposition and for that, against this or against that, I shall claim the privilege of doing the same thing.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to remind the Senator that more than ten days ago, upon the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, we adjourned, with an express understanding that we were to take the vote on the next day at two o'clock. If we do not get a vote now, we shall not get it for ten days to come.

Mr. BROWN. Shall we sit it out this evening? ["Yes, yes."] Then I will stop speaking, and sit here until we settle the bill and dispose of it.

Mr. IVERSON. I think we ought not to take the question now, because one or two gentlemen, to my knowledge, have left the Senate and gone home, with the understanding that the question would not be taken to-day.

Mr. BROWN. To-morrow somebody else will be away, and the next day somebody else, and so we shall be kept during the whole winter debating this miserable Army question, and get at nothing else. If the Senate will agree to it, let us say that we will take the vote to-morrow. ["Now, now."] Other Senators say no; and it seems to be springing an issue on the Senate that I am not willing to make myself a party to. Senators on the other side, who oppose this measure, can come to-morrow as well as those who favor it. Some others, I am told, have gone away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Several Senators being on the floor making suggestions.) The Senator from Mississippi has the floor. These interruptions are not in order. The Chair is unwilling to be obliged to call Senators, who understand the rules and the decorum of the body, to order.

Mr. BROWN. Senators on one side say they are not ready to take the vote, because certain of their friends have gone away, expecting that the vote would not be taken to-day. On the other side there is an anxiety to take it to-day. Why not adjourn until to-morrow with the understanding on all sides that when to-morrow comes we are to have a vote and dispose of this question.

Mr. HUNTER. Name an hour: say two o'clock.

Mr. BROWN. Very well; say two o'clock.

Mr. TOOMBS. I rise to a question of order. The Senator from Mississippi is out of order. He has no right to make such a proposition here. We are kept here to hear propositions which it is out of order to respond to. I submit that it is out of order to name a day or time, in this way, for closing debate, and make such contracts. It seems we had one the other day, but it amounted to nothing.

Mr. BROWN. Such propositions have been submitted during my four years in the Senate, one hundred times; and during my service in the Senate I have never heard that it was out of order. I think I have heard the Senator from Georgia make the proposition that we have an understanding that we take the question at a particular day or hour. I know it is not strictly according to parliamentary order.

Mr. TOOMBS. Can I have the question of order decided?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia rises to a question of order. Will the Senator repeat the question?

Mr. TOOMBS. I say it is not in order for a Senator to rise and occupy the floor with propositions to one or the other side of the House—not for the purpose of debating questions, but with a view of making contracts or agreements. That is out of order; and besides, they are not likely to be agreed to, as the gentleman himself has attested for ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROWN. I know it is not in order, and I withdraw the proposition; but understand hereafter, that if any such proposition comes from anybody, upon any point whatever, I shall consider myself at liberty to interpose the same point. ["Certainly."] With that understanding, I know that it is not strictly in order; I knew it before; but the practice has been indulged in ever since I have been in the Senate. I have never heard it objected to before.

Now, sir, I am not going to vote for any proposition to call out volunteers. If that be the only means of increasing the Army, the Army, so far as I am concerned, may go unincreased; and I put it on two points: the first is, that the volunteer service is the most expensive you can get. Gentlemen may argue as they please, but the records of the country, from the days of the Revolution down to this hour, show the proposition to be true, that your volunteers are more expensive, by fifty per cent., than regulars.

I was amazed to hear the Senator from Tennessee read us a homily an hour and a half long about economy, and then proposing the most extra-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 49.

gant proposition that had ever been made in reference to this particular matter. Why, sir, when you call out volunteers, you never get done paying them. In the first instance, you have a more expensive recruit than you have in any other way. While you pay them no more per month, you dismiss them at stated periods, and you are to pay them for marching back to their homes, to the place from which you got them. And then you are to take others in their places; and I have seldom ever known them to be dismissed without getting two or three months' extra pay; and then the practice has been established according to which they come in for bounty land. Every one of them will claim and will get his one hundred and sixty acres of bounty land, and the whole thing will sum up in paying them about twice as much as it will cost you to employ regulars for the same time.

But, sir, I am opposed to it on another and a stronger ground. I am free to say, that I do not particularly sympathize with the Senator from Tennessee in reference to his doctrines of economy. I love economy, but I never preach it. I have no particular fancy for making a reputation as an economist in the expenditure of the public money. Whatever the nation requires to maintain its honor, its dignity, and at the same time to pay every man fairly and justly for his services, I am willing to vote. I was not sent here to calculate pounds, shillings, and pence; to say that we will pay a sixpence for this, and twelve and a half cents for that; I am willing to pay liberally for whatever we get. I do not sympathize with this eternal outcry about economy.

The point on which I place my chief objection to the employment of volunteers is this; if you send volunteers to fight the Mormons you will have civil war beyond all question. It is very well known that these people have had their disturbances in Illinois and Missouri before they left the States. They left enemies behind. Those enemies thirst for vengeance to-day. Call for the volunteers, and the old enemies of the Mormons will be the first to come forward and offer their services, and say "we will take the field; we will go and fight these Mormons." They go with a view of shedding blood; they go for vengeance, and they will have it. Send a volunteer force against the Mormons from Missouri and Illinois, and you will have war as certain as that a God reigns in Heaven. No human agency can prevent it. The volunteer soldier will have volunteer officers. They will all be of a piece and all be of a party, and all thirst for vengeance on account of old scores.

The extract from Colonel Johnston's letter, read by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, had attracted my attention before; and if I felt perfectly sure that the extract was authentic, I should demand from the Executive that Colonel Johnston should be deposed from the command; and whoever goes there in command of your troops, saying you ought to have war, and that war is the best thing for the United States, is certain to bring on war. I say that theman who goes there thirsting for blood, who wants to shoot down these poor, deluded people who are following Brigham Young, will bring war, disgrace, and dishonor on your country. I want no war. I want no bloodshed. If you will send no volunteers to Utah you will have no war. There is no necessity for it. Brigham Young and his followers do not mean to fight. They will not fight you unless you force war on them. That is my judgment. I am told by gentlemen sitting around me that if I quit talking you will get a vote. I will see how that will turn out. I stop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAY. I understand the Senator wishes to address the Senate, and he yields to me for a moment. I shall move an adjournment. It is evident that we are not to get a vote here under several hours, and I would suggest this reason why I think we should adjourn until to-morrow. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who introduced the bill to the Senate is absent on account of sickness. Probably on to-morrow he will be able to get into the Senate, and I know he is anxious to be here when the vote is taken. I think if we adjourn until to-morrow he will probably be here.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to state that I saw the chairman of the committee yesterday, and that he was very anxious to be here? but at the same time he would not at all suggest that he desired the Senate should adjourn or delay the consideration of the question. I thought it would be agreeable to him, and therefore I suggested it.

Mr. CLAY. I move an adjournment.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator to delay an instant.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw the motion, and I am willing to sit here as long as anybody else.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator from Texas will yield me the floor, I will make the motion to adjourn; and on that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Fitch, Gwin, Hale, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, and Sumner—16.

The Senate thereupon adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. F. SWENTZEL, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation. There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, some days since the House was engaged in the discussion of a proposition reported from the Committee of Elections, to allow further time to the parties interested in taking testimony in the Ohio contested-election case. That committee reported my application, in which there are sundry allegations made. They also reported to the House the answer of the contestant. The following is an extract from my application:

"I am informed by him [my attorney] that when he served notice, (p. 138,) contestant claimed that he had no right to do so, because his notices, previously served, covered the residue of the 'sixty days,' and refused to appear and cross-examine the witnesses."

The answer of the contestant is as follows:

"It is asserted, or insinuated, upon the authority of justidem ignoti, that my purpose, in serving the notice in this contest, was to prevent the returned member from taking any testimony at all. I meet this by a flat denial."

Mr. Speaker, I did not participate in the discussion on this subject, because I regarded it as indecible for me to do so, notwithstanding there were many things said to which I desired to reply, particularly in the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] I ask the Clerk to read that portion of the debate which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. WILSON. I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to challenge the minority of the Committee of Elections, individually and collectively, to answer his questions; and he refers to the argument of Mr. Vallandigham, as read from the Clerk's desk, to show that the contestant here does not give the construction to the statute which we say he did. That, Mr. Speaker, is not the question."

"Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not yield the floor, unless the gentleman rises to answer the question I put. My question is this: I ask the minority of the committee to show to this House and to the country, one particle of evidence on which their statement is predicated, that it is clear that both parties gave the law this construction, or that either of them did."

"Mr. WILSON. I will do so. It is not material what the contestant's construction of the law may be now. That letter just read is a mere matter of argument. But I refer the gentleman to page 6 of this report, where Mr. Campbell states:

"I am informed by him [his attorney] that when he served notices, contestant claimed that he had no right to do so, because his notices, previously served, covered the residue of the 'sixty days,' and refused to appear and cross-examine the witnesses."

"Where was this? In Ohio. Not here in the committee room. Not since the commencement of this Congress. There it was that the contestant denied that Mr. Campbell had a right to take further testimony."

"Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the gentleman read that to me as evidence?"

"Mr. WILSON. It has not been denied."

"Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is denied flatly. It is denied in the statement of the gentleman [Mr. Vallandigham] in his own paper, which I have just read. It is denied by his acts; denied by those documents that I hold, and read from a while ago, which show that he acted inconsistently with any such construction. What the gentleman [Mr. WILSON] has read is the statement of the sitting member, that his lawyers told him that Mr. Vallandigham put such a construction on the law, in the very teeth of the acts of Vallandigham and of the acts of Campbell. I ask for the evidence. Do you, as a lawyer, give me that as evidence? I want the evidence upon which that statement was made."

"Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia as stating that the contestant denies that he informed the attorney of Mr. Campbell that he had no right to take this evidence?"

"Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand the contestant distinctly to deny it."

"Mr. WILSON. Will the contestant rise in his place and deny it?"

"Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, (contestant.) I have denied, and do deny making the statement alluded to."

The "flat denial," as repeated, seems to be indorsed by the gentleman from Georgia. I do not rise with any desire, nor do I intend, to make any assault upon the veracity of any person. I appear for the purpose of vindicating my own character for truth.

After that debate, inasmuch as my own opinion was predicated upon a conversation which I had with my attorney nine months ago, I did not know but that I mistook him, and, in making the statement I did, might have done the contestant injustice. I wrote to him for the purpose of ascertaining the facts in order that I might repair speedily any injury I might have done on the one hand or on the other, vindicate my own character, and substantiate the truth of my statement. It will be observed by the printed testimony in the case, (Mis. Doc. No. 4,) that Fletcher C. Cuppy was my attorney, and served my notices before my return to Ohio. I send to the Clerk's desk his response to my interrogatory.

The Clerk read as follows:

State of Ohio, Montgomery county, ss:

Fletcher P. Cuppy, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposed and said that he acted as attorney for Hon. Lewis D. Campbell in taking testimony, in Montgomery county, Ohio, in relation to the contest between him and Clement L. Vallandigham, for the seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress, as Representative of the third congressional district of Ohio; that while acting as attorney as aforesaid, affiant served a notice by copy upon said Clement L. Vallandigham, personally, apprising him of affiant's intention to commence taking depositions at the time and place in said notice mentioned; that said Clement L. Vallandigham refused to accept the copy of said notice handed to him by affiant, because he (as he then said) had served a notice upon Hon. Lewis D. Campbell of his intention to take depositions in his own behalf, during a part of the time which would be occupied in taking depositions under the notice so served as aforesaid by affiant. Said Clement L. Vallandigham then and there claimed that affiant, as attorney for said Campbell, had no right to take depositions at the same time that he (said Vallandigham) was taking depositions at another place, in his own behalf; and thereupon gave affiant notice that for that reason he would not appear or cross-examine any witnesses examined by affiant under said notice, in behalf of said Campbell. Said notice, with the time and manner of the service of the same appended thereto, was filed, with the depositions taken before Hon. D. W. Jiddings, Mayor of the city of Dayton, in the said county of Montgomery; and further this deponent saith not.

FLETCHER P. CUPPY.

Sworn to before me by Fletcher P. Cuppy, and by him subscribed, in my presence, this 13th day of February, A. D. 1858. Witness my hand and seal of office on the day and year last aforesaid.

LUTHER B. BRUEN,

Notary Public, Montgomery county, Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The statement of Mr. Cuppy is corroborated, to some extent, by the testimony which he took. The contestant never did appear, in person or by attorney, to cross-examine my witnesses. I will only add that Mr. Cuppy is a member of the bar, of good standing, and enjoys the confidence of the community in which he resides.

I thank the House for its indulgence, and dismiss the subject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, obtained the floor.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a personal explanation.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Although it was my intention, I did not object to the personal explanation of the gentleman from Ohio. I will not object now to anything the gentleman from Georgia may have to say in reply, as a member of the Committee of Elections. But I wish it understood that I shall object to the matter going any further.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I stated, in the discussion of the preliminary question referred to, that I understood the contestant distinctly to deny the allegation of the minority of the Committee of Elections. The gentleman has read the deposition of his attorney controverting that denial. All I ask is, that a statement from the contestant be read in reply to what has been said by the sitting member.

The Clerk read as follows:

It would have been more man-like had the returned member waited till I had an equal right to the floor.

But this whole matter is upon a false issue. There is no question of veracity on this point between him and myself. I did not deny that his attorney had made the statement to him.

I did tell his attorney that I would not attend at the taking of his testimony, because my own notices were out, in part, and I should attend to them, and to my own case, as there would be but ten days left. Nor did I appear at his examinations, either in person or by attorney. But I did not, whatever his deductions may have been, say or intend one word to him then, or at any time, about the law or its construction as to taking testimony, or his rights within the sixty days, nor upon any other point. He was a person with whom I was not on terms of speaking, or even recognition.

Upon this statement I submit the matter without comment. CLEMENT L. VALLANDIGHAM.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise, sir, to ask the indulgence of the House in a matter analogous to that in which the gentleman from Ohio has just been indulged.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I appeal to the fairness of the House to allow me to make a personal explanation.

Mr. BOWIE. I hope my friend from Tennessee will withdraw the objection.

Mr. CLEMENS. The gentleman from Tennessee did not rise in his seat and object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The Chair had announced the result before the gentleman objected.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will withdraw my objection upon the request of my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The decision was made by the Chair before any objection was heard.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman rose from his seat and objected.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire the Clerk to read from the Globe the marked passage which I have sent to him; and I beg the attention of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BOWIE,] who spoke the day before yesterday, relative to my election, to that passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Won by the siren songs of the sitting member in this case, they are ready for a street fight at any time. I will not say how they hold their elections; but, at all events, they let every native vote, and shut out all the foreign voters. Do you deny it? Dare you deny it? And such men as that now appeal to us! Sir, Robespierre was a coward; yet Robespierre counseled death and destruction. You may be unlike him for aught I know."

"I have no spur
To prick the sides of my intent."

I counsel death and destruction only that it may come back upon the head of the offender. Yes, I tell you, you have a day of reckoning to come, gentlemen, in the city of Baltimore. There will be a war there, and it will be a war of the people against clubs and mobs. I only hope that, in the providence of God, I may live to counsel, advise, and direct you. I will not advise anything which I am not ready to take the foremost rank in executing. You may be a Robespierre to counsel death, but always absent yourself. I will put you under my foot. You shall not live an hour. There is a day of reckoning for you. You must either fight or escape it by flight, in your wickedness, your malice, your malignity, your utter disregard of all the rights of a great city—yes, sir, a city that ought to be, and I hope will be, the southern emporium of this blessed and glorious Union."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I desire politely and respectfully to ask my colleague whether those words are applied to me personally; and, if so, whether he has anything to say with reference to them.

Mr. BOWIE. I personified the American party when I used that language. When I said "you," I addressed myself to the American party, and did not mean personally to apply any portion of it to my colleague; but personifying the American party, which has struck down the Democratic party of the city of Baltimore, by force and bloodshed, I meant to say that a day of reckoning would come, and that in that day of reckoning there would be war.

I did not say how far the gentleman counseled those things; but if he did counsel them, I thought he ought to be, as I would be, willing to take all the personal responsibility for it.

Mr. Speaker, it grieves me to think that I have wounded any man's personal feelings. I have no unkind feelings towards my friend—my friend heretofore; I have no unkind feelings towards him personally; but I tell him, I tell this House, I tell this nation, that from my inmost soul I abhor the principles of the Know-Nothing party; I believe they will lead to bloodshed and revolution; and believing it, I counsel those whom they have trampled under foot to resist when the proper time comes. To that extent I meant to address myself, without in any particular personal sense applying it to my colleague, and I hope he will not consider that I desire any personal war with him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. In reference to the opinions of my honorable colleague touching the American party, this House is not the appropriate place to speak. It has not been my habit, at any time, to bring here any mere question of party principle or party discipline, which properly belongs to the canvass before the people. I rose merely to ascertain whether the language, which might be applied to me, or might not be applied to me, was intended to be personally applied. His response, in that respect, is satisfactory to me, and I am glad that our personal relations will not be disturbed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

on which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHORTER] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHORTER. Mr. Chairman, on the question of the admission of Kansas into this Union as a sovereign State under the Lecompton constitution, and of the position of the South thereon, I shall speak to-day. I bring no elaborate argument to be read to the House, because the points involved in the controversy are, to my mind, clear and well-defined. Neither do I bring with me to the task a blind idolatry for the Union nor an unreasonable attachment to any national party at the sacrifice of principle. I do not, Mr. Chairman, regard the preservation of the one as the "primary object of patriotic desire." My attachment for the other ceases whenever it fails to redeem its public pledges. Those who have preceded me in this debate have discussed this question chiefly in reference to its effects on the political parties of the country. I shall consider it in a higher light, and speak of its effects on the Union of these States and the destiny of the South.

What I have witnessed in this Hall, since the receipt of the President's able special message on Kansas affairs, has satisfied me that, unless there is a remarkable change in public sentiment in certain quarters, the recent position assumed by the State of Alabama on this question will result in a convention of her people, representing the sovereignty of the State, to determine what shall be her future relations towards the Federal Government.

Resolutions have been adopted unanimously by both branches of the Legislature of my State, affirming the legality and regularity of the Lecompton constitution, and demanding (not as a threat, or for the purpose of intimidation) the unqualified admission of Kansas under that constitution as a State of this Union. They demand this as a right guaranteed to the people of Kansas by the Federal Constitution, and by the organic act establishing the territorial government. They demand it, also, as an act of justice to the South, and as the legitimate consequence of the supposed triumph, in the last presidential election, of the principle of non-intervention by Congress with the question of slavery in the Territories. The resolutions also reaffirm the determination of the people of my State to resist, even to a dissolution of this Union, the refusal by Congress to admit as a State any Territory hereafter applying, "because of the existence of slavery therein." The resolutions are too long to be read in full to the House. One portion, however, of the preamble, and the whole of the first resolution, I ask the indulgence of the House to read now, as they indicate the sentiment of our Legislature on the question of the remedy which they propose adopting in case Kansas is refused admission into the Union. They say:

"While this General Assembly will not assume in advance to dictate the course to be taken by the State of Alabama in the event Kansas should be refused admission into the Union, they nevertheless feel constrained by a high sense of duty, in the firm conviction that she will redeem her pledges and take no steps backward, to provide the means by which her people, in convention assembled, may determine their course of action: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Assembly convened, That in the event Kansas should apply at the present or any future session of Congress for admission into the Union as a State with and under the constitution heretofore framed and adopted by her, and commonly known as the Lecompton constitution, and shall be by Congress refused admission, the Governor of this State is respectfully instructed, by proclamation, to assemble the qualified voters of this State, at the usual places of voting in their respective counties, to elect delegates to a State convention on a day to be by him appointed, within ninety days from the time when he shall receive satisfactory evidence of such action by Congress."

Cordially indorsing, as I do, both the preamble and the resolution, as passed by the Legislature of my State, I deem it not inappropriate to the present occasion, that the voice of one of her humblest Representatives on this floor should be heard in defense of her position, and in vindication of the policy foreshadowed as the probable action of her convention. It is not my purpose to-day to discuss the right of Alabama to secede from the Union. With us the argument on that question is exhausted. I am aware that the Republican party deny that we have such a right; and that they threaten coercion whenever we shall undertake to exercise it. But let Alabama, in her sovereign capacity, once declare that she is no longer a member of this Union—I care not whether you call it a constitutional or a revolutionary right—her sons will be prepared to defend it in the forum or in the field.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of what were called the compromise measures of 1850, effectually destroyed, for a time, the old party organizations in many of the southern States, and divided the people thereof into two new parties—the Southern Rights or Secession, and the Union party. The Secessionists, with whom it was my pleasure to act, believed that the South ought not quietly to submit to the injustice done her by those compromise measures, and seeing no other adequate remedy, favored an immediate dissolution of the Union. Their opponents, while they did not wholly approve those measures, were nevertheless willing to acquiesce in them as a final settlement of the slavery question, and adhere to the Union.

The struggle for supremacy between these two contending parties enlisted on both sides the ablest intellects of our land. The contest was bitter in the extreme. It excited political and personal prejudices among our people that time has not even yet fully removed. The State of Georgia called a convention, and in her sovereign capacity decided that she would not secede from the Union for the then existing causes; but, at the same time, Georgia expressly declared to the world that, upon the happening of certain events, all of which were specifically enumerated, she would resist even to a dissolution of the Union. Among the causes which, in the opinion of that convention, would justify the adoption of such an extreme measure, was the refusal by Congress, at any time thereafter, to admit a State into the Union because its constitution recognized slavery. The southern States finally united upon this Georgia platform; and they stand to-day pledged to sustain Georgia, and to resist to a dissolution of the Union the refusal by Congress to admit Kansas because of the existence of slavery in her constitution.

When the Kansas and Nebraska bill was passed, this doctrine of the right of the people in the Territories to establish a slave or a free State, and be admitted into the Union free from all congressional interference, was adopted as a fundamental principle. That bill declares that Kansas, as well as Nebraska, has the right of admission into the Union as a sovereign State, with or without slavery, according to the legally-expressed will of the majority of her people. Kansas to-day presents herself at the door of this Hall with her constitution, and demands admission into the Union. Examine that constitution, Mr. Chairman, and you will find it republican in form. It has been legally adopted, and in the usual way. Why, then, this violent opposition to her admission into the Union as a sovereign State? It is because her constitution recognizes slavery as one of her domestic institutions. We have no right to go into any investigation in reference to that constitution, further than to inquire whether or not it has been legally adopted, and whether it be republican in form.

To one acquainted with the history of congressional legislation upon the admission of new States into the Union, it is not at all surprising that this opposition should be manifested to the admission of Kansas as a slave State. Objections have been interposed by the Republican party, and, strange to say, by a portion of the national Democracy.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHORTER. No, sir; I do not intend to yield the floor to-day to friend or foe.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I supposed the gentleman was willing to be corrected.

Mr. SHORTER. I know the point the gentleman wishes to make. I am fully aware of the special pleas that have been interposed by the honorable gentleman himself, and those Democrats who cooperate with him on this floor against the admission of Kansas. They pretend that they do not base their opposition to its admission upon the institution of slavery. But, looking to the past history of the country, I say I was not at all surprised at the manifestation of this feeling in the House. Why, sir, when the State of Missouri offered herself for admission into this Union with a pro-slavery constitution, we find that her application was violently opposed by the North. What was the special plea interposed then? A portion of the Free-Soil or Abolition party came out manfully and avowed their opposition to the admission of any more slave States. I respect them for their candor at least. They occupied no doubtful ground. I know where the Republican party now stands, and I cast down at their feet my glove of defiance, and bid them

"Lay on, Macduff!"

But when Missouri applied, the objection urged by many northern men to her admission, was, as is well known to this House, not because her constitution tolerated slavery, but because it was contended that it was not republican in its form. Why was it not republican in its form? Turn to the debates upon this question, and you will discover that there was a clause in that constitution which conferred upon the Legislature of Missouri power to prevent the immigration into that State of free negroes. The North then urged that as a special objection to the admission of Missouri into the Union, and contended that for that reason the constitution was not republican in its form. I merely allude to this in order to show that there is always some special plea interposed against the admission of a slave State into the Union. Now what has been the history of the North upon this question of free negro immigration since Missouri came in? In perhaps a majority of the northern States to-day, you will find laws upon their statute-books, excluding the immigration of free negroes, and yet the Representatives in Congress from those very States, when Missouri applied for admission, opposed and voted against it on the ground that the power to pass such a law was vested in her Legislature; and, therefore, they contended the constitution was not republican in form. It is well known that the State of Rhode Island refused at first to adopt the Constitution of the United States, and to come into the Union. She afterwards applied, and was admitted. She presented no constitution at all, but a mere charter granted by the Crown of Great Britain, by King Charles II., in which her people are spoken of as "subjects," and he himself as their "sovereign." And yet there was no special objection interposed to the admission of Rhode Island because her constitution was not republican in form. Rhode Island was a northern, and Missouri a southern slaveholding State!

Before I undertake, Mr. Chairman, to answer some of the objections which have been interposed to the admission of Kansas into the Union with her present constitution, let me, for one moment, propound to this House the inquiry, what will be the effect of the rejection by Congress of the application of Kansas for admission into the Union? Can you demand her to a territorial condition? I contend not. Kansas is either to-day a sovereign independent State, or she is a Territory. If a Territory, Congress has not the power under the Constitution to admit her into the Union. The Constitution limits that power to the admission of new States; Congress has no power to create States; it must be a sovereign State before it can be admitted into the Union. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, you conferred upon the people of those Territories the legal right to form a constitution and to be admitted into the Union. The law embraced two distinct propositions: one in favor of the people, giving them the right to make a constitution and become a sovereign State; by the other, you pledged the faith of Congress to admit them into the Union. If the organic act, establishing a territorial government for Kansas, was, as I contend, an enabling act, then she is to-day a sovereign independent State, and the Federal territorial officers should be instantly withdrawn. She is a free, independent, sovereign State, outside of the Union, and by the consent of Congress.

Is the organic law in fact an enabling act? Does it confer upon the people the right to form a constitution to become a State? I say that it does most clearly. It expressly gives them the power "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." That is the position all parties in the country have taken, until within a very recent period. The President so construes that law in his instructions to Governor Walker; that is the construction given to it by Walker himself in his inaugural address in Kansas. The same construction was given it by the Republican party in this House, because, at the last session of Congress they voted for Kansas under the Topeka constitution, thereby recognizing the right in her people to form a constitution and to become a State. The members of the Republican party lately in the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, the Legislature known as the Stanton Legislature, by resolutions, expressly affirmed this doctrine. I will read from these resolutions:

"Whereas, in the spring of 1855 the first Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas was by force and violence seized upon by people foreign to our soil, and a code of laws enacted highly unjust and oppressive, and calculated to drive off or enslave the actual settlers of said Territory, and to fix upon them an institution revolting to a large majority of the bona fide citizens of the Territory; and whereas, to avoid civil war, and as the only peaceful alternative, asserting as they did, that the principle formally enunciated in an act organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas would fully authorize and sustain them in their movement, the people of said Territory did proceed to call a convention to frame a State constitution."

There it will be seen that the Republicans in Kansas admit that the people have the power, under the organic act, to call a convention and frame a State constitution. The prominent men of all parties have uniformly given that construction to the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Even the father of it, (as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] is sometimes called,) in his Springfield speech, delivered only a short time before the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, indorsed that construction, and went further, and stated that the law under which the delegates were about to be elected was "just and fair in all its objects and provisions." He said:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates, assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise.

"If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of the majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit, and under the direction of whose leaders, they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity with the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles, in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to file a caveat for my party. It gave no such construction to that act—

Mr. SHORTER. I cannot yield the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, as my time is short. I do not hear, from my position, what he says.

This, Mr. Chairman, is no new theory of mine. Let me refer to the past history of the country on this question. It is well known that the State of Indiana, after an enabling act was passed authorizing her to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union, went on to form that constitution; and prior to the assembling of Congress she absolutely nominated her electors. The presidential election came on, and she voted for a presidential candidate before she was admitted into the Union under any declaratory act. Her votes were received and counted in this Hall. Mr. Hendricks, a Representative from that State at the time, took his seat in the House, and voted as a member prior to the passage of any declaratory act formally bringing her into the Union. Many of the ablest statesmen in Congress, at that day, took the ground that the enabling act itself brought her into the Union whenever they complied with its provisions, and adopted a constitution which was republican in form. The State of Ohio is a member of the Union to-day. Under what law? Can any member from that State point his finger to an act of Congress declaring Ohio to be a State of this Union? Was there an act passed formally admitting her as a State? None, sir. It was only when Louisiana, a southern State, applied for admission into the Union, that the doctrine was advanced that it was necessary to have a declaratory act passed to bring her in. Why was that done? Louisiana had a constitution republican in form. No objection was made to it upon that ground. But the North wanted to prohibit that State from ever levying taxes on the commerce of the Mississippi river; and Congress, therefore, for the first time passed a declaratory act, admitting Louisiana, and securing to the North the free navigation of the Mississippi.

Let us look at the debates on the question when Missouri applied for admission. Mr. Lowndes, and Mr. Clay, the distinguished father of the member from Kentucky who sits near me, took the same ground on the admission of Missouri into the Union. Speaking on this very identical question, and contending that Missouri was a sovereign independent State outside of the Union, Mr. Lowndes said:

"If you look at the course which Congress has pursued hitherto, it will be found that, on elevating Territories from the grade and dependence of a territorial government, Congress has done no more than emancipate them from its control. On doing this, said Mr. L., you have reserved nothing like an authority to remand them to their colonial condition. You have determined, in such case, by the act of allowing the Territory to form a constitution; that, for certain purposes, she is an independent State."

"Although the mere act for the admission of a Territory into the Union does not make her a State, inasmuch as her acceptance of the offer is required, yet, at the moment that she declares that it is expedient to form a constitution—at that precise moment she acquires all the rights of a State."

"The people of Missouri, as of every other admitted State, at that moment acquired rights which it is not competent for the Legislature of this country—which it is not competent, upon the principles which we hold sacred, for any Legislature under Heaven to divest them of."

"But there was still stronger proof, in the case of Indiana, of his position. In counting the votes for President and Vice President a few days after the above date, those of Indiana, given before the passage of the declaratory resolution, were received and counted. If a people may rightfully, and even without objection, elect a Governor, Legislature and judges; may elect and send to Congress Senators and Representatives; and, finally, may vote for President and Vice President; upon what principle will it be said that a people enjoying and exercising all these rights, are not a State; or that to constitute them a State, requires the further interposition of this House? He could not admit it, he repeated."

Now, sir, I quote from Mr. Clay. He took an active part in that discussion, and I will read a short extract from his speech. He said:

"As to the condition of Missouri, he himself thought her a State, with a perfect moral right to be admitted into the Union, but kept out for the want of a cormonious act which was deemed by others necessary to entitle her to admission. Though, in his opinion, a State in fact, yet not being so in form, her votes could not be counted according to form."

The question upon which Mr. Clay was speaking, was whether or not the electoral vote of Missouri should be received and counted. She had undertaken, in imitation of the example set by Indiana, to cast her vote for President and Vice President before a "declaratory act" was passed formally bringing her into the Union. The vote of Indiana, a northern State, was received and counted. But when Missouri offered her vote, under similar circumstances, it was ruled out and was not counted.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I contend this Government has no right to remand Kansas back to her territorial condition. You can reject her application for admission if you choose; you have the naked power to do it. But when that deed is done, the important question will arise, whether Kansas is not an independent sovereign State outside of this Union? I contend that she would be.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, this opposition to the admission of Kansas from the Republican party does not take me by surprise at all. Honorable members of that party, when interrogated upon this floor, boldly tell us that they would not vote for the admission of Kansas as a slave State into this Union if all her people desired that institution. Why, I ask, if that be their position, do they come upon this floor, and interpose special pleas, mere technicalities, to the admission of Kansas? They are arguments, I suppose, not addressed to their own party friends here, for they stand as a unit upon that question, but addressed to a certain wing of the northern Democracy on this side of the Hall. While the opposition from the Republican party does not astonish me in the least, I must confess that I was taken somewhat by surprise when I saw, at the beginning of this session, in the Senate Chamber, the father of the Kansas-Nebraska bill—the man who, above all others in the North, the people of the South had been accustomed to look to as the defender of their constitutional rights, and whom they desired to honor with the highest evidence of their confidence—I say, I was amazed to see him abandon our cause before the first gun was fired in the great struggle now going on here over the application of Kansas for admission into the Union. Not satisfied with deserting his old party allies, like the ancient Parthians, he threw his poisoned arrows backwards as he fled. I repeat that I was surprised to see him lead off in that direction, and after him following a large portion of the northern Democrats. That party had pledged itself solemnly by the Kansas-Nebraska bill; had pledged itself solemnly by the resolutions of the Cincinnati platform, that they would vote for the admission of Kansas as a free or a slave State, according as its constitution might prescribe at the time of application.

I have no time now to take up seriatim the special arguments urged by the northern wing of the Democratic party as justifying them in their present opposition to the admission of Kansas. If they truly represent the sentiments of their constituents by the course they are pursuing in array-ing themselves against the South and the administration of Mr. Buchanan, let them stand where they are. I do not want their votes unless they reflect the opinion of the North.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it was never intended from the outset to give the South a fair chance to make Kansas a slave State.

Mr. ADRAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Is the gentleman speaking of northern Democrats?

Mr. SHORTER. I am speaking of the Republicans, and also of those northern Democrats who are opposed to the admission of Kansas as a slave State, and who resort, as I think, to divers "special pleas" to defend their unnatural position.

Mr. ADRAIN. I, as a northern Democrat, am opposed to the Lecompton constitution, not upon the ground of slavery, but upon the ground that the right of the people to self-government, as guaranteed to them by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, has not been respected, as I intend to show the first opportunity I can get.

Mr. SHORTER. I fully understand the defenses the gentleman will set up for himself, and those anti-Administration Democrats who act with him. They have a number of objections against the Lecompton constitution: that there was no enabling act; that the whole constitution was not submitted to the people; that the convention itself was not fairly constituted; and that the question of slavery was not fairly submitted to the people of the Territory. But none of those objections did I hear urged by any Democrat from the North until it was ascertained that the Black Republicans of that Territory, refusing to vote, had rendered it a moral certainty that a constitution would come here tolerating slavery. But, sir—to resume where I left off when the gentleman interrupted me—I say it was never the intention of the North to give the South a fair chance to make Kansas a slave State. They organized emigrant aid societies immediately after the bill was passed, and emptied their surplus vagrant population into the Territory to "shriek" and vote for free-soil. Look to the appointment of the several Governors for that Territory. I shall not attempt to screen the party with which I usually cooperate, for I do not consider it to be entirely blameless in this matter. So far as the national Democratic party is concerned, I will support it when I think it is right, and oppose it when wrong. I fear neither the frowns, nor court the favors of the Administration, though I contributed, to the best of my humble ability, to swell the majority which was given to Mr. Buchanan in the State of Alabama.

Look at the appointment of the Governors of that Territory, five in number, all from the North, and, from the first to the last, all in favor of making Kansas a free State. They took a southern man and sent him as Governor to Nebraska, where we stood no earthly chance to make a slave State. The whole power of this Government has been exercised in Kansas to crush out southern rights, break down the institution of slavery there, and sacrifice the South upon the altar of party. I have not the time, though I would like to do it, to review in detail the administration of all those Governors of Kansas, and to devote half an hour, at least, to the administration of that great southern traitor, Robert J. Walker. Why, sir, he was against us from the first day he went into the Territory; he went there with the avowed policy of making Kansas a free-soil State. He admits this fact in his letter of resignation, where he says that when he entered upon the duties of his office, he regarded the slavery question as of "little practical importance." His correspondence with the Secretary of State and his inaugural address both indicate his preference for a free State, provided the convention would protect the slave property then in the Territory; and he pledged himself, if the convention would carry out his views, to canvass the Territory, and make speeches every day to secure the ratification of such a constitution. In his letter to General Cass, under date of the 15th July, 1857, he writes:

"After much conference with a majority of the delegates elected to the constitutional convention which meets in September next, my opinion is that they will in all probability pursue this course, namely: to adopt a State constitution very similar to that of some of the southern States, securing the right to the slaves now in the Territory, numbering probably from two to three hundred, but prohibiting the introduction of any more slaves; excluding all free negroes, enforcing, by most stringent provisions, the execution of the fugitive slave law, securing the right of appeal, in all constitutional cases, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and requiring all officers of the government, legislative, executive, and judicial, the judges and inspectors of all elections, and the attorneys of all courts, to take an oath to support the constitution of the State and of the United States. Such a constitution, if submitted to a vote of the whole people, would, in my opinion, be adopted by a very considerable majority, for I think the great mass of the free-State Democrats and of the pro-slavery men would unite in its support, as the best that could possibly be done under existing circumstances. Such a constitution would meet my most cordial approval, and I should devote my whole time in addresses every day, to the people of every county of the Territory, to insure its adoption. Indeed, I greatly prefer this plan to any other, if it should be practicable."

It will thus be seen, by his own admission, that he labored to make it a free State, and now is found opposing the President and his old party friends, in trying to keep Kansas out of the Union, when his new allies themselves believe that if Kansas is admitted with her present constitution, the South will gain only a barren victory! Perhaps he dreamed that such a course might elevate him to the presidential chair! Well, I admit that his administration in Kansas has immortalized him. But we should remember that there are different kinds of immortality. The person who fired the Ephesian dome immortalized himself. Washington achieved an immortality of fame—Arnold an immortality of infamy!

Mr. Chairman, another objection has been interposed in both branches of Congress against the admission of Kansas into the Union, as proposed by the President, and that is, that her admission would not restore peace to her people; but, on the contrary, it would light the fires of civil war in the Territory. I am not to be deterred from demanding here all the rights to which my section is entitled by such an argument as that. In the defense of a great principle, I will discharge my duty, regardless of consequences. Civil war is, I grant you, a great evil, and cannot be justified if it can be honorably avoided. But there are greater evils, gentlemen, than those which follow in the path of civil war. Those evils would be experienced by the southern States, if they continued to remain in the Union after it had become the established practice of the Government to admit no more slave States. If, therefore, it be true that the admission of Kansas now, with her pro-slavery constitution, which the North says will not last six months, would indeed light the fires of civil war, I, for one, say—let the deed be done; let the fires burn, and flame up, if need be, as high as heaven itself; let them burn, even though the Union may fall in the general conflagration. I would rather see the South, my native land, as much as I honor her, and as willing as I am to lay down my life in her defense—I would rather, I say, see the South, with all her people, forever

"In the deep bosom of the ocean buried!" than have her remain in the Union on terms of inequality with the North, her constitutional rights denied her, her civilization slandered, her institutions perpetually warred upon, and her progress in territorial expansion checked. In the Union on such terms, we should no longer be the brave and gallant people that the world has ever been taught to regard us; but would become mere captives bound to the chariot wheels of the victorious North. If such a fate should be reserved for us in the future—which may Heaven forbid—if we are to be vassals at all, I would for myself prefer, a thousand times, to be a vassal of Old, than of New England.

But is it true, in fact, that the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, will light the fires of civil war? I think not. But on the contrary, I believe its rejection would be more likely to produce civil war than would its admission. Peace now smiles on the people of that State. If you had the power to remand her to a territorial position, and were to exercise it by referring the slavery question back to the people, you would invite civil war. The tramp of armed men would again be heard on the virgin soil of Kansas. Her streams would be crimsoned with human gore, and Lawrence might again become a smoking ruin.

Mr. Chairman, after all the wrongs done to us in Kansas by the Federal Government, through some of its territorial officers; by the Abolition emigrant aid societies of the North; after all the assurances from the northern Democrats of their willingness to vote for the admission of Kansas as a slave or a free State, according to the legally expressed will of a majority of her people, we are now told by some of that party, high in authority here, that if Kansas be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton programme, it must be on condition that her constitution shall again be subjected to the ordeal of a popular election. In other words, that the judgment already rendered by the people of Kansas in favor of the South shall be set aside, and a new trial granted to the Abolitionists. The advocacy of such a proposition by a northern Democrat is evidence that he values the temporary success and harmony of party at home more highly than he does the preservation of its principles or the constitutional rights of my section. The southern man who assumes such a position, or favors the reference back by Congress of this question of slavery to the people of Kansas, under any form whatever, is, in my judgment, false to the South; and has a heart

"Fit for treason, stratagem, and spoils."

No, sir, we demand that Kansas shall be either admitted or rejected, unconditionally, with the Lecompton constitution. I have no longer any respect for that temporizing policy that

"Palters with us in a double sense;

That keeps the word of promise to our ear,
And breaks it to our hope."

The southern States want no more compromises on this question of slavery. We have had enough of them in the past to satisfy the most ambitious of our Union-savers. We have often listened to the voice of that siren, and as often have we been betrayed. But, thank God, the spell is at last broken. We remember the first great compromise that was made between the North and the South, when this Union was formed. By it, the North agreed to surrender our fugitive slaves on demand of their owners. How has she fulfilled that obligation? Ask Massachusetts. Ask New Hampshire. Ask all the northern States which have nullified the Constitution which they were sworn to maintain and support. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the fugitive slave law can to-day be peaceably and quietly executed in a single State north of Mason and Dixon's line. If there is any place where it can be done, it is in some isolated location, and is an exception to the general rule.

We remember the compromise of 1820. The brand of inferiority was then stamped deep on the brow of southern manhood and southern honor; and there it remained, a burning disgrace, till the Kansas-Nebraska bill wiped it out and restored us to our long lost rights. We remember the days of nullification in South Carolina, and the compromise tariff of 1832. The North then agreed to abandon the protective system gradually for the period of ten years. At the expiration of that time, the tariff of 1842 was enacted, more odious and oppressive in many respects to my section of the Union, than the black tariff of 1828. We remember, again, and will ever proudly remember, the brilliant triumphs achieved by southern arms in the Mexican war. We cannot, if we would, forget how the North robbed us of all the fruits of our victories. We cannot forget that compromise of 1850—that southern surrender of 1850! Mr. Chairman, we need no other battle-cry to arouse the spirit of southern men hereafter in resistance to northern usurpation, or in driving forever from these Halls any number of southern Representatives who shall hereafter dare, even to save the Union, to make further concessions to the demands of New England fanaticism. The compromise of 1850, indeed!

Mr. Chairman, when the gallant little band of Texans was drawn out in battle array, on the plains of San Jacinto, and in front of the overwhelming forces of Santa Anna, it is said that the magic words, "remember the Alamo," sent an electric shock along the line, and inspired the heart of every Texan soldier to fight for victory or death. So, hereafter in the South, if, in self-defense, we are driven out of this Union, and if this sectional contest is forced upon us by the North, the words "remember the compromise of 1850" will be emblazoned on a thousand banners, and will fire the zeal of southern patriots in defense of their invaded rights by the recollection of past wrongs. I despise, Mr. Chairman, with my whole heart, the very word "compromise." It has become offensive to my sight. If I had the power I would strike it forever out of the English vocabulary, and would make it a penal offense for a southern man ever again to pronounce it in public. It is suggestive to my mind of dishonor, surrender, and base submission. In the language of McDuffie, "it sounds to my ear like the bugle blast of the robber band." Then away with this idea of another compromise! We will not entertain it for a moment. Well has it been said that the time for compromising this slavery question between the North and South has indeed passed away forever. We offered you the olive branch in 1850, and asked you to extend the Missouri line through to the Pacific ocean. The proposition was indignantly rejected. As an act of partial justice to the South, but after the North had appropriated every foot of the territory acquired from Mexico, the northern Democrats assisted us in repealing the Missouri restriction, and pledged themselves by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and again by the Cincinnati platform, to vote for the admission of Kansas as a slave State, if her constitution recognized that institution at the time of her application for admission into the Union.

I repeat, then, let Kansas be admitted or rejected unconditionally with the Lecompton constitution. If admitted, the South gains nothing but what she is clearly entitled to under the law. If rejected, it is a declaration upon the part of the North that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union; the sun of your national Democratic party will go down to rise no more; the constitutional rights of my section will be sacrificed; and I pray Heaven, in that event, that the State of Alabama will indeed take "no step backwards," but will become the nucleus around which shall instantly spring into existence, like Minerva from the brain of Jove, a great and powerful southern confederacy. Then, sir, but not till then, I fear, will we in the South be able successfully to defend ourselves. Then we shall be in a position that will enable us to regard those who are opposed to our institutions as "enemies in war; in peace, friends."

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to disguise the fact, however much honorable gentlemen may evade it, that the great objection at the North to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, is because it recognizes and establishes slavery as one of her domestic institutions. This opposition to African slavery originated with, and is still fostered and encouraged by, the spirit of religious fanaticism in New England. It is the same spirit which has nearly divided the people of these States into two great sectional parties; sowed the seeds of strife and civil war throughout the land; separated the churches in the South from those in the North; and which, if unchecked in its mad career, will soon work out a dissolution of the Union. It is the same spirit which recognizes a higher law than the Constitution, and commits grand larceny upon the South in the name of religion!—a religion, too, pure and undefiled, as transmitted to them by their illustrious Pilgrim fathers! The Pilgrim fathers, indeed! Sir, I have a sovereign contempt for the memory of the Pilgrim fathers. The religion of Plymouth Rock is the religion of fanaticism, of intolerance, of infidelity, of bigotry, and hypocrisy. It is the religion of the Boston clergymen, who violate the seventh commandment in going to, and returning from, their evening lectures; and who, when exposed to the indignation of a virtuous community, are lionized and fêted by the fairer portion of their flocks! In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the greatest calamity that ever befell our country was that event which clothed Plymouth Rock with its historic associations. To it I look as the "liad of all our woes." If Millard Fillmore, during the last presidential canvass, had declared that the landing of the Mayflower, instead of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, was the "Pandora's box from which escaped all the evils which now afflict the country," the sentiment would have found a responsive echo in the hearts of millions of American freemen, and might possibly have resulted in elevating him to the presidential chair!

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts—the honorable member who seems to have made the discovery that Yankee colonization is to be the fulcrum, and he himself the lever of Archimedes, by which hereafter the destiny of the world is to be controlled—told us the other day, upon this floor, that "the descendants of the Pilgrims are in a tight place." I rejoice to hear it, sir, upon such high authority, and cannot refrain from expressing the hope that they will always remain where they are. The cause of good morals, genuine religion, and the permanent advancement of the peace and prosperity of the whole country, will be greatly promoted thereby. The allusion to that honorable gentleman reminds me of another portion of his speech, in which, if he is reported correctly, he uttered a slander upon the South, and her social institutions. I read from the speech of the gentleman as published in the Globe, that I may do him no injustice. He said:

"If a man goes from Boston into Louisiana, and nobody will speak to him unless he has a slave; nobody will invite him to a social entertainment unless he owns a negro; and if he cannot get a wife unless he has a negro; then, sir, very likely he may make up his mind to own a negro. [Laughter.] But I tell you that he will repent of it every day while he has him."

And again:

"The Yankee has never become a slaveholder unless he has been forced to it by the social relations of the slave State where he lived."

That is his exact language, as reported in the Globe. The gentleman here charges directly that the "social relations" of the southern States "force" a man to become a slaveholder, on penalty of exclusion from society. Sir, the gentleman did the South very great injustice in making such a charge, because there are thousands of his own countrymen scattered all over the South, who own no slaves, and yet they enjoy the confidence and respect of the communities in which they live. Many are honored, too, with high positions of public trust. Notwithstanding the assertion of that gentleman, we have in the South but one aristocracy, and that is the aristocracy of color—the aristocracy of the white over the black man—the Caucasian over the African race. It matters not whether a man is rich or poor, whether he is a slaveholder or non-slaveholder, the people of the South recognize the "honest man" as the "noblest work of God."

Mr. TOMPKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I rise to a point of order. I believe that by the rules of the House, which prevail in Committee of the Whole, a gentleman wishing to get the floor must address the Chair from his seat. I rose and addressed the Chair from my place, but the gentleman from Ohio addressed the Chair, and obtained the floor, when he was out of his place.

The CHAIRMAN. The universal practice of the House has been to give the floor to any member rising in any part of the Hall. For that purpose, any part of the Hall has been regarded as the place of the member.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I desire to know whether a member has the right to leave his seat and go down in front of the Chair to get the floor when other gentlemen remain in their seats, rise, and address the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the same point has been raised already and decided. It has been the practice in the House for twenty years past to permit a member to rise in any part of the Hall, and any part of the House has been regarded as his place for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. It may have been the practice, but it must be admitted that it is a bad one.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Having risen simultaneously with the gentleman from Ohio, to whom the Chair has assigned the floor, while I take no exception to the right of the Chair under the rules of the House to give him the floor, I ask that the gentleman will indulge me with a personal explanation which will occupy not more than five minutes.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I wish to correct a statement made day before yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HATCH,] which is prejudicial to myself and other members.

Mr. BURROUGHS. If the floor is to be farmed out, I want to come in as well as others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time occupied by the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee will be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I hope the gentleman will be brief, and will be allowed to go on uninterruptedly.

Mr. WARREN. I will not object, if there has been a reflection upon the gentleman, directly or indirectly; but if there has been a general charge against a party, I must object to the explanation. I entertain for the gentleman the highest respect.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. My explanation will be short, and concerns myself. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. WARREN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not see my colleague [Mr. Hatch] in his seat, and I suggest that the gentleman withhold his explanation until my colleague is present.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Is not the member in the House?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not see him. I only make the suggestion. The gentleman will act on his own sense of propriety.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Allow me to say in explanation to that point, that I dislike exceedingly to say anything which has the appearance of personality in the absence of the member to whom it refers. But when the member from New York made his speech, there were passages in that speech which I did not distinctly comprehend. Yesterday I was too unwell to occupy my seat here. I saw a report of the member's remarks in the Globe, which satisfies me that he saw proper to indulge in a spirit and strain of remark prejudicial to me and other members of the House of Representatives. He can do as I have done. He can read my statement in the Globe. It may be difficult again to get the floor. I would much prefer he were here.

The member from New York read certain obligations which he alleged were the obligations of the American, or "Know Nothing" party, as he termed it. I was a member of the American party when it had its organization, under obligations in the State of Tennessee. I have to say that that which he read as its obligation is not identical with anything I have a knowledge of. It is materially different from the obligation which I recognize, in spirit and in letter. But the member from New York characterizes the obligations of the American party as "treasonable and unconstitutional." This language is not justly applicable either to what he read as the obligations, or to what were really the obligations, of the American party. It is manifest to any gentleman who will read his speech, that the purpose of the member from New York was to stigmatize the members of the American party. Now, sir, I am satisfied that, in order to indulge the animus which pervades his speech of excited hostility to the American party, the member from New York has uttered a falsehood which was dishonoring to him, and with which I brand him, and am responsible for what I say. That is all I have to say.

Mr. TOMPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to discuss what is familiarly known as the Kansas question; and, in connection with that, the exciting question of slavery. If these subjects are disagreeable to a portion of this committee, I nevertheless feel it to be my privilege—my imperative duty—as one of the representatives of the people of the great State of Ohio, to speak my opinions to-day upon these subjects. That they are here now for discussion is no fault of mine, or of those whom I have the honor to represent; and if the country is rent with dissensions; if this Government is ultimately overthrown and destroyed—I can certainly quote the great master of nature with as much propriety as did the distinguished member from New York, on this floor, a few days since:

"Thou canst not say, I did it; never shake Thy gory locks at me."

Twice the free States of this Union have submitted to the unreasonable demands of slavery, and humiliated themselves for the sake of peace. But to the repeal of the Missouri compromise they never have submitted quietly, and I know they never will. The contest has now begun, and I say,

"Lay on, Macduff!"

And damn'd be him that first cries hold! enough!"

I am opposed to the admission of Kansas as one of the States of this Union with her present constitution. The paramount reason is, this constitution establishes and sustains slavery. I shall oppose her admission with her present constitution. It is wholly immaterial to me whether that constitution has been submitted to the people of the Territory for their sanction or not. I will not at this time stop to inquire whether it meets the approbation of the present inhabitants. The time was when I would have felt justified in voting for the admission of a State with a slavery constitution, if it was formed out of territory south of 36° 30' north latitude, that belonged to this Government at the time the Missouri compromise was adopted. I think it was the understanding of the parties to that compact that such States should be admitted; if not expressed, it was certainly implied, that such States should be admitted. If this was the understanding, national faith would have required their admission.

But by the repeal of the Missouri compromise the obligation ceased. I feel that every man in this country is free to act as his conscience may dictate. By the repeal of the Missouri compromise, the gauntlet is thrown at once. The Republican party have accepted the gage, and the contest is between freedom and slavery. The contest is an unequal one. The Republican party is unaided by Government patronage, or Government influence. For the last four years the slavery party in this country has had the countenance and support of the President of the United States. The Army of the nation, and not only that, but the judicial department of the Government has prostituted its powers, and is willing to "grind in the prison house" at the behest of this political Delilah. The Supreme Court certainly has shown itself quite as willing to enter the service of slavery as the most ultra friend of the institution could desire.

It is true, however, that the late decision of the court has changed the opinions of no man upon the rights of the slaveholder. It has only changed the opinions men may have entertained in regard to the individuals who constitute that court. Some persons may have supposed that they were too independent and upright to shape their legal opinions to suit any political party; but if there were any such persons prior to the decision of the Dred Scott case, there are none such now. It is a melancholy reflection for freemen, that the department of this Government that we looked to as the rock of safety, and that we expected to stand as a wall of fire between freedom and slavery, has shown itself more subservient to slavery than any other department of the Government.

The other departments have usually waited, I believe, until an opportunity offered—until there has been a show of pretense for their aid. They have not rendered their services without being requested to do so. But the judicial department, in this instance, voluntarily stepped out of its way, in violation of all precedent, and on the hill-tops it now shamelessly proclaims its prostitution to the world.

I have said there is now to be a contest between freedom and slavery; and I am proud to say that the great Republican party of the country, of which I am but a humble member, stands forth as the champion of freedom and the rights of man. I will say now, that I claim no right to interfere with slavery in the States where it exists; neither does the Republican party, as a body, claim any such right. I do not desire to interfere with it in the States. But I avow that I have a legal, constitutional right to resist the extension of slavery into any free territory belonging now to this Government; and no earthly power in existence can deprive me of it. I have already said that I am free from all national obligations to vote for the extension of slavery into any of the territories belonging to this Government; and I will resist its extension whenever and wherever I choose to do so. This is the doctrine, I believe, that was inaugurated three years ago, and is now contended for by a very large majority of anti-slavery men in this country. I avail myself of this opportunity to say that there really are but two parties in this country. There is the slavery party and the anti-slavery party. There really is no Democratic party. There is a party that, out of personal respect and courtesy, we call the Democratic party. But it is this day has no separate and distinct existence. It has been swallowed up—utterly absorbed by the slavery party. I do not say this by way of insult, or to make myself offensive to any one, but I say it because truth and candor require it—because things that are transpiring every day before our eyes carry this conviction home to the heart.

Before proceeding to state the reasons why I am opposed to the extension of slavery, I desire to refer to one charge that is made against the Republican party of this country. That is the charge of Abolitionism. I care nothing about the charge personally, neither do I presume that any member of the party does; but I refer to it because some honest men may be drawn away from us because this charge is made. I refer, also, to another charge that is made against us—that is, that we contend for negro equality. I say now most emphatically that the Republican party is not an Abolitionist party; that we have never at any time made any attempt to raise the black man to an equality with the whites. There may be men that now vote with the Republican party that were called Abolitionists, but they have not indoctrinated it with their opinions or their creeds.

These charges are not made because any intelligent man believes them. There is no intelligent man but knows them to be utterly false and without any foundation whatever. These charges are made by designing demagogues to mislead the ignorant and to excite a prejudice in the minds of the vulgar and the depraved. The black man nowhere has such fierce and deadly foes as in the wretched, ignorant, and depraved of earth. The more wretched and degraded a white man may be, the more deadly he hates and despises a negro; for the reason, he is fearful the negro is better than himself, and therefore comes in competition with him for the esteem of respectable white men. Hence you will hear the detestable wretch, with bloated face, blood-shot eyes, scared and blistered lips, with ragged and tattered garments, screaming at the top of his voice, "Abolitionists!"

This charge has had the effect to drive all the ignorant away from us; and many well-meaning men refuse to vote for our candidates, because they think we are really Abolitionists, in the full sense of the term. We have also been unable to hold another class of men—men who regard themselves as the aristocracy of the North. They found that the industrious yeoman, the skillful mechanics, and the hardy sons of toil, who constitute a very large proportion of the Republican party, had no sympathy and feelings with them. They have gone to the only aristocracy there is in this country. The Republican party may rejoice that it is freed from such dead weight—they would be worse than a millstone about its neck. In resisting the extension of slavery I make no appeals to the slaveholder to excite their sympathy in behalf of the enslaved and oppressed. This has been done so frequently, and without any effect, that they have become hardened; so that nothing but the "bursting of volcanoes or the crush of the riven world" could move them. I indulge in no sentimentality for the slave; I can do him no good. While I say this, I say that I believe slavery to be the greatest moral evil that can exist. "It is the monarch of crimes, and the jewels that adorn its crown are tears and blood." I oppose it because of the great wrong that it does to the white race. It deprives white labor of its just reward. It builds up no middle class of intelligent farmers, artisans, and mechanics, who constitute the real strength, who make the real wealth, and are justly the pride and glory of the free States. Where slavery is, there will, of course, be a class of well-educated, refined, and accomplished men—there will be refined society; and so there is, in many of the despotisms in Europe.

But the proportion of educated men in the slave States, I presume, is not by any means equal to those in the free States. The South has produced some great statesmen—men of whom the country may justly be proud; but, as a general thing, they were to "titles born, reputation and luxurious life." I do not denounce slaveholders as a class. There are many honest and just men among them—men of benevolence and kindness of heart; but the system is demoralizing, and must, to a greater or less degree, demoralize the country where it exists. I oppose it, because it oppresses the poor; because it deprives labor of its just reward; it deprives the poor of the means of education; it degrades labor, the only means of producing wealth in this or any other country. Where slavery exists, the road to honor and fame is hedged up from the poor, and they never can free themselves from those "twin jailers of the daring heart, low birth and iron fortune." There is nothing "to lure them on to those inspiring toils by which man masters man."

I oppose the extension of slavery into the Territories of this Government because, if this institution is permitted to go there, the intelligent free laborers of this country never will consent to live with slaves; the free States will be deprived of their just and equal rights in the Territories; these Territories never will add anything to the real greatness of the country. But I believe if these Territories are occupied only by freemen, a great people will ultimately grow up in them, surpassing in power and glory anything the world has ever seen. I am opposed to slavery, because the white inhabitants where it exists live in constant dread and alarm. They know not but they are slumbering on a volcano that, in a moment, may overwhelm them with destruction.

Who has not heard with horror—whose blood has not curdled in his veins—whose heart has not sickened at the recital of the butcheries of Nat Turner, and his murderous crew, when the blood of tender and innocent children drenched the soil of the Old Dominion? Then, orators and statesmen awakened from their long lethargy, and hurled their denunciations at the institution until they shook its very foundation. But the cry of the murdered innocents has passed away upon hollow winds. Their pure spirits have ascended to the throne of God. Their mortal bodies have moldered away in the silent tomb. The learned statesmen and eloquent orators are now silent; and the people of the Old Dominion are to-day nursing the viper in their bosoms with more tender solicitude than they ever did before. I oppose slavery because it advocates and justifies the fitting out of military expeditions, and makes war upon weak and defenseless people, with whom we are at peace. Although it was said on this floor, since the commencement of the present Congress, that the Nicaraguan question had no negroes connected with it—that there were no negroes in that country—with all due respect for the persons who entertain that opinion, I say, there would have been no discussion on this floor about the capture of Walker, had it not been for the question of slavery. The members on this floor who condemn the President, and sustain Walker, are, I believe, the advocates of slavery. They want Central America, because they want to extend the dominions of slavery. I presume no man believes that if Walker had been engaged in making war upon Canada, that the slavery advocates would have justified him in his lawless adventure! The walls of this Hall would have trembled under their denunciations against him.

But there is still a greater reason than these, than any, or all of them, against its extension. There can be no freedom for white men, where black men are held as slaves. In the slave States of this Union men are to-day deprived of the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press. You may boast of your Constitution guarantying to every man this right; but the Constitution has not the strength of a rope of sand. It is trampled under foot by the mob. In the southern States of this Union no man can exercise the freedom of speech unless the mob will permit it. I saw a man last winter in Columbus, Ohio, who was a man of education and refinement, who had been a professor in a literary college, (as I was informed,) who was driven out of the State of North Carolina because he declared that he desired the election of Fremont as President of the United States. Because he exercised the freedom of speech—a right “inestimable to freemen, and formidable to tyrants only,” for declaring his sentiments upon one of the great political questions of the day, an infuriated mob collected together and compelled him to flee for his life; he was driven from his native State, from his kinsmen, his friends, and his home; he had to go forth a wanderer in the earth. Well might he say, with Bertram—

“I have no country; that dear name
Comprises home, kind kindred, fostering friends, Protecting laws! But none of these are mine.”

It will be recollected that a respectable minister of the Gospel from the State of Virginia attended the Republican convention held in Philadelphia in 1856; and for doing this never was permitted to return to his home, and was compelled to seek refuge from violence in one of the free States. Such things are, I presume, of frequent occurrence in the slave States; if they are not, it is because no man there has the temerity to associate with Republicans, or to attend their conventions.

I saw a man within the last six weeks, who resides in the State of Virginia. He said that he had no doubt but that if Fremont had been elected President of the United States, the country would have been quite as well off as it is with the present incumbent. “But,” said he, “I dare not say that at home.” Thus it is the mouths of freemen are stopped; yet those that do it will taunt the Republican party with being a sectional party, when they know no man entertaining free sentiments and free opinions would be permitted to live amongst them. How long has it been since we saw an account of a bookselling establishment being broken up in the South, the property destroyed, the owners compelled to fly for personal safety? Why was their property destroyed? Why were they driven from the country? The public prints of the day said it was because they had a book for sale that was written by a negro. No man will be safe to read the Declaration of Independence in the State of Virginia, if their statute should be enforced. Dare any man proclaim “that all men are created equal, endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?” Dare any man say that God “hath made of one blood all nations to dwell upon the face of all the earth?”

It is made a crime by statutes in some of the slave States to say that man cannot hold property in man, or that man cannot hold property in a slave. If by word or deed, yea, “by invisible thought, or unuttered wish,” any man should attempt to inculcate the doctrine that slaves are not property, or that man cannot hold property in man, he will be forced to leave the country. You men of the slave States must burn the Declaration of Independence; you must expunge from the records of your court the will of Washington; you must proscribe the writings of Jefferson, and the free and glorious sentiments of Randolph; you must erase from the memory of man the teachings of the conscript fathers of the Republic; you must blot from the history of your country the glories of Lexington and Bunker Hill. Why was John Adams born? or why did Washington live? The heroes of the Revolution died in vain. They waded through rivers and seas of blood to establish independence. But there is a despotism to-day reigning over the minds of men in parts of this country as absolute as there is in any Christian country in the world.

I take no pleasure in repeating these things. I would be glad to avoid it if I could, but I would not be a proper representative of a free people if I did not this day declare the truth.

It will be said, no doubt, that these statutes are necessary for the safety of the white race where slavery exists. I do not doubt that these laws are deemed absolutely necessary to the very existence of the white population; but I say it is the most grievous misfortune that could befall any people. Where these statutes exist “freedom can only be a name.” If these statutes are necessary for the personal safety of the white race in the slave States—and it is declared by men of truth they are—then I say I am furnished with an argument against the extension of slavery that is incontrovertible and conclusive upon the subject. If the press has to be muzzled; if there has to be a clasp upon the mouth and a seal upon the lips; if free and glorious thoughts have to sicken and die unuttered; why try to extend this, the most terrible of despotisms? Let me say, in the eloquent language of Kotzebue—

“Let what is within, molder and decay. Why—why strive to open the wretched charnel-house, and spread the pestilence around?”

The spirit of slavery has not only subdued and stopped the mouths of men in the slave States, but there are men in the free States that yield their independence and forfeit their manhood at the dictation of the task-masters at the South. It has affected, in a greater or less degree, a proportion of the Democratic party at the North. In the language of an eloquent writer—

“The spirit of slavery has passed upon the power of the party like a thing of necromancy, winning them to its command and bowing them to its will, until they have stood stricken and panting before it like cornered deer before the inexorable hunter.”

They have forfeited their manhood and their independence. They have sacrificed their opinions and principles at the command of the southern slaveholder. Who was more clamorous for the Wilmot proviso than many of the Democracy of the free States? who denounced the fugitive slave law more fiercely and terribly than the Democracy of Ohio? but who is now more subservient to the slave power than they? It is true we have seen some signs of insurrection and rebellion in this House since the sitting of the present Congress. I am glad to see it; and, if any of those who manifest this independence should feel symptoms of spinal disease, I hope they will receive such remedies from their constituents as will remove all complaints. I have not the least doubt that the advocates of slavery this day feel more respect for those members of the Democratic party from the free States who refuse to aid slavery, than they do for the man who gives them his support. When the inquiry is made why these men humble themselves at the command of the task-master, the reply is, they are national men, and they fear the Union will be dissolved. I have no such apprehension, and I have no patience with the man that talks about it; and, without meaning disrespect to any one on this floor, I say, if there is any man who is the object of scorn and contempt, it is the northern man who can be frightened from his propriety by the slavery “raw-head and bloody-bones.”

It is not my prerogative to give advice to my Democratic friends; but I caution them against becoming Union doctors. It always kills the doctor, but the patient survives. The fate of the great Webster should be a warning to all northern men not to sacrifice themselves in any such way. Mr. Webster turned Union doctor; he cut loose from his friends at the North, the men that had stood by him in all his troubles and trials—men, whose respect for him amounted almost to adoration. He turned from them; he threw himself into the arms of the South. On the 7th of March, 1850, he made his great speech in favor of the fugitive slave bill. He aided, by his great powers, to pass that measure. A little more than two years thereafter, a convention was held by the Whig party to nominate a candidate for President. The few remaining friends that Mr. Webster had were represented in that convention. They expected the Whig delegates from the South would support him. The whole country knew what services he had rendered them—the mighty efforts he had put forth to aid in passing their favorite measure. But not one single vote could be had for him from the slave States. No appeals that could be made could bring a single man to his support. I believe it is conceded that his days were shortened by the action of that convention. Webster died; but the Union lives, and will live for generations yet to come.

There has been a series of acts perpetrated recently by the pro-slavery party in this country that would astound the world, if mankind had not ceased to be astonished at any act, however outrageous, they might commit. I refer to the recent election frauds in Kansas and Minnesota. I take but one specimen in Kansas. I take the Oxford precinct in Johnson county. There was a Democratic majority of fifteen hundred returned from a place where everybody that knows anything about it, knows that there were not three hundred voters. These names that were returned as being voters in that precinct, were copied from the Cincinnati business directory. The return showed upon its face that it was a fraud. At the time of the return no man in the Territory pretended that it was genuine. Nobody pretended there was any such number of voters there. Nobody pretends any such thing now—the evidence of the fraud being so complete and overwhelming that it could not be resisted. Under these circumstances, Governor Walker rejected the return; no honest man could have done anything else. After doing this, he published a statement of the facts and circumstances, justifying himself for what he had done.

In the face of all this evidence, the papers in the South have raised a yell over it more terrible than would be raised if a lighted torch had been thrown into a den of wolves. For doing this act of justice the Governor forfeited the confidence of the party, and we have strong reason to believe for this act has been compelled to resign his office. What kind of a sight is this for honest men to look upon? An American statesman, for refusing to become a party to the most infamous fraud the world has ever seen, is branded as a traitor to his party and driven from office. This, perhaps, is enough upon this one case. I will now refer to Minnesota. There is a county there called Pembina; and from the best information I can obtain, has but a very small population, that part of it which properly belongs to Minnesota not having more than fifteen or twenty voters. This county, we are informed, returned a majority of six hundred for the Democratic candidate for Governor. This district of country had six delegates in the constitutional convention. How many representatives in the Legislature, now I cannot tell; but I presume quite as many as it had delegates in the convention. Other places in that country where there were but very few white settlers, there were large numbers of votes returned. We have an account in one place of a hundred savages that were led to the polls to vote; not one of them could tell their names, or could speak a word of our language. They were bedaubed with their war-paint, armed with bows and arrows, and war-clubs; dressed in their breechcloths, if they were dressed at all; led on and directed how to vote, no doubt, by some individual, who was probably appointed nominally, as an Indian agent, but made it his business to manufacture bogus votes for his party.

How long is the country to submit to this? If we can believe the statements that are made in regard to these frauds, we are bound to believe that in the last election held in Minnesota, hundreds of degraded savages that could not speak a word of our language, that have no possible conception of our form of government, went to the polls; and every one of them, by the direction of somebody—because they could have no mind of their own—voted the Democratic ticket, and the vote of each and every one counted as much as the vote of the most intelligent man in that Territory. Thus it is a Democratic Governor is elected—members of the Senate and House of Representatives. These statements have been before the country for months; I have not seen them disputed; I believe them to be true, and what is more I have not heard a word of condemnation from any paper of the party, or from any member of the party, either public or private; and from all the information I have, I am reluctantly led to believe that the party justify these wrongs. The question may be asked: why does it justify these wrongs? There is but one solution to the question. Slavery has done it; slavery has taken possession of the party, and debauched it. These are the legitimate fruits of a system that teaches that one class of men have no rights that another class is bound to respect. It is founded in wrong, it is a matter of force, and the same principle and spirit that teaches that black men have no rights that white men are bound to respect, will defraud white men of their rights whenever ambition or interest demands it. It is a part of the plan of the slave party in this country to hold the entire control of the Government, and to appropriate to themselves its emoluments and its honors; where there are ruffians and robbers that can be brought from adjoining States with revolvers and bowie-knives to drive honorable men from the polls, and stuff ballot-boxes with fraudulent votes, and elect dishonest men to office, that plan is adopted; where ruffians, revolvers, and bowie-knives cannot be obtained, hideous savages bedaubed with their war paint and armed with their war clubs, are made to do the voting. But when neither border ruffians nor savages can be obtained: what then? The Cincinnati business directory is brought up, and casts fifteen hundred votes. But when there are neither ruffians, savages, nor business directories to be obtained: then what? then they resort to the imagination, and the pure bogus votes are furnished. Because slavery has done all these things, I oppose its extension into any free territory.

There are other and special reasons why slavery should not be admitted into Kansas. The first, and one which I deem entirely conclusive, is: Thirty-seven years ago a solemn compact was entered into between the North and the South, whereby it was agreed upon sufficient consideration, that there never should be any slavery north of 36° 30' north latitude. This compact was strictly observed on the part of the North. The South got everything that they contemplated, and the States of Florida and Texas, with territory sufficient to make four States in addition to what was originally contemplated, she received and appropriated them to her own use. The North submitted quietly to it, because she believed the national faith required it. But just as the North got ready to appropriate her part of the consideration for this compact, the South demanded its abrogation. The Missouri compromise was repealed, in violation of national faith and honesty, in violation of the principles that should govern the intercourse of all honorable men. But notwithstanding the repeal of the Missouri compromise, it was promised that the future inhabitants should be perfectly free to govern themselves. The act repealing the Missouri compromise contained this very anomalous provision, the like of which was probably never seen in any act of any legislative body before, and I presume never will be seen again. I quote the provision:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

The people of Kansas were not only to be free, but they were to be perfectly free. It has been said frequently, by metaphysicians, that no human being is perfect—no human laws are perfect; but the people of this Territory were to approach nearer divinity than any other created beings; they were to be perfectly free, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. This part of that act I believe has been justly denominated a stump speech. This organic act went forth to the world containing this pledge, that the people of these Territories were to be perfectly free. The Territory of Kansas was organized in pursuance of that act. The people of the free States having this solemn assurance of perfect freedom, emigrated there. But since the organization of the Territory, to this day, there has reigned therein the most terrible despotism the world has ever seen. The wrongs and outrages that this country suffered before the Revolution were nothing compared with the wrongs suffered by the people of Kansas, ever since its organization. I have known of no reign of terror that has existed anywhere in modern times, that has equaled the reign of terror that existed there during the last three years, unless it was the reign of terror in France, 1791. The murders in France were more numerous, but those that were put to death were charged with being aristocrats, despots, foes to the rights of man; while in Kansas, if a man was known to be in favor of the establishment of a free State in that Territory, he was a mark for the assassin's dagger.

Since the organization of that Territory, every right that freemen hold dear has been taken from them. At the first election that was held in the Territory, the actual settlers and residents were driven from the polls by ruffians, villains, and murderers from Missouri and other States of this Union. The rights of the people of the Territory were trampled in the dust. Their ballot-boxes were stuffed with fraudulent votes. Men were elected to the Territorial Legislature who were not residents of the Territory; and if we are to judge of the character of men who constituted that body by the laws that were passed by them, there certainly never has been a meeting of any such fiends in any other place except Pandemonium.

This ruffian band, calling themselves legislators, were no doubt sustained by the Administration. The Army of this great nation was there to back and protect them in trampling upon the rights of the people of that Territory. I say now, that if the actual settlers there had possessed the power to have driven them from the legislative halls by force and violence, they would have been justified in so doing. I would not justify force and violence, and mob law, when there is any legal mode of redressing wrongs; but here there was none. These usurpers obtained their places by force and violence, and if the actual settlers had no other means of defending themselves against the acts of these tyrants, they would have been justified in the sight of God and man if they had taken them from the legislative halls, and hanged them by their necks until they were dead. This legislative body passed the most odious and oppressive laws, laws that would almost rival in cruelty the code of the most absolute despotism now in existence. The Administration appointed wicked and depraved men to office, while this band of usurpers were enacting laws to crush the hearts and lives of the free-State men. The courts of the Territory were running their course of infamy. In a court held there by a judge appointed by the President of the United States, the grand jury, under the charge of the court, presented a hotel as a nuisance. On an order issued from that court, the building was destroyed, the order being executed by a sheriff appointed by the bogus Legislature. The building was first fired upon with cannon, but being too strong to be destroyed that way, it was blown up with powder; and why was this done? for no other reason but because it belonged to free-State men. The house of Governor Robinson was burned because he was a free-State man. These free-State men had wronged no one—they had attempted to wrong no one.

In the mean time Dow, a free-State man, from the State of Ohio, was shot down dead in the public highway, in open day, by a man named Coleman. Dow was guilty of no offense whatever—had given no provocation. It was a cold-blooded, premeditated murder. Yet the murderer has never been punished, or even tried, to this day. But, if I am correctly informed, was rewarded for it, by an appointment as an officer in the Kansas militia. Barber, another free-State man, from the State of Ohio, was murdered by a man named Clark, who, it is said, at the time of committing the murder, was holding the office of Indian agent, under the appointment of the Administration, and is now in the land office in the Territory. Brown, another free-State man from the State of Ohio, was chopped to death with hatchets, and his mangled, bloody, and dying body was taken to his house and thrown into the presence of his wife. The murderers of Brown, I believe, have never been punished, and never even been tried. I have it from a source that I can rely upon, that the town of Osawatimie was burned, a part of the inhabitants were murdered, and the remainder were driven out, houseless and homeless, into the world. Women and tender infants were compelled to lie on the cold, damp ground, and nothing to protect them from the rain and storms but tents made of thin cloth. When this town was burned and destroyed; when its inhabitants were either murdered or driven away from their homes—the Army of this great nation was in sight, the witnesses of these deeds of horror, but did not interfere. Why did it not? Because the power that controlled it did not desire to do so. The Army was not there for any such purpose. It was to protect the slavery party.

But why multiply these cases? Crimes enough have been perpetrated by the slavery party in that Territory, since 1854, to condemn a world. Its path has been marked by crimes the most horrible, and red with human blood. If I believed in special judgments of God, I should expect to hear of sweeping tornadoes, wide wasting earthquakes, deadly plagues, and scathing lightning hurling the perpetrators of these crimes to swift destruction. The crowning act of all these wrongs is now presented in the form of a constitution, to be forced upon the people without their consent. To admit Kansas with a slavery constitution would be a palpable violation of one of the best-established principles of the common law; that is, that no person shall take advantage of his own wrong. The Missouri compromise was repealed to put slavery into Kansas. This was a great wrong, and one for which this nation may yet repent in dust and ashes. To admit Kansas as she is to be presented, this great principle that I have stated, would be violated. I never will consent to do any such thing. The repeal of the Missouri compromise I regard, as I have already said, a great wrong to the North, when there was no necessity for it. I am determined, while I have the honor to hold a place upon this floor, that by no act of mine, shall you ever reap any benefit therefrom.

Before this was done, the South had more territory than the North—they have a decided advantage in soil and climate; more than this, they had therein what they call a heaven-born institution, one that they believed has received the sanction of the Most High—with their rich and productive soil, with their warm and genial sun, with their patriarchal institution of slavery, that has descended in a direct line from Abraham to the people of Georgia, with collateral branches into Missouri and other slave States, they must multiply and become as the stars of the firmament and shine forever and ever. With this institution you will grow up a great and powerful people. When the Yankees come to invade your rights, (as you say they are doing now,) these men that you hold as bondmen, that cannot say their lives are their own, not even if they say it "subject to the Constitution of the United States;" these beings, that are not the owners of the wool that grows on the top of the head—

"The place where the wool ought to grow;"

these persons that we have been so eloquently and vehemently told are so well clothed and so well fed and so joyous and so happy, will no doubt feel sensible of the mighty blessings you have conferred upon them; will be ready to go out to battle for you. These men will, no doubt, willingly lay down their lives; will rejoice in the glorious privilege of suffering martyrdom, in defense of this Heaven-born institution.

But to return to the Lecompton constitution. I will not stop to inquire whether the Territorial Legislature had any power to call a constitutional convention or not. I will deal in no such abstractions. It is sufficient for me to know that it has slavery in it, and that a large majority of the people of the Territory had no part in making the constitution. By the despotic acts of tyrants they were deprived of all power; and as a full and entire refutation of the assertion made upon this floor and elsewhere, that the people of the Territory had a fair opportunity to take a part in framing that constitution. I adopt an extract from the letter of Robert J. Walker, resigning his office as Governor of that Territory, and use it as an argument. On this point, the Governor says:

"On reference to the territorial law, under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly-organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and, therefore, there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties in the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges, in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty, by law, of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and, therefore, they were entirely disfranchised, and could not give, and did not give, a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention.

"And here I wish to call attention to the distinction, which will appear in my inaugural address, in reference to those counties where the voters were fairly registered and did not vote. In such counties, where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry, and no vote was given or could be given, however anxious the people might be to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced, for wherever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention. I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

This must put the question forever at rest. It is unanswered, and is unanswerable. The people of that Territory are now lifting their imploring hands and streaming eyes, and calling upon the Congress of this great nation for relief. It would be no violence to truth to say, that for the last three years the people of that Territory have suffered.

"The spurn of menials:

A despot's vengeance, a false country's curse."

I ask you this day, will you relieve them; or will you enforce this constitution, when you know it will have to be done at the bayonet's point and the cannon's mouth? In such a contest, do you believe that a God of justice, of love, and of mercy could be on your side? As gentlemen on the other side are in the habit of quoting Scripture for their purpose, I will quote some for their consideration: "Reason takes up the language of Scripture, and repeats with earnest conviction," "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked, but he blesseth the habitation of the just."

If this Government persists in its crimes against Kansas, it must suffer the penalty of these national sins. It is one of the irrevocable decrees of God, that for every violation of his laws there is a penalty; and this penalty will come just so certain as the sound of the thunder follows "the lightning's fiery wing." I tell you the day of settlement approaches. If you pass this Lecompton constitution, the low muttering thunder that was heard three years ago in the North and West will break out with tenfold fury. The fires that were then kindled will sweep over the country "like red tongues of demons, to blast and devour." I say to you that the tyrants in Kansas that have trampled the rights of freemen in the dust, whose hands are red with innocent blood, will receive the just reward of their wickedness and their crimes. A weak and wicked Administration may throw its shield around them; but

"Neither men, nor devils, Nor sheltering angels, can protect them."

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. Chairman, the evening before the battle of Talavera, in Spain, the armies of England and France encamped on the opposite banks of a river which, guiltless of human blood, still flowed between them; and the soldiers of each, as the shades of evening hastened on, came quietly down to the brink of the water and filled their canteens in preparation for the gory work of the morrow. Sir, we who have hoped there was to be, and would be, some cessation to fratricidal strife; that we had reached at last the palm tree and the fountain in the great Sahara of political life; and that, in the great principles of the Government as established by law, Patriotism would intrench itself so strongly that we might well bid defiance to a world in arms now find ourselves, as erewhile, ranged along each side of a belligerent line of opposing camps, marked out as distinctly as that gleaming river in Spain which divided the conquerors and the conquered. While the white flag of Peace still flaps in the breeze, let us go down to the limpid stream and quietly drink together, whatever may be the fate of the country.

Sir, I am not here to indulge in any sentiment of obijuration or of reproach. The Representative of a larger white population than any member from Virginia, coming, as I do, from a part of the State jammed up like a wedge between Ohio and Pennsylvania—my people having many precious connections with both—finding amongst my immediate constituents a large mass of northern men, who have built up manufacturing establishments, and devoted their enterprise, energy, and capital to the development of the resources of my native city and State—I profess to speak on all questions here which apparently wear a sectional phase, without one particle of acrimony, but at the same time with the emphasis which is due to the time and the occasion.

Sir, a venerable man, weary with the cares of State; who has been for forty years in the service of his country, at home and abroad; who has illustrated her history in every political department by the high emprise of his statesmanship; with no child to inherit his well-earned fame, but giving to a still united people all his love; with no ambition before him, except to discharge honestly the high functions pertaining to the most majestic position upon earth—is now upon his political trial! On the steps of yonder portico, but a few fleeting months ago, in the presence of assembled thousands of his countrymen, he took a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States; under which it was his imperative duty to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed. At the very outset of his administration the difficulties which surrounded him seemed almost insuperable. Poison, in the covered dish; internecine war; civil strife; geographical prejudice; treason, with its bold, brazen, and defiant front; ambition, with its cool, plotting, unscrupulous schemes; bankruptcy, with the hands of Briareus; throwing curses in his path; sedition, with its ear-kissing arguments; sharp-toothed unkindness, tied as a vulture to his heart, until, like

Lear, deserted by his own kin in the midst of the pitiless storm, he might well say—

"Close pent-up guilts,
Rive your concealing continents, and cry
These dreadful summoners grace. I am a man,
More sinn'd against, than sinning."

Sir, I am not here as his unreasoning advocate. I am not here to prate of blind loyalty to him, or to any other man; but as one of the humblest of those who stood by him in a fiercer trial than this; I shall not submit, come what may, to see him wounded in the house of his friends.

Pass with me, then, sir, from the petty consideration of who shall be Earl of Durham, or who shall be Vicar of Bray—from the heated arena, where mingle the exacerbations and prejudices and passions of the hour—back to the earlier and better days of the Republic, and let us see how far the President can be sustained, either by precedent or by existing law, which he would have been recalcitrant to himself if he had not faithfully enforced.

First, then, of the case and the law. On the 30th day of May, 1854, the Congress of the United States organized the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, both of which did not then contain, exclusive of the aboriginal inhabitants, two hundred human souls. It was provided, "that the State or States created within the same, should be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitutions may prescribe at the time of their admission;" and to that end it was expressly stipulated, "that nothing in the act contained should be construed to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but the people thereof should be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Federal Constitution," and all of us know that the only requirement by that instrument is, that the State constitution shall be republican. That no obstacle might be interposed by Federal authority, and that these ends might be completely attained, the Congress of the United States abnegated the power of making laws for said Territories by anomalously stipulating "that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Federal Constitution, and the provisions of the organic act." Congress even went further than this; for while the right of suffrage was conferred on every actual resident white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, it still further anomalously stipulated that "the qualification of voters, at all subsequent elections, shall be prescribed by the Territorial Assembly."

Up to this period, the practice of this Government, without being uniform, had been, in a majority of cases, first, to create a territorial government; then, to authorize a census of the inhabitants, by Federal authority; and finally, to empower the inhabitants, by what was generally termed an enabling act, to hold a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union; and the time, place, and manner of holding the convention, with the qualification of voters in the election of its delegates, were all specifically prescribed. They became a people only when they organized as a State; before, they were under the legislation of Congress, and were called inhabitants. Their political rights as a people remained, therefore, in abeyance, until they passed into the condition of a State. The passage of this act, apparently changing the territorial policy of Congress, but in reality adopting an old principle, awakened unprecedented opposition. The whole country was convulsed. The dread of Madison was upon us, when he declared with almost prophetic solemnity:

"Should a state of parties arise founded on geographical boundaries, and other physical distinctions, which happen to coincide with them—what is to control those great repulsive masses from awful shocks against each other. If novelties are to be shunned—the most alarming of all novelties, the most wild of all projects, the most rash of all attempts, is that of rending us in pieces, in order to preserve our liberties, and promote our happiness."

The extremes of the Union attempted to influence the future fate of the nascent State. Instead of having, as heretofore, a peaceful emigration to a common Territory, we witnessed the sad spectacle of organized efforts, outside of the Territory itself, to foist into it a population with swords in their hands instead of plowshares and pruning hooks; and intent upon cultivating the enmity of each other instead of tilling the soil that lifted its rich lips up to the husbandman. In the midst of embittered contests the election for members of the Territorial Legislature took place. The result created intense strife, for the stake was too deep to be quietly acquiesced in by either struggling party, and, from that day to this, it has known no cessation. A portion of the people of Kansas have always refused to acknowledge the laws; have always refused to exercise the power of changing them, by voting at the regular elections, until, when the President came into office, he found this fatal inheritance upon him; rebellion actually existing, and advocated, not only against the territorial laws, but against the Federal authority itself, and every effort made to bring about acts of lawlessness and anarchy. Whatever difficulties exist at this hour; whatever may be the complications of the Kansas question, they have all resulted from the systematic and premeditated refusal of a mass of the people to vote at any election, except one established by the territorial laws. An act was passed, submitting to the people whether or not a convention should be called to form a constitution for the State of Kansas; a portion of the people refused to be registered; threw every obstacle in the way of taking a full census; and finally refused to vote at all. The convention met and framed a constitution, and although, by the organic act, that body possessed the power of ordaining and establishing it, it was submitted, in its most material part, to every free white male inhabitant; and for the fifth time a mass again withheld their votes. If those, who thus refused to rest upon their privileges, constitute a majority of the people of Kansas, they cannot now avoid the issue which they have voluntarily and persistently made.

On the one side, therefore, we have a portion of the people of Kansas and the Territorial Legislature, by resolutions now on file among the proceedings of this House, setting up the Topeka constitution, formed by a voluntary assemblage, without law, without even the semblance of law, and against the consent of the established authorities; on the other, we have the Lecompton constitution, created under legal sanction, and supported by a regular succession of legal authority. Both constitutions were submitted to the people; but in each case there was a vast difference in the mode of submission. The Topeka constitution, without permitting a vote on the subject, forever prohibited slavery; and it was presented to the people with the alternative of either voting for it as it stood, or having no State government at all. The Lecompton constitution—embodying all the material parts of the Topeka constitution, constitutional privileges, bill of rights, and all, including the clause prescribing the mode of making amendments after 1864, and affirming merely the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case—was submitted to the people as a constitution with slavery or without slavery, as they might themselves determine. The mere manner of the submission, therefore, specified in the schedule, could not fix upon the people of Kansas a constitution in any essential particular different from the Topeka constitution, except upon the single, isolated question of slavery, which was left to their free decision, so far as they could control it, under the Federal Constitution as expounded by the highest judicial tribunal in the land. On the one side, therefore, we have a legal movement, carried out to a practical result, in deference to judicial authority. On the other side we have the embodiment of loose masses, acting upon what they choose to term organic sovereignty, not only without the sanction of law, but in open defiance of all established authority. We have legality on one side, and lawlessness on the other.

The then existing Legislature of Kansas having empowered a convention of delegates to form a government, with the single condition that the same should be republican, it may become essential to inquire whether, in that view, it is necessary to submit the same to the people for ratification, to give it validity. Can such a constitution be formed by the people of any Territory in defiance of all law, and all existing legal authority? Can they, in primary meetings, without law, by the simple power of numbers, frame a government within an already established government, and, without express legal sanction, overthrow it? Sir, under the principles of our Government, this, whether in a State, or in a Territory, is not reform, it is revolution; and the Federal Government is armed with express power to suppress it, not only by the Constitution, but by the act of 1795. Our fathers anticipated just such questions, from the prevalence of unsound doctrines, as we have had to meet; and it was first proposed in the Federal convention "that a republican constitution, and its existing laws, ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States;" but it was finally modified to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. Now, as the Constitution specifies that the only condition which shall be required of a State, preparatory to admission into the Union, is that her constitution must be a republican one; and as the Constitution specifies the same condition for the continuance of a State in the Union as is required for her admission into it, let us see what that term "republican" means.

Sir, under our system of government everybody knows that the people are the original source of all political power; yet there is no mode for a majority to manifest their will except in conformity with and in subordination to established law. The very objects of constitutions are to limit and define the powers to be exercised by the officers to whom the people may commit the different departments of the government; and the people, by both constitutions and laws, impose restraints upon their own rapacity, violence, and passions; and the majority, not less than the minority, are bound by all, until a legal and constitutional change is made. It was well said by Madison, in the debates in the Virginia Convention, on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that—

"The turbulence, violence, and abuse of power by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions, and these, in republics, more than any other cause, have produced despotism. If we go over the whole history of ancient and modern republics, we shall find their destruction to have generally resulted from those causes. If we consider the peculiar condition of the United States, and go to the sources of that diversity of sentiment which pervades its inhabitants, we shall find great danger to fear that the same causes may terminate, here in the same fatal effects which they produced in those republics."

Sir, according to the principles of our Government, it is the majority of votes given at any prescribed election, and not the votes withheld by the people, which must determine the result. The Constitution of the United States might have been adopted and put in operation by a minority of the whole people. A minority of the people of the United States may elect a President. A minority of the people may forever prevent all amendment to that instrument. A minority of the people of any State may adopt the constitution if a majority prove derelict to their duties and refuse to vote. Not less than seven States of this Union, whose constitutions have been submitted to the people within the last twenty years, are now organized by a minority; and I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this pregnant fact, for, as in the case of that State, if the care is taken to compare the vote cast against the constitution, and then estimate and add to it the vote which was not given at all, it will be found in every instance that the aggregate outnumbers the vote which was given in the affirmative. The last constitution of Pennsylvania was adopted in the year 1836 by a minority of the whole people of Pennsylvania. And yet you talk to me of popular sovereignty. Such was the case in Virginia. The last constitution of Virginia is the act of a minority of the people, if you estimate the number of votes cast in the regular State election. All our experience proves that the vote given upon the ratification or rejection of any State constitution is relatively smaller than the vote cast at any excited political election. The reason possibly may be that the fundamental principles of our Government are so well settled that one State constitution is merely the reflex or transcript of another; and the people feel stronger the necessity of selecting proper men to carry out those principles, than they do in the mere elemental enunciation of the principles themselves.

Sir, the whole theory of our Government proceeds upon the assumption that the people cannot be in default, or derelict to themselves, because the power, subject to legal restrictions, is always in their own hands. After a constitution has been put in operation, they are estopped from resorting to any means to disturb it, except the legal means; and using these, and these alone, they can only remedy the consequences of their own folly in abstaining from voting, or in absenting themselves from the polls. These undeniable truths have a direct application in the case now before us; and for that reason I ask that three editorials from the Herald of Freedom, the organ of the Republican party in Kansas, may be published herewith as appendix No. 1.

The great American idea—that which distinguishes this from all other Governments which have ever existed—consists in the exercise of the powers of the people by delegation or representation. While popular sovereignty, acting by majorities, must act under the laws, it is precisely because the people cannot act in mass that the right to choose a representative is each citizen's portion of organic sovereign power. Before the will of the people be ascertained, the law must prescribe the mode and the manner in which that will shall be designated and expressed. If any portion of the people, it boots not why, do not choose to avail themselves of their own rights under the law, they must necessarily and unavoidably be governed by those who do. Any other liberty than this is not American liberty; it is Parisian liberty; it is Mexican liberty. The operation of our system under these restrictions becomes harmonious and beautiful; and the ballot-box with us becomes as infallible as the magic box of the enchanter, which healed every wound and cured every disease.

The American distinction between a convention and a Legislature implies only a difference in power and authority. A Legislature can act under a constitution; and it is the only competent body to call a convention to change it. Through these mediums the whole power and majesty of the people are as fully exercised as if each man were present as an active participator. It is, indeed, the percolation of the will of the people through the Legislature, and thence through a convention, that, like the filtration of water through porous stones, clears and purifies it. The people can exercise no act of supremacy or legislation at all, except by assembling all in a mass convention of the whole State, and taking the vote by the head, or by chosen representatives. As the first is impossible, the last became here the grand advanced idea in politics; and the exercise of individual sovereignty was made to consist in the choice of representatives, with such powers as the people decided to give them. The very power competent to bind the people in other respects is competent to bind them in the formation of a constitution. The idea of resubmission to the people themselves of a constitution for ratification or rejection, or legislative acts which they had expressly authorized, was not the idea of republicanism at the era of the Revolution, nor at the time the Federal Constitution was formed. That great instrument, the most majestic product of intellect in the world, is not the work of the people of the Union, as a whole or as an aggregate mass. There is no provision anywhere in it, nor no law passed under it, nor no stipulation by the Federal convention, by which it was possible to ascertain whether a majority of the whole people of the United States, counted by numbers, were in favor of it or not. John Adams, in one of his letters to Jay, says if it had been submitted directly to the people, it would have been voted down. It came very near being defeated in several of the State conventions by the delegates of the people who were empowered to consider it. It was the discussion and scrutiny of deliberative bodies which saved it, to throw its broad blessings over this continent. Four of the present States of this Union, containing a majority of the whole population, could have rejected the Constitution, and yet it would have been binding as a Constitution of the United States upon the nine States which ratified it, containing a minority of the people.

The Declaration of Independence itself, was not the act of the people, counting by the head. That great deed which changed our relations to the whole world, never was submitted to the people. It was the work of delegates appointed by a convention in each of the colonies, each colony acting for itself. They were vested with a general grant of power, "to consent and agree to all measures which said Congress shall deem necessary to obtain redress for American grievances." They announced themselves as acting as the representatives of the United States, in general Congress assembled, when they appealed to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of their intentions. Rhode Island existed from the Revolution up to 1842, under a royal charter from Charles II., granted in 1663. But from the first colonial constitution, formed by Virginia 5th July, 1776, down to the last of the original Thirteen, not one of them was submitted to the people; but their delegates, in convention assembled, ordained and established them, in compliance with the plenary powers granted to them by the people themselves, or the Legislature. In the case of Maryland, whose constitution was adopted on the 14th of August, 1776, it was expressly provided that nothing in this form of government which relates to the eastern shore particularly, shall at any time hereafter be altered, unless for the alteration and confirmation thereof at least two thirds of all the members of each branch of the General Assembly shall concur.

But the principle for which we are contending may be made at once apparent by the case of Rhode Island, the merits of which were brought before the Supreme Court, in the trial of Luther vs. Borden. Voluntary meetings of the people, without the consent of the existing charter government, or any law for the purpose, were held, and resulted in the choice of delegates to form a new constitution to be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. Those who were opposed to the mode took no part in the proceedings, and refused to vote. The delegates thus chosen met in convention, and submitted their work to the people under voting qualifications and officers prescribed by themselves. Those who were opposed to the proceedings, again refused to vote. On the returns of the election, however, the convention declared that the constitution was adopted by a majority of the people of the State, and attempted to put it in operation by elections for all officers to serve under it, and the new government was accordingly organized, and came in direct conflict with the old one, which had never received the sanction of the people by a direct vote, although they had lived under it for two hundred years. The convention proceeded upon the general principles that the sovereignty of the people is supreme, and may act in forming government against an already existing government without law; and that they are the sole judges of the form of government best calculated to promote their own happiness. The result was, the two governments were brought into the necessity of deciding the contest by arms, as must be the case in every instance of the kind. The charter government was sustained, and the Legislature under it—the only competent body—called a convention, and a constitution was formed by it which is now in operation.

A republican constitution, then, means a system of fundamental rules, principles, and ordinances, for the government of a State or nation, formed and adopted under legal restraints and with legal sanction. This was the idea of our fathers. This is the idea embodied in the Federal compact.

Sir, this doctrine of the people acting in mass upon primary organic sovereignty, is found practically exemplified nowhere, on the face of this globe, but in the single canton of Appenzel, in Switzerland, where, in the midst of the eternal glaciers, all the males over twenty-one years meet semi-annually to legislate, each with arms in his hands! France, in the wildest, bloodiest, period of her revolution, had it; and it found its fittest exemplification when its great prototype and advocate, Marat, proposed a Dictator, with a cannon ball chained to his leg, that he might always be in the power of the people; or, when the infuriated mob gathered at the foot of the guillotine, and like human ghouls and vampires, lapped up the warm blood which streamed beneath the glittering blade! Our system was expressly formed to guard against these dire results. Shall we countenance a principle which must inevitably leave it in ruins? Shall we, shall this Union, countenance a principle which will plunge us into all of the excesses of the wildest period of the French revolution?

On the adoption of the Federal Constitution by the States, their constitutions remained the same; and they were changed from time to time only in the mode therein prescribed. Sir, the very principle of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, and the issue now presented to the country by the Le-compton constitution, was embodied in the case of Vermont, before the Constitution of the United States was formed, and under the old Articles of Confederation. Vermont was the first State admitted into the Union. Her present existence dates back to the year 1791. Ten years before, in June, 1781, the existing Legislature of Vermont proposed terms of union to the American Congress. She was, at that time, and for many years afterwards, involved in contests with New Hampshire and New York, in regard to jurisdiction and boundaries of land; for then, as now, increased empire brought, as it always brings, multiplied perplexities. Congress refused the proffer, without the consent of the coterminous States, and assumed the prerogative of legislating upon the rights of Vermont, and controlling her local government, without her consent. On the 9th day of January, 1783, Governor Chittenden replies, on the part of the Legislature, in one of the most characteristic State papers on record. As it is not generally accessible, I beg leave to append hereto an extract from it, and from the address of the General Assembly of Vermont, in the form of an appendix, marked No. 2. In both of these documents the ground is taken that Congress cannot exercise any other than delegated authority; that they have no right to interfere in the internal police or government of any Territory or State; that they have not the right to make or unmake States, within or without the Union. They avow that such a power involves the whole doctrine of Great Britain in regard to the Colonies; and they declare, when they are called upon to abrogate the laws of Vermont, reverse the solemn decisions of her courts of justice, and overthrow the whole civil government, they think themselves justified to God and the world when they say they cannot comply with such requisitions!

Sir, these bold words come down to us from the most northern State of this Union; from the turmoils and carnage of the Revolution, to act as a talisman of safety in the very arena of fratricidal bitterness and geographical strife. It is well, therefore, to go back to the spirit and sentiments of these pioneers of the Green Mountains, who, in the midst of an American war with Great Britain, the dependency of Canada on their northern border, and thus, with the strongest motives to make common cause against the Confederacy which formed her southern lines, and with which then there was a subsisting controversy, yet had enough of enduring valor to maintain untainted the true republican principle in the face of almost irresistible temptations. Honor, all honor, sir, to such heroism wherever it may be found, and come from what quarter it may! It has in it the soul of Ethan Allen!

Sir, considering the position of that State this moment, so far as the policy advocated by her on this floor may be indicative of her sentiments, I point back to her earlier and better era with peculiar exultation. The principle to which she adhered then, carried out by her now, would make her—

"As glorious as the British Queen renowned,
Who sucked the poison from her husband's wound!"

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the course of remark the gentleman is pursuing; but I desire that he shall mark this great difference between Vermont and Kansas: that Vermont was never a colony of Great Britain, nor was she ever a Territory of this Union.

Mr. CLEMENS. Vermont belonged to the existing colonies of New Hampshire and New York. What is the record? The record is, that this claim, set up by the people of Vermont, was never acknowledged by this Government, and she came into the Union only with the consent of New Hampshire and New York. I am glad the gentleman has made the interruption. I was endeavoring to show that the whole action of this Government, in regard to its territorial policy, maintained the doctrine that the legally existing powers at the time were acknowledged, that their rights were maintained, and I was bringing this result to a practical exemplification in the case of Kansas. I thank the gentleman for his opportune interruption.

Sir, I take the doctrines of Vermont, laid down before, long before, her native son, now the cynosure of the great West, was born, and find, in her example, a sufficient rebuke to the vagaries of the hour. It required no enabling act to bring her into the Union. Her constitution was established in 1777 by a convention authorized "to form a government." But the act was silent as to the ratification of the same by the people; and the convention, therefore, under the plenary power given, ordained it at once, without submission. The gentleman from Vermont sits this very moment upon this floor under the action of that convention. He is bound by it to this hour, because there has been, from that day to this, a regular succession of legal authority recognized by the Federal Government. In 1791 a convention was called by the Vermont Legislature to decide upon the expediency of her entering the Federal Union. The convention determined favorably the question. They ratified the Constitution of the United States, and applied to Congress by petition for admission. On the presentation of the constitution, which had been adopted in 1777, thirteen years before, on the 4th day of March, 1791, Vermont was admitted into the Union.

Sir, what was the case with Kentucky, which came next in order? Previous to 1789, nine different conventions had been held in Danville, to determine upon the contest between the mother, Virginia, and the daughter, Kentucky; and each one seems to have been attended with a bitterness more and more intensified. While this strife was still going on, the Federal Constitution was adopted, and Kentucky was placed in new relations to the existing Government. Great ferment prevailed. Discord among the people ran riot. Four conventions were held in quick succession. Separation from Virginia by violent means was openly proposed; partisan leaders, with their bands of marauders, devastated the Territory; all law was set at defiance, and civil war seemed almost inevitable. If those who conceive the scenes in Kansas for the last few years have been without a parallel, will not investigate the intestine feuds in Kentucky—the combinations against the laws and rightful authority of Virginia—and the same state of things in what is now Tennessee, against the Government of North Carolina, it will be found, that, now as then, human nature is still the same; and that when bodies of men determine to place themselves in rebellion against existing forms of society, specious pretenses will always be found to delude the people. In the face of all efforts to the contrary, the rightful authority of Virginia was maintained by herself and the Federal Government, till, on the 18th day of December, 1789, Virginia, as the only competent legal authority, passed a law so remarkable in its provisions that I must now be content with the briefest possible abstract, and affix the whole hereto in an Appendix, as No. 3.

The law provides for two conventions; one a provisional convention to determine on the expediency of separating from Virginia, with authority to fix upon a day after the 1st day of November, 1791, when the laws of the State should cease to operate. The authority, however, to supersede the jurisdiction of Virginia was made dependent upon the assent of the United States to the erection of said State, which was required to be given after the 1st day of November, or some convenient time thereafter. This convention was armed with power to take measures for the election of another convention, on some day before the authority of Virginia should cease, and after the 1st day of November, 1791, "with full power to frame and establish a fundamental constitution of government." Congress, by an act passed February 4, 1792, recite the act of Virginia and refer to the fact that a convention of delegates have petitioned Congress to consent that on the 1st day of June, 1792, Kentucky should be formed into a new State and received into the Union; and in conformity thereto, the act provides that Kentucky shall at that time be admitted. Here was a case in which the consent of Congress was given without any State constitution having been formed at all, at the time the act was passed; for, in compliance with the law of Virginia and the authority given to the second convention, the constitution of Kentucky was not formed till the 19th of April, 1792, after the act of Congress had been passed. The authority given by the Legislature of Virginia was construed by its terms to be plenary and complete, and the convention which formed the constitution of Kentucky, established the same without submitting it to the people. In this case, as in every other, since the foundation of the Government, the lawful authorities were maintained and supported by actual legislation.

The admission of California, even, with an inadequate population, under a convention called together by a general of the Army of the United States, surrounded by his officers and his camp, and who might have carried out the congruity, and written his civil proclamation, calling a constitutional convention, on a drum-head, was not an exception, although, as the gentleman from Mississippi has so well intimated, the wild cattle of the plains were lassoed and brought into the Union under quasi legal authority; for it was claimed that the right to govern was correlative to the right of acquiring territory, and the government under conquest and military authority was, for the time being, from the very necessities of the case, competent and lawful. Sir, this whole question was presented in the self-styled Republic of Frankland, now the State of Tennessee. In 1784, a convention of delegates elected by the people, without law, and without the consent of North Carolina, (within whose jurisdiction the territory was,) met at Jonesborough and formed a constitution. Under this, an Assembly met and elected John Sevier, Governor, together with judges, and all other State officers, civil and military. This constitution was the Topeka constitution of the time. All dependence upon North Carolina was denied, and they absolved themselves from her sovereignty and jurisdiction. In 1785, Governor Martin, of North Carolina, issued his proclamation and protested against all these proceedings. The contest continued, and like the Isallicon, which flows through laurel, grew bitter as it ran. William Cocke was sent to the Continental Congress, with a constitution adopted by a convention of the people of Frankland, and applied to have the same admitted into the Union. Congress utterly disregarded the application. Why, gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber, why? Because it was made against all legal authority, and without the sanction of North Carolina, the only competent authority to act. Two empires were then exerted over the same unhappy people at the same time, as in Kansas now. Double courts were held in each county, one by judges appointed by the State of Frankland, the other by North Carolina. The stoutest, most resolute, and courageous man was appointed sheriff; taxes were levied by both Governments, and paid to neither; courts were broken up; records stolen; and anarchy and civil war disturbed all the relations of society. This fearful strife continued for two years, till September, 1787, when the people, by delegates sent to the General Assembly of North Carolina, at Tarborough, were glad to resume their allegiance to North Carolina. She pursued towards her prodigal sons a noble policy; and on the 25th of February, 1790, ceded to the United States all her territory west of the eastern boundary of Tennessee; and Congress, by the act of the 2d of April, 1790, accepted the grant, and agreed to place the territory under the operation of the ordinance of 1787, with the exception of a primary stipulation in the deed of cession from North Carolina, that the slaves in the State should not be emancipated. On the 11th of February, 1795, the Territorial Legislature authorized a census to be taken, and directed the Governor to recommend to the people, upon a day to be fixed by him, to elect in the manner prescribed by law five persons in each county as delegates to a convention "for the purpose of forming a constitution and permanent government." In conformity with the power thus given, the convention ordained and established the constitution, and it was never submitted to the people as that was not required by the organic act. The Governor, William Blount, certified to Congress, that the number of inhabitants exceeded the quota fixed by the ordinance of 1787, and submitted, by a special messenger, the constitution which had been formed, and claimed the right to be admitted as a State. Washington committed the whole subject, in a special message, to Congress, in which he inferentially accedes to the right, without making any substantive recommendation; and on the first day of June, 1790, Tennessee was admitted into the Union.

How was it with Ohio, referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHORTER] this morning, but not fully stated? Congress, by the act of April 30, 1802, authorized the inhabitants of the eastern division, northwest of the river Ohio, "to form for themselves a constitution and a State government." Here, for the first time, Congress took the initiative, and usurped power heretofore exercised by the Territorial Legislature; established the qualifications, time, and mode of electing delegates to the constitutional convention; fixed Chillicothe as the place for the meeting; and offered to the convention certain propositions in regard to the public lands, which, if accepted by it, were to be obligatory upon the United States; thus distinguishing between the convention and the people. This act occasioned extreme opposition, not only from these terms, but because Congress disposed of the territory lying north of a line drawn east and west through the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, and contrary to the ordinance of 1787. As the people of Michigan were opposed to this policy, and could have defeated the convention if they had been retained, to render congressional usurpation effectual, Michigan was united to Indiana Territory, and subsequently was separately organized.

The opposition to these measures was deep and implacable; and the whole spirit and principles which were involved, may be seen by the remarks, in the House of Representatives, by Mr. Fearing, the then Delegate from the Territory; by Mr. Griswold, of Connecticut, and by resolutions unanimously passed at Dayton, Ohio, in September, 1802, all of which I hereto affix for publication, as Appendix No. 4. As one of the Dayton resolutions embodies and states the whole question with remarkable clearness and precision, I must here give it, as a complete enunciation of the very law of Kansas which is now in controversy:

"We consider that the late law of Congress for the admission of this Territory into the Union, as far as it relates to the calling of a convention and regulating the election of its members, is an act of legislative usurpation of power properly the province of the Territorial Legislature, bearing a striking similarity to the course of Great Britain imposing laws on the Provinces. We view it as unconstitutional; as a bad precedent, and unjust and partial as to the representation in the different counties."

In the face of these protestations, the convention met, and, in the exercise of the plenary power "to form a constitution and State government," ordained and established the constitution, and absolutely refused, by a vote of 27 yeas to 7 nays, to submit the same for ratification. The official action of the convention, taken from its journals, will be published herewith, as Appendix No. 5.

By the provisions of the Kansas bill, as heretofore referred to, Congress transferred to the Territorial Legislature whatever powers it possessed, and expressly stipulated that the authority of that Legislature should extend to all rightful subjects of legislation. Is not the act of taking a census a rightful subject of legislation? Is not the law submitting to the people the question of calling a constitutional convention a rightful subject of legislation? Is not the calling of the convention itself a rightful subject of legislation? Are not the qualifications of its members, and the powers to be intrusted to them, and the place of meeting, rightful subjects of legislation? Is not the punishment of frauds upon the elective franchise, a rightful subject of legislation?

If, then, Congress has abnegated all these material matters, and left them to territorial legislation, no power remains to pass an enabling act, or to interfere with the mode fixed by law, for the people to govern themselves, because Congress cannot resume the exercise of the renounced authority, without intervening, defeating, and by its very act, repealing the law organizing the Territory itself. If frauds have been committed, the territorial authorities are the proper tribunals to investigate and punish them. Congress possesses no power, by the Constitution, to act as an inquisitorial body upon the exercise of the right of suffrage, either upon the part of the people of a State or a Territory; except so far as it relates to the qualifications and returns of its own members. Any other doctrine than this is the doctrine of the Republican party, as enunciated in their Philadelphia platform, that "the Constitution confers upon Congress absolute, unrestricted, and sovereign power, over the Territories, for their government, and not upon the people." But, if anything were wanting to corroborate this view of the question, it can be supplied by another section of the Kansas act already quoted, and so ably referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi, which looks beyond the existence of the Territory as a Territory, and anticipates its existence as a State. By the operation of a fundamental stipulation, no further proceedings on the part of Congress are rendered necessary, than the simple recognition of the State itself, and the admission of the same into the Union, with a republican constitution. This is non-intervention—this is the very gist of the Kansas act, and any other policy will be found to be beset with difficulties, not only formidable but insuperable.

Sir, whence comes it that the submission of a constitution to the people for ratification or rejection, is considered necessary to its republicanism? Our fathers did not act upon that doctrine; and I have felt curious to ascertain under what circumstances the policy was inaugurated. After very considerable research, I have found the first example, and like all novelties in American politics of late years, it comes from a State that has always been a leading power in the North—from Massachusetts—a State that has never been without a majestic share of the political control of this Government, wielded sometimes for good and sometimes for evil. From the commencement of the Government there has been a struggle between the principles of Virginia and the principles of Massachusetts; the first, confining the Federal authority to the sphere of delegated powers; the last, dilating that authority beyond proper scope and limits, and ending in legislative usurpations and legislative despotism. In the State of Maine, (then a part of Massachusetts,) on the 5th day of October, 1785, thirty-three delegates appeared at Falmouth, elected by the people without authority of law, and organized themselves into a convention for the purpose of considering whether they would erect themselves into a separate State. The Governor of Massachusetts protested against these proceedings, precisely as the Governor of North Carolina had done, and which we have already explained; but notwithstanding this, three more conventions were held. The last ordered a vote to be taken of the people, for or against the movement; the returns to be made to the president of the convention. A vote was taken; the people pronounced in favor of separation; but from 1785 up to 1819, no action resulted from it, until the rightful authority of Massachusetts was exerted. In that year, on the 19th of June, the Legislature passed an act for the separation of Maine, and for forming the same into a separate State. The act prescribes the qualification of voters; provides "that a majority of the votes returned to the president of the convention shall determine the question of the adoption or rejection of the constitution;" for while it was made the duty of the convention to form a constitution of government, the delegates were required to submit it to the people; and all those authorized to vote for delegates were required "to give a vote in writing," expressing approbation or disapprobation of the constitution so prepared. The act went further than this; for it conferred on the president of the convention all the powers of the Governor and Council of Massachusetts, until a new Governor could be chosen. It will be found in full, in the second volume of Massachusetts laws.

This was the first example in American politics, so far as my researches have gone, in which a constitution was directly submitted to the vote of the people. It proceeded upon the correct and unquestionable principle that it is competent for the people to limit the authority of their own agents and representatives in electing them; and it is for this very reason they are bound when plenary powers are given. In this sense, the Leecompton convention having full authority to ordain and establish a constitution by the organic act, it was not necessary to submit the constitution to the people at all; and the mode of submission adopted in the schedule is therefore free from all the objections which have been urged against it, because, in submitting it to the people as a constitution with slavery, or as a constitution without slavery, the convention in effect ordained and established it as a fundamental form of government, which they had by law a right to do, and left the only element of distraction to be decided at the polls. In every constitution since that of Maine, submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, no discretion has been left to the delegates to the convention; but they have been required, by the act creating them, to refer their work to popular supervision. Louisiana herself is not an exception; for although the law calling her last convention embraced the power only of proposing amendments to the constitution, the new one was submitted as a whole, because the convention, instead of remodeling, revolutionized the whole structure of the government.

Mr. BURROUGHS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLEMENS. I beg leave to ask the unanimous consent of the House to finish what I have to say.

Several MEMBERS. Go on; no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist on the observance of the rule.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the gentleman from Virginia have leave to publish his remarks.

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to let me have five minutes longer. My argument is incomplete, and it is but an act of justice that I should be allowed to complete it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The committee has no right to suspend the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I am entirely willing that the gentleman shall be allowed to finish his speech out of my time.

Mr. CLEMENS. I thank the gentleman from New York; and I will remember his courtesy another time.

In Pennsylvania, by act of the 29th March, 1836, a convention was called to propose amendments to the constitution, to be submitted to the people thereof, for their ratification or rejection. Wisconsin, by an act calling a convention, January 31, 1846, required the constitution to be submitted; and Congress carried out this fundamental condition, in admitting the State into the Union, by exacting the assent of the qualified electors, as prescribed by the organic law of the Territorial Legislature. This was not, therefore, a precedent on the part of Congress, but a simple affirmation of the restraints imposed on the convention by the representatives of the people. Iowa presents a case precisely similar. By the act of the Territorial Legislature, passed January 17, 1846, the convention were authorized to submit the constitution to the qualified voters of the Territory; and Congress, in the act admitting Iowa, required a compliance with this cardinal provision. In Virginia, by act of March 18, 1850, it was made the duty of the president of the convention to certify a copy of the constitution to the General Assembly, that a law might be passed for taking the sense of the good people of the Commonwealth thereon. The act in regard to Minnesota—passed February 26, 1857, under the patronage of a prominent Republican, and a present member of this House—was the first instance in the history of the Government where Congress required a constitution to be submitted to the people of a proposed State, where they, through their Territorial Legislature, did not themselves exact it.

The act in question was passed by the Republican party, and was a violation of the established principle of leaving the people of a Territory perfectly free to form their government in their own way, because they might have preferred to vest that power in delegates or representatives. But they were deprived of that liberty, and compelled to test the constitution by a vote at the polls. The result has been, that we have had two separate conventions in Minnesota, and each one endeavored to outstrip the other in the radicalism of its enactments, with a view to a popular triumph. Here, then, we find the true line of demarkation between Republicanism of the Revolution and that of our day; and instead of forming, by high-minded men, stable governments for posterity, we have had constitutions changed like the horns of the moon, and whole States gravely proposing to determine, by the vote of a mere majority at the polls, whether a white man was not in every respect equal to an African negro. Sir, we are verging every hour into the excesses of an unbridled popular licentiousness, which, in the hallowed name of the people, is repudiating the judgments of the highest courts in the land; breaking through all constitutional restraints, and destroying all the checks and balances our fathers formed, and which they presumed would be sufficient to protect the rights of every citizen. When the greatest city on the American continent can be convulsed with the cry of a starving people for bread, lifting up their parched lips in despair to the dull skies for life and nourishment, how far are we off from that Parisian liberty which takes blood when it cannot find a bone? Sir, in this respect, the people can act in mass, and in such cases they always act from their worst instincts and passions. The law is the barrier which keeps both back; and the President has occupied, in this respect, a position which has tested the Spartan heroism of his character. If for one single day he had faltered in the stern discharge of his duty; if he had for a single day countenanced the violence and outrage and anarchy of those who set every duty of the good citizen at defiance, to attain their reckless ends, we should at this hour have been at the mercy of a promiscuous mob, headed by a lawless, profligate militia general in buckram, with all the temerity of Bob Acres, without any of his convenient virtues.

But to drop this digression, and to resume the argument. In all those cases where constitutions have not been submitted, the organic act, authorizing the election of delegates and defining their powers, did not require it. The same feeling, however, which has been displayed in favor of popular submission, has found vent in another direction, and a few years ago came very near transforming State Legislatures into mere tribunals to propose laws, instead of bodies to make and enforce them. The theory that it was necessary to give validity to State laws by submitting them to the people at the polls, was at one time so popular that it became part of the policy of a score of States in this Union. It was at its fullness about the time the temperance reform first became a political question. The first case I have found is that of Rice vs. Foster, (4 Harrington's Delaware Reports, 479,) a full abstract of which will be found in Appendix No. 6. The case arose under a law of Delaware authorizing the people to decide by ballot whether license to retail liquors shall be permitted among them. The court decided that the law was unconstitutional; that, as the legislative power was vested in a General Assembly, the people had divested themselves of all legislative authority; and that they can resume it only in the forms of the constitution, or by revolution. The same principle, arising under similar laws, will be found decided in Pennsylvania, 6 Barr's Reports, 507; in Indiana, in Maise vs. the State, 4 Porter, 343; and in a very able obiter dictum by Judge Spalding, in Griffith vs. the Commissioners of Crawford county, 20 Ohio Reports, by Lawrence, 609. So far, indeed, did this grave error proceed, that the great State of Ohio had to insert a substantive inhibition against it in her last constitution.

Now, I have endeavored to show that a convention and a Legislature were almost convertible terms; one making the supreme law, the other making laws subordinate to it, and enforcing the means to carry them into practical operation. If, therefore, after the people have vested their power of making laws in a Legislature, they are incompetent to resume the authority they have delegated, except according to the ordinary routine of government, on what principle, pray, does the doctrine rest, that, after authority has been given to form a State government to a convention, the work of that convention must be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection?

Sir, I would gladly elaborate this point, as well as enlarge on others which press themselves on my attention; but the inexorable, Procrustean hour rule of this House forbids it, and I must unwillingly draw these remarks to a close.

Sir, we are in the very Thermopylae of this Republic. Evil signs and portents are around us. Patriotism has grown to be a timorous feeling, clinging like an unfledged bird to the nest of twigs where it was born. Broad, comprehensive statesmanship, heroic political daring, the courage to face the buffalo herd rushing blindly on to the precipice, when an iron hand and arm might have turned all back, has given place to the covert chicanery of the Hindoo Brahmin, hugging to his bosom his blind idols at home; or to the pitfalls and corrals of the Sooders in the jungle, who capture the elephant by low stealth, rather than by open prowess. The President has done his duty fearlessly. What the country wants is some man who can, in the future, dare defeat on principle; and who, in the immortal declaration of Clay, "would rather be right than be President;" and not the facile trimmer that, like a small pennant on the top of a mast, always shows which way the prevailing wind blows.

Men of the North! Democrats of the North! the power is in your hands! How do you intend to use it? How many of you can afford to stand forth at this dark hour, as muezzins upon the watch-tower, and cry out that "all is well?" Oregon is yours; Minnesota is yours; Washington is yours; Nebraska is yours; Utah is yours; and Kansas and Dacotah must be yours! While I speak, the line of your advancing population is filing along the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and planting in the midst of the wilderness new empires. For you, there is the full fruition and the triumphant result. For us, there only lingers a naked principle:

"A barren scepter in our gripe,
Thence to be wrenched with an unlineal hand,
No son of ours succeeding!"

Remember the language of Napoleon to one of your own countrymen:

"As a citizen of the world, I would address your country. Every man, and every nation, is ambitious; and ambition grows with power, as the blaze of a vertical sun is the most fierce. Cherish, therefore, a national strength. Fortify your political institutions. Remember that armies and navies are of the same use in the world as the police in London or Paris, and soldiers are not made like potter's vessels, in a minute. Cultivate union, or your empire will be, like a colossus of gold fallen on the earth and broken to pieces, the prey of foreign and domestic Saracens. If you are wise, your Republic will be permanent, and perhaps Washington will be hailed as the founder of a happy and glorious empire, when the name of Bonaparte shall be obscured by succeeding revolutions!"

Shall we have this, or shall we have that other picture so powerfully delineated in the Bible:

"The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them. And they said unto the olive tree 'reign thou over us.' But the olive tree said unto them, 'should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honor God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?' And the trees said to the fig tree, 'come thou and reign over us.' But the fig tree said unto them, 'should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?' Then said the trees unto the vine, 'come thou and reign over us.' And the vine said unto them, 'should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?' Then said all the trees unto the bramble, 'come thou and reign over us.' And the bramble said unto the trees, 'if in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon!'"

Extracts from the Herald of Freedom.

"THE KANSAS ELECTION.—In order to show the fallacy of the allegation that there will be civil war in Kansas, should the State be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, we clip the following articles from the Herald of Freedom, of the 16th, the leading Republican paper of the Territory. It will be seen that so far from resistance, the better class of the Republicans expect and desire admission under that instrument:

"THE SLOTS RESPONSIBLE.—Mr. Pugh, from Ohio, has introduced a bill in the Senate for the immediate admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, and providing that the Legislature of the State may make provision for submitting a vote on the slavery clause again to the people. It is believed that this bill, or that of Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, will become the law. Indeed, nearly all our friends writing us from Washington, say there is but little doubt of the result that our admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution has become a fixed fact; that the result is almost as certain as if we were now within the Union. If Kansas does come into the Union in this manner, and is made a slave State, as a consequence, the Slots, and the dogs in the manger who would not vote, nor let their friends vote, shall bear the censure."

"Had the Free-State party consulted their best interests instead of standing on etiquette, as they did in June last, they would have 'pitched in' and elected every delegate to the constitutional convention. Then, if they had wanted the Topeka constitution as their fundamental law, they could have clothed it with legal sanction, so far as appearances are concerned, and now we could have been half way out of the woods, instead of being surrounded with difficulties, which, at times, seem insurmountable. We have a long chapter to write on this subject, some day, that will put a different face on this statement from that now seen by many of our readers."

"During the last week several gentlemen have inquired what we would advise, in case we have been so fortunate as to obtain possession of the government by the election of the Legislature, and Congress should admit us into the Union under the Lecompton constitution? We have replied, in each instance, that as soon as the Legislature is convened under that instrument, without stopping to make any other enactments, or doing any other thing than to organize the law-making power, we would have them pass a law, enabling the people to elect delegates at an early day, to a new constitutional convention, throwing every necessary guard around the ballot-box, to insure fairness in the elections. This done, the people should elect delegates, and a new constitution, such as the people desire, should be framed, and submitted to them for adoption or rejection."

"If adopted, State officers should be immediately elected under it, and they should be permitted to enter at once upon the duties of their respective offices. This, we are happy to say, was the position of the convention which put in nomination the Anti-Usurpation State ticket at the late election, and agreeably to the request of which nominations were made in the various legislative and senatorial districts all over the Territory. In proof of this, we copy the third resolution of the convention, in the following words:

Resolved, That the candidates nominated by this convention, on accepting such nomination, will be considered as pledged, should the constitution be adopted by Congress, to adopt and execute immediate measures for enabling the people, through a new constitutional convention, to obtain such a constitution as the majority shall approve."

Governor Childsden.

"Congress, it is presumed, will not pretend to unlimited power, or to any other than what has been delegated to them from the United States; nor will they pretend that their Articles of Confederation will warrant them in interfering with or controlling the internal police of the United States. Whence did they obtain any rightful prerogative over the internal police of this State, from which they have never received any delegated power? The same argument against the right of Great Britain to tax the American Colonies at pleasure without representation, will apply against the right of Congress to control the civil authority of this State; for if they may in one instance do it, they may in another, till they suppress the whole."

The General Assembly of Vermont, through the Speaker, to Congress.

"By the resolutions of August, 1781, Congress have acknowledged the right and independence of the State of Vermont, on a preliminary condition; and all and every act of Congress which interferes with the internal government of Vermont, or tends to prevent a general exercise of her laws, are unjustifiable in their nature, and repugnant to every idea of freedom. We conceive that the several States in the Union do not owe to Congress their existence; but that each State was formed by the association and civil compact of its inhabitants. Through this medium they derive their separate rights to jurisdiction, and Congress the different powers they are vested with; and have, of course, neither the power nor the right to make or unmake States within or without the Union, or to control their internal police, without a power delegated to them for the purpose. We are still ready to comply with every reasonable requisition of Congress; but when they require us to abrogate our laws, reverse the solemn decisions of our courts of justice, and overthrow our civil government in favor of insurgents and disturbers of the public peace, we think ourselves justified to God and the world, when we say we cannot comply with such requisitions."

The law of Virginia of the 18th of December, prescribes the qualification of voters, and the election of members to a convention to erect an independent State, out of the district of Kentucky. It gives the said convention "full power and authority to frame and establish a fundamental constitution of government," for said State, upon certain conditions, specified in said act. It provided that a convention should be held at Danville on the 26th day of July, 1790, with power to choose officers, &c., and to determine whether "it be the will of the people" to create an independent State. Five members assembled were sufficient to adjourn from day to day, and had power to issue writs of election to supply vacancies from any cause. Two thirds of the whole number of members to be elected were required to determine on the expediency of creating an independent State. In the event of determining upon a separation, the convention were authorized to fix upon a day posterior to the 1st day of November, 1791, on which the authority of Virginia and its laws should forever cease and determine; but that authority was made dependent upon the contingency that the Government of the United States should, prior to the said date, assent to the erection of said State, and should agree that the proposed State shall, immediately after the day to be fixed posterior to the 1st day of November, 1791, or at some convenient future time thereto, be admitted into the Federal Union. To avoid anarchy, authority was given to the convention to take the necessary provisional measures for the election and meeting of a convention, at some time prior to the day fixed for the determination of the authority of Virginia, and posterior to the 1st day of November, 1791, "with full power and authority to frame and establish a fundamental constitution of government, and to declare what laws shall be in force therein, until the same shall be abrogated or altered by the legislative authority acting under the constitution, so to be framed and established." The representatives of Virginia in Congress were instructed to obtain a speedy act in conformity with these provisions.

No. 4.

Mr. Fearing, the Delegate from the eastern division of the Northwest Territory, on the 31st

March, 1802, on the report of the select committee respecting the admission of the said division as a State into the Union, said:

"He should oppose this resolution, but not on the ground of expediency. He opposed the resolution on constitutional principles. He conceived Congress had nothing to do with the arrangements for calling a convention."

"Can Congress exercise power given exclusively to the people? He conceived it would be as great an encroachment upon their rights to say they should meet together in convention and form a constitution, as it would be to say so to any State in the Union."

Mr. Griswold, of Connecticut, said:

"What is the condition of the people of the Territory? They are not, it is true, as to every purpose of government, a State, but they have a complete Legislature, as fully competent to legislate as the Legislature of Maryland, or any other Legislature in the Union. They are fully competent to the making of all laws to regulate the internal concerns of the government. Now these resolutions go to interfere with these internal concerns, and to regulate them by law. When the gentleman from Kentucky undertakes to decide the terms on which the members of the convention shall be chosen, I ask him, where is the power? Are not the powers of the Territorial Legislature as full as those of the Legislature of Maryland? And have we not as good a right to interfere with the State concerns of Maryland as to interfere with the concerns of this Territory? We have the determination of the Legislature of the Territory that it is not desirous of forming a constitution at this time. If, then, we go abreast of the determination of one Legislature, why not of another? If we go abreast of that of the North-western Territory, why not go abreast of that of Maryland? If, too, you may legislate for the people before they are admitted into the Union, you may also legislate for them afterwards. If you do not like the constitution they now form, you may pass a law for another convention."

"By a parity of reason you may force down a constitution on Connecticut and say that you will give them one. Acting on such a principle there can be no stopping place; you may go to any length. If you interfere with the authority vested in others, you may go to any length, and that the consolidation of the States, which some gentlemen affected, will be accomplished. I am, therefore, on constitutional grounds opposed to those resolutions. Let us turn to the third resolution, which is calculated, in express words, for calling a convention, by law of the United States, and taking the population of the last census as the basis of representation. How are the opinions of the people upon the calling of a convention to be obtained? How is their consent to elect delegates to be obtained? I answer, in no other way than by an act of the Territorial Legislature, or by going around to every man in the Territory and obtaining his opinion. You must obtain the consent of the Territorial Legislature before you take the step of calling a convention."

The proceedings of Congress gave rise to a public meeting of the citizens of Dayton, Ohio, on the 26th of September, 1802. The following, among other resolutions, was adopted unanimously:

"We consider the late law of Congress for the admission of this Territory into the Union, as far as it relates to the calling of a convention, and regulating the election of its members, as an act of legislative usurpation of power properly the province of the Territorial Legislature, bearing a striking similarity to the course of Great Britain imposing laws on the Provinces. We view it as unconstitutional, as a bad precedent, and unjust and partial as to the representation in the different counties. We wish our Legislature to be called immediately to pass a law to take the enumeration to call a convention, and to regulate the election of members, and also the time and place for the meeting."

In regard to the submission of Ohio Constitution of 1802.

Friday, November 12, 1802. "Leave was given to lay before the convention a resolution for submitting the constitution or frame of government, now preparing, to the people of the eastern division of the Territory, northwest of the Ohio, for their acceptance or disapprobation; which resolution was received and read the first time: Whereupon,

"Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to a committee of the whole convention to-morrow."—Med. N. C. 101.

Saturday, November 13, 1802. "The convention, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a committee of the whole convention on the resolution of submitting the constitution or frame of government, now preparing, to the people of the eastern division of the Territory, northwest of the Ohio, for their acceptance or disapprobation. Mr. Byrd in the chair; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. President resumed the chair, and Mr. Byrd reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said resolution under consideration, and directed him to report to the convention their disagreement to the same."

"On the question that the convention do agree with the committee of the whole, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 7."

The case of Rice against Foster (4 Harrington Reports, 479) arose under an act of the Legislature of Delaware, of the 19th of February, 1847, authorizing the people to decide by ballot whether license to retail intoxicating liquors shall be permitted among them. The constitutionality of the act was contested, and the case carried to the highest court of appeal for decision. The court decided the law in question to be unconstitutional; that as the legislative power in the State was vested in a General Assembly, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives, the people have divested themselves of all legislative power and vested it in this body, and that they can resume it only in the forms of the constitution or by revolution. That the General Assembly cannot delegate this power even to the people at large, nor can they make it depend upon the votes of the people at the polls. Booth, the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"We have been taught by the lessons of history that equal and indeed greater dangers resulted from a pure democracy than from an absolute monarchy. Each leads to despotism. Wherever the power of making laws, which is the supreme power in a State, has been exercised directly by the people under any system of polity, and not by representation, civil liberty has been overthrown. To guard against these dangers, our republican government was instituted by the consent of the people. The characteristic which distinguishes it from the mis-called republics of ancient and modern times is, that none of the powers of sovereignty are exercised, but all of them by separate coordinate branches of government, in whom those powers are vested by the constitution. These coordinate branches are intended to operate as balances, checks, and restraints, not only upon each other, but upon the people themselves, to guard them against their own rashness, precipitancy, and misguided zeal, and to protect the minority against the injustice of the majority."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BURROUGHS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if the gentleman from New York has any vested rights to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. But has the gentleman from New York the right to monopolize the floor, and yield it to any gentleman and then take it again?

The CHAIRMAN. A gentleman holding the floor has the right to yield it to another gentleman, but the time occupied by him is taken out of the time of the gentleman holding the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I understand that when a member yields the floor he yields it absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Such has not been the practice in committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from New York who is entitled to the floor does not desire to occupy it this evening and will yield it, I will submit a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I will yield for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, the committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House No. 5, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had this day approved and signed a joint resolution making appropriation for the payment of expenses of investigating committees of the House of Representatives.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS.

Mr. BRYAN, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas relative to the impeachment of Judge Watrous; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Mr. CLAY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What will be the business in order if the House refuses to adjourn? The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House reuses to adjourn, then I shall insist on the regular order.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT of Georgia, and BUFFINX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 69.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman makes his motion with a view to have a night session for general debate, I am willing to vote for it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not. There are gentlemen upon the other side of the House who seem to have been assailed to-day, and who have sought the floor, and, with all my heart, I desire to afford them an opportunity to reply. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BURROUGHS] had the floor but yielded it to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] who opposes this side, and now seeks an adjournment. When we go into Committee of the Whole, if the gentleman from New York does not wish to occupy the floor this evening, there are others who will be ready to speak.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House adjourn.

On a division of the House, there were—ayes 81, noes 70.

Mr. KNAPP demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KNAPP and STEVENSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 50.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 19, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. JULIUS E. GRAMMER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PUGH presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the improvement of the harbors of Mackinaw City, in the Straits of Mackinaw, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that a quarter section of land in the proposed Territory of Arizona may be granted to each actual settler, reserving to the United States the right to the minerals therein; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Shirlock & Sherley, contractors for carrying the mail from Louisville, Kentucky, to St. Louis, Missouri, praying to be relieved from certain fines alleged to have been unjustly imposed upon them; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the memorial of Douglass Ottinger, praying compensation for the labor and expense attending his invention of an apparatus for rescuing passengers from sinking vessels in the open sea, called the life or surf car; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of J. & R. Kingsland, praying payment for paper for printing ordered by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of S. Van Sickell, J. R. Bellerjeau, and George C. Leidy, route agents conducting the mail from New York to Philadelphia, praying an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of Apollo Herold and others, citizens of the United States, praying that the public lands may cease to be considered a source of revenue, and that they be subject to entry by actual settlers and cultivators only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GREEN presented the memorial of Joseph C. Irwin & Co., praying for indemnity for losses suffered while transporting merchandise to Great Salt Lake City, in consequence of orders of Colonel Johnston, commanding the United States troops in Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, presented a paper relating to the claim of J. E. Peay and C. Ayliffe, contractors on mail route No. 7503, to additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the petition of John R. Nourse, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 162) for the relief of John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY NEXT.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Tuesday next.

COMPENSATION OF JUDGES.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to provide for the compensation of any district judges of the United States, who may be designated and appointed under and by virtue of the act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States, in the case of sickness or disability of the judges of the district courts;" and that they report by bill or otherwise.

POST ROUTE CONTRACTORS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the claim of the contractors on route No. 7503, from Little Rock to Washington, in Arkansas, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

TENCH TILGHMAN.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 60) for the relief of Tench Tilghman, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appropriates to Tench Tilghman $1,000, for losses sustained by him in consequence of his appointment to a consulate, which was abolished by the Spanish Government while he was on his way to take charge of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JONAS P. KELLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 67) for the relief of Jonas P. Keller; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to make an allowance of $750 to Jonas P. Keller, in full, for his services as a watchman or overseer of the Executive Building at the corner of F and Seventeenth streets, from April 1, 1849, to September 30, 1850.

In 1849 the Executive Building at the corner of F and Seventeenth streets was occupied by various bureaus of the Treasury, War, and Interior Departments; but no legal provision existed for the superintendence and care of the building. Under these circumstances, the Secretaries of those Departments authorized Mr. McPherson, a clerk in the War Department, to take charge of the building as acting superintendent, who immediately devolved the duty of the care and the oversight of the daily police of the place upon the memorialist, who performed the service (as Mr. McPherson and others certify) until the act of 27th of February, 1851, which provided watchmen for the building, took effect.

From the appropriation made by that act, Mr.

Keller received a compensation for his services at the rate of $500 per annum, subsequently to 1st October, 1850; but no means were provided for paying for the service rendered between 1st of April, 1849, when his duties commenced; and the 1st October, 1850; and it is for this period that compensation is now claimed.

The act of 1850, (9 Stat., 542,) which prohibits the accounting officers from allowing to one individual salaries of two different offices, expressly provides that "this prohibition shall not extend to the superintendents of the executive buildings;" so that there can be no objection to the claim on that ground.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIAS HALL.

The bill (S. No. 68) for the relief of Elias Hall, of Rutland, Vermont, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Elias Hall of the sum of $516 52, in full, for the balance due him for his services as superintendent of repairs of small arms, and for subsistence, expenses, and losses while engaged in the service of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain, with interest from the 29th of April, 1834, when the account was properly presented for payment.

DR. CHARLES MAXWELL.

The bill (S. No. 69) for the relief of Dr. Charles Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the accounting officers to allow and pay to Dr. Charles D. Maxwell the difference of pay between that of the grade of a passed assistant surgeon and a surgeon, from the 22d of December, 1845, to the 7th of July, 1848, being the period during which he performed the duties of surgeon and assistant surgeon on board the United States ship Cyane.

JOHN DICK.

The bill (S. No. 70) for the relief of John Dick, of Florida, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By its provisions the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to cause a patent to be issued to John Dick for certain lots containing one hundred and fifty-three acres, situate in East Florida, being a portion of the lands subject to sale at St. Augustine; but the patent is only to operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and not to affect the rights of any third person.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of East Florida, approved August 4, 1842, the petitioner filed his notice with the register of the land office at St. Augustine for a "permit" to settle upon one hundred and sixty acres of land south of the line dividing townships numbered nine and ten, and described as follows: Lot No. 10 in section twenty-nine, lot No. 1 in section thirty-one, fractional section thirty, and the northwest of the northwest quarter of section thirty-two, all of township ten, range twenty-seven south and east, containing in the aggregate 153.20 acres. On the 16th of April, 1843, the register of the land office issued "permit" No. 43 to the petitioner, giving him permission to settle upon the lands solicited, under the conditions of the act; one of which was, "that no right or donation shall be acquired under this act within two miles of any permanent military post of the United States, established and garrisoned at the time such settlement and residence was commenced."

This permit was canceled by the General Land Office, on the ground that the land embraced in it had been reserved in 1841 for military purposes. The petitioner proves, however, that prior to his permit being canceled, he had complied with the requisitions of the act, and that his settlement was not within four miles of any military post established and garrisoned at the date of his settlement, or at any time subsequent thereto; that he was compelled to relinquish and abandon his settlement by virtue of the cancellation of his "permit," and that, since that period, he has continued to reside south of the line specified in the act of Congress, and has not received lands under the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL WHITNEY.

The Bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of Daniel Whitney was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the confirmation of the title of Daniel Whitney, assignee of Francis Lavonture, to a certain tract of land at Green Bay, Wisconsin, confirmed to Lavonture by the commissioner appointed under the act of Congress approved February 21, 1823, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force certain acts for the adjustment of land claims in the Territory of Michigan," and directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause the tract of land to be surveyed in the same manner as other private claims to lands at Green Bay have been surveyed, and to issue a patent to Daniel Whitney, as assignee of Lavonture, so soon as Whitney shall produce to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a certificate of the register of deeds for the county of Brown, in the State of Wisconsin, that he is the actual assignee of Lavonture, and present legal owner of the land, certified to by the clerk of the circuit court of that county, under his hand and the seal of the court, as in other cases, and according to the provisions of the fifth section of the act of 1823.

On the 15th of September, 1823, Francis Lavonture presented to the commissioners appointed under the act of 1823 to hear and determine the claims of persons to tracts of land occupied and cultivated by them in the Green Bay settlement, on the 1st of July, 1812, his claim, and the testimony to support it, to a tract of land, "commencing at low-water mark on Fox river, and running west eighty arpents, or so far as to make said claim contain six hundred and forty acres, as confirmed by said commissioners; and bounded on the south by a certain tract occupied by the United States garrison; west and north by wild or uncultivated lands; and east by Fox river, being sixteen arpents in breadth." The commissioners decided that the claim be confirmed, and that it was not in conflict with any confirmation before made, and they gave their certificate to the correctness of the proceedings had before them.

The Secretary of the Treasury, instead of executing or carrying into effect the law of 1823, and selecting the doubtful and uncertain claims from those which were confirmed, decided to lay all the claims before Congress, and submit all the decisions of the commissioners to it for supervision, refusing to cause the claims actually confirmed by law to be surveyed, and patents to be issued to the claimants. On the 17th of April, 1828, Congress passed an act to confirm certain claims passed upon by the commissioners, excluding those in the county of Michilimackinac, and also certain lands occupied by the United States for military purposes. About the time of the passage of this act, the President of the United States (upon erroneous representations) was induced to make a large military reservation of land, in the vicinity of Fort Howard, at Green Bay, amounting to five or six thousand acres. In this tract was included the land of Francis Lavonture. The confirmatory act of 1828 was, therefore, of no benefit to him in procuring him the evidence of his title, as the Secretary, after its passage, refused the patent because his land was thus embraced in the reservation. The title to the land continues in this condition, although the post, as a military station for troops, has been abandoned, and every part of the reservation has ceased to be occupied for military or Government purposes. The lands are not now required for such purposes, notice having been given during the year 1854, by the Secretary of War, for their sale; and no compensation was ever made to Francis Lavonture for thus taking his land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JANE SMITH.

The bill (S. No. 73) authorizing Mrs. Jane Smith to enter certain lands in the State of Alabama was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is an authority to Mrs. Jane Smith to enter, at the proper land office, the west half of the southwest fractional quarter and the west half of the northwest fractional quarter of section thirty-three, in township six north, of range five east, situated in the State of Alabama, upon payment to the receiver of $1 25 per acre, with a proviso, that the entry shall be made within six months from the passage of the act.

Mrs. Smith is the owner of these tracts, which were formerly held as an Indian reservation for Peter Randon, but were abandoned by him in 1836. In consequence of being held as a reservation, the lands are not subject to private entry. The memorialist, therefore, prays to be allowed to enter them at the minimum price of Government lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

J. WILLCOX JENKINS.

The bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of J. Willcox Jenkins was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to J. Willcox Jenkins the difference between the pay of captain's clerk and a purser of a first class sloop-of-war, from the 1st of January to the 30th of April, 1856, during which time he was the acting purser of the sloop-of-war Jamestown.

INDIANA MEETING OF FRIENDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Private Calendar is a bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends. The Chair doubts whether it is a private bill or not.

Mr. STUART. I have no doubt that it is a private bill. That is the corporate name of the society asking the privilege of entering certain lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit it to the Senate. The Secretary will read the bill for information.

The bill was read. It provides that the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, by such committee or agent as it may appoint for that purpose, shall be authorized to select and locate three hundred and twenty acres of the lands within that portion of the Shawnee country, in Kansas Territory, situate between the Missouri State line and a line west thereof, thirty miles distant and parallel thereto, as described in the treaty with the Shawnee Indians of the 10th of May, 1854, in addition to the three hundred and twenty acres set apart to the Friends' Shawnee Labor School or Mission by the treaty. This location is to be made upon any of those lands which will belong to the United States, after the Indians shall have made their selections, as provided by the treaty. The committee or agent appointed to make the location may at once designate the tract or tracts selected to the proper land officer in Kansas Territory, or to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, who is, upon payment to the United States of $1 25 per acre, to issue a patent to such trustee or trustees as the Yearly Meeting may nominate for the land thus selected.

It further provides that the Yearly Meeting, by such committee or agent as it may appoint, may designate to the proper land officer in Kansas Territory, or to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, the tract of three hundred and twenty acres set apart by the treaty for the Friends' Shawnee Labor School or Mission, and thereupon it shall not be offered to sale; but upon payment to the United States of $1 25 per acre, a patent shall issue for this tract to such trustee or trustees as the Meeting may nominate.

The lands granted by the act are not to be sold, or otherwise alienated, by the Yearly Meeting, or its trustee, or trustees, without the previous consent of Congress.

Mr. CLAY. Does a single objection carry the bill over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think, after hearing the bill read, that it is not strictly a private bill.

Mr. CLAY. I do not so regard it, and I shall object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. PUGH. It was passed through the Senate at the last Congress, on private bill day—the same bill identically.

Mr. CLAY. If so, it escaped my observation. It cannot pass now. We should have an opportunity to look a little further into it.

Mr. PUGH. I do not understand the objection of my friend from Alabama. Does he object that it is not a private bill?

Mr. CLAY. It is not a private bill, in my opinion; but furthermore, as I understand the rule, a single objection will carry it over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill has been read twice before, and it comes up regularly now on its third reading, and then on its passage.

Mr. CLAY. I object to it at this time. I want to look into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hardly knows what the practice has been; but doubts whether this can strictly be a private bill. He caused it to be read for information on the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to detain the Senate or have the Senate now detained in the consideration of this subject. I am very clear, however, that if the Senator from Alabama understood the facts he would not object to the bill for an instant, nor would any Senator who understood the circumstances of the case. It is clearly a private bill. This is a corporation, and stands in every respect like an individual; it can sue and be sued like an individual; its property is individual property.

This is a society of Friends, which has been organized for the purpose of educating the Shawnee Indians, and they moved to that Territory with them. The effect of the bill is simply to give them an opportunity to enter some woodlands for the purposes of the school. It restricts it to that, as the Senator will see by the last section; they cannot dispose of it. It is simply for the convenience and sustaining of that school, which it is conceded has been one of the best among the Indians. It has the recommendation of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and I think of everybody who has examined the subject.

Mr. CLAY. How many acres does it give?

Mr. STUART. Three hundred and twenty; but the Senator will see that the bill reserves all the rights of the Indians; it does not conflict with them. Indeed its whole object is one of charity to aid this charitable institution in a very friendly and very Christian work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would be very much obliged to any Senator, as the question has been made whether this is a private bill or not, who would state what has been the practice of the Senate touching bills relative to associations or corporations of individuals. It is purely a question of practice. The Chair has no knowledge of the practice of the Senate on this point.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think these bills have been considered private bills. This one may be objectionable on principle; I do not know anything about it; but I consider it to be a private bill, according to the practice of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, then, will regard it as a private bill, if such be the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. I do not think it is a private bill, and I do not understand such to be the practice of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the bill?

The Secretary read the title of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I well remember that the consideration of a bill in which I felt deep interest, as well as the Senators from Georgia, providing for the payment of certain claims for losses sustained by citizens of the States of Alabama and Georgia, from Creek Indian depredations in 1836, was objected to on a Friday during the last Congress, on the ground that it was not a private bill. It was so ruled by the Senate, and its consideration was excluded on private bill day. If a bill for the relief of a small number of citizens of those States, who were named, was not a private bill,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 50.

it seems to me that a bill for the benefit of a corporation, which may include an illimitable number of persons, should also be excluded as not being a private bill. If my objection will carry it over, I shall object, at any rate, to its consideration, because I wish to look at it. I am not satisfied to let it pass without examination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection of the Senator will not carry it over, unless it be not a private bill. Whether it is considered a private bill or not, by the practice of the Senate, is what the Chair wishes to understand. It is a matter purely of practice, and he has no experience on the point.

Mr. WADE. This bill will undoubtedly give rise to debate. I had hoped that this would be considered objection day, as it is called, when we should take up no other bills than those which should not give rise to debate. I presumed that was the intention of the Senate—not to take up those bills which any gentleman wished to debate, but to proceed to pass those about which there was no dispute. There are many such on the Calendar, and I hope we shall dispose of them. I hope this bill will be passed over, as it is to give rise to debate.

Mr. PUGH. If that is the general understanding I do not object to the suggestion of my colleague; but if gentlemen are to go on and have their bills considered, I certainly shall insist on this, because it is one of the most meritorious bills before Congress. If, however, this is to be considered objection day, and the bill is to go over because it is objected to, very well.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not understand that this is a private bill in the ordinary sense of that term. A private bill is a bill which affords relief to an individual for some claim he has on the Government. For instance, a man has a money claim on the Government which he is not enabled to enforce by law, but he comes to Congress on equitable considerations to have it allowed to him. If a widow has an equitable claim on the Government for a pension, and she cannot get it under the rules and regulations of the Department, she applies to Congress, and Congress waives the strict letter of the law and allows her, on equitable considerations, the pension for which she prays. An individual has a claim against the Government for money which the accounting officers refuse to allow for some technical or legal difficulty, and he presents his case to Congress and asks that the legal difficulty shall be waived and his equitable claim allowed.

These are what I understand to be private claims. But this is not a private claim; these individuals have no claim on the Government, except on its mere bounty, its mere generosity, its mere liberality. They have no claim under a contract, no claim under a treaty, no claim under a law, no claim for services rendered, no claim on the Government. This is not a private claim, according to my understanding of the term, and it ought not to be so considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, whether it is a private bill?

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Georgia has given a wrong definition to the character of the subject. It is not confined to private claims; it is confined to private cases. The Senate and House of Representatives have decided, again and again, that a bill presented on behalf of a State is a private bill; and a general bill is one which affects the whole public—a public law. Look at your statutes; you find there public acts and private acts published. What is this? Here is a bill before the Senate for the relief of a corporate body of persons. Suppose it were a bank, or any corporate society, or anything else of a private character: would not a bill affecting it be a private act, as contradistinguished from a public act? That is the distinction. Every species of legislation that is a public act goes on the general Calendar, and is considered upon the general Calendar; but everything that is a private act is considered as a private bill, and goes upon the Private Calendar. This is most certainly a bill of a private character, relating to this individual school. It is no more nor less than a society of Friends asking for the privilege of entering three hundred and twenty acres of land for the benefit of their school.

Mr. PUGH. They are asking to enter a specific tract of land set apart by the Indian council and confirmed by the Land Office and the Indian department, but which is not subject to actual preemption under existing law. It is just waiving that condition of the law.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to say that at the last session this bill was passed on the Private Calendar?

Mr. PUGH. I was mistaken; it was on the Private Calendar, but it was taken up in the morning hour, on my motion, and passed.

Mr. SEWARD. A private bill, as I have always understood, is a bill for payment to an individual who presents some claim against the Government, founded either in law or in equity. A private person, in this sense, may be one individual, or several individuals associated as partners, or a corporation aggregate. Corporations aggregate are simply private persons, in this view. However, for the purpose of removing any question about it, I move to lay the bill on the table, in order that we may proceed with other business.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH CHASE AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 78) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue land warrants to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for issuing to Joseph Chase, James Young, and Alexander Keef, of the State of Rhode Island, respectively, a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, in consideration of their detention as prisoners in the Dartmoor prison during a portion of the years 1814 and 1815.

Mr. PUGH. I do not object to this bill, but it is evidently of the same class as the one just laid on the table. I think it is a private bill. I shall offer no objection to it, but I wish to show the Senate how completely Senators are wrong in their definitions of private bills.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LAURENT MILLAUDON.

The bill (S. No. 81) for the relief of Laurent Millaudon was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Laurent Millaudon will, by this bill, be confirmed in his title to two tracts of land lying on the east side of Mobile bay, in the State of Alabama, being the two tracts of land known as the De Feriot claims, as surveyed in the year 1830, and approved of by the surveyor general in the year 1835, with the exception of so much off of the north end thereof as has heretofore been surveyed and confirmed to William Patterson, and included within what is known as the Patterson claim, as now located. This, however, is only to be construed as a relinquishment of any title the United States may have to these lands; and the confirmation is to inure to the benefit of any other persons, if such there be, as may be entitled to any part of the De Feriot claims under conveyances from him.

Under the provisions of the act of 1812, authorizing the investigation of land titles south of the thirty-first degree, and east of the Mississippi, an individual, without any authority for so doing, filed two alleged Spanish permits for lands on the east side of the Mobile bay, in favor of J. B. Lorendine, in the behalf of the Baron de Feriot; these claims were favorably reported upon by Commissioner Crawford, and communicated to the House of Representatives on the 5th day of January, 1816. Subsequent to this report, but before any action by Congress, Arthur L. Simms became the purchaser of the right of De Feriot. On the 3d of March, 1819, Congress passed an act confirming all the claims favorably reported by the Commissioner; and, under that act, the claims were regularly surveyed by the proper officers in 1830, and confirmed by the Surveyor General in 1835. On the 20th of March, 1837, Laurent Millaudon, relying upon the representations made to him of the genuineness of the claims, and upon all the previous action of the officers of the Government and of Congress, by which they were declared to be valid and good titles, and as covering lands to which the Government had no claim, became the purchaser of certain portions of them from Simms. Doubts having afterwards arisen as to the justice of these claims, with a view of securing the lands, preemption floats were laid thereon. Under the titles thus purchased by Mr. Millaudon, and believed by him to be most unimpeachable, he went on in making the most extensive preparations to establish a city upon those lands, and it appears that in this enterprise he actually expended upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. The validity of the De Feriot titles being brought before the General Land Office for consideration, in 1837, that office required a report from the land officers at St. Stephens, upon all the facts and evidence in the case; and it satisfactorily appears, from that report and accompanying documents, that the claims of De Feriot were fraudulent in themselves, and the De Feriot titles, being fraudulent, conveyed no title to the present holders under them. Besides, as the lands were represented upon the plats as private claims, and have not been surveyed into sections, as public lands, they were not subject to be floated on under the provisions of the preemption law, and no right to the land was acquired by those floats being placed thereon.

From these decisions it results that Mr. Millaudon, an innocent purchaser of title, which he had every reason to believe, from all the previous action of the Government thereon, was a perfect one, after an outlay of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars upon the land, now finds that that title, if not void, is at least questionable, and that all his expenditure is upon lands, perhaps, belonging to the United States.

In view of the fact that these claims were reported for confirmation by the commissioner, confirmed by the act of Congress of 1819, surveyed and confirmed by the Surveyor General of the United States, and reserved and set apart by the General Land Office for a satisfaction of these claims, together with the further fact that the claimant is an innocent purchaser, for a valuable consideration, the committee are of opinion that Congress ought to confirm the title.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LANDS GRANTED TO LA FAYETTE.

The next bill on the calendar was the bill (S. No. 71) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a relocation of land warrants three, four, and five, granted by Congress to General La Fayette."

Mr. SLIDELL. I prefer that that bill be passed over in the absence of my colleague. I move to postpone its consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE M. GORDON.

The bill (S. No. 83) to vest the title for certain warrants for land in George M. Gordon was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By it the Commissioner of the General Land Office is directed, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to recognize the assignment made to George M. Gordon, on the 21st of January, 1852, by Edmund Hugill, sergeant in Captain Gordon's company, third regiment of United States infantry, and James McIntyre, a private of the same company and regiment, to whom warrants Nos. 78,402 and 78,403 respectively, issued on the 13th of July, 1853, so as to vest the legal title in and to these warrants in George M. Gordon, his heirs or assigns, according to the intention of the parties.

WIDOWS' REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill from the Court of Claims (S. No. 87) for the relief of Jane Smith, in the county of Claremont, and State of Ohio; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Jane Smith, widow of John Smith, a soldier in the army of the Revolution, of the sum of $393 84, being for arrears of her pension at the rate of eighty dollars per annum, from the 4th of March, 1848, to the 3d of February 1853, to which she is entitled under the second section of the act of February 3, 1853, entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows, minors, and orphans."

Mr. STUART. I move that this bill be postponed. The Senate will remember that it involves a very large amount of money growing out of the construction of certain acts of Congress in regard to which the Court of Claims and the Departments differ. There are three or four hundred thousand dollars, more or less, involved in the question. It is one which will necessarily involve a good deal of debate. I move, therefore, to postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator to let me give it the proper direction. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Pensions. I do not understand the exact nature of the bill, but I suspect from the terms of it that it is one of very considerable importance. The Committee on Pensions have had a great many applications for what are termed arrears of pensions before them, and they have instructed me to make a general report on them adverse to all such claims. The claims to which I allude are of this character; they are the claims of children and grand children of revolutionary soldiers, who ask the amount of pensions which the father or grandfather might have received if he had made application for it.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is not this case.

Mr. STUART. This is a different thing. This grows out of the construction of a law. The point is, whether a law passed in 1853 had a retroactive effect, or whether it took effect from the date of its passage? The Department, as I remember—I may not be speaking with entire correctness—decided that the law took effect from the date of its passage, and gave pensions from that time. The claimants contended that it had a retroactive effect, sending them back four or five years. The Department decides one way and the Court of Claims the other. This question was discussed at great length at the last Congress.

Mr. CLAY. Then I hope the bill will lie over.

Mr. WADE. I hope this case will not be delayed any longer. At the last session the decision of the court came up, and was argued at great length. It does turn on the construction of the statutes. The court, on great consideration, have decided the question. The Committee on Claims of last year unanimously reported in favor of the decision of the court, and I believe they have done so over again this year. If a deliberate decision of that court, and two decisions of the Committee on Claims, on the same question, unanimously made, are not enough to carry a case through the Senate, then we might as well dispense with the court at once. I do not wish to enter into the discussion of this question. I think it ought to be regarded as settled. The matter turns entirely upon a question of law; and the construction on that point, made by such authority, ought finally to settle it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can state to the Senate precisely what is involved in a settlement of this question. The law originally granted pensions to the widows of those soldiers who were married during the revolutionary war. There was a very good reason for that limitation, because the husbands engaged in the war, and who were married during the war, were necessarily taken away from their wives and their families. Subsequently, however, a law was passed giving pensions to the widows of those who were married prior to 1786 or 1790. Then another law was passed, granting pensions to all those who were married previous to 1794; and still another law was passed, granting pensions to those who were married previous to 1800. In 1853 I drew up the amendment myself, and it was attached to some bill, providing that all widows of persons who served in the revolutionary war who were married subsequent to 1800, should receive a pension in the same manner—that was the word—as those who were married previous to 1800. I took that section, and went with it myself, and submitted it to the Commissioner of Pensions, and to the Secretary of the Interior, then a Virginia gentleman, Mr. Stuart; and they both told me that, if it should pass Congress, the widows would be entitled to a pension commencing in 1848, going back five years, that being the time when the restriction was removed from those widows who had been married between 1794 and 1800. The Senate adopted it, and it became a law.

A new Administration came in, and Mr. Waldo, of Connecticut, a very excellent and good man, and a good lawyer, gave it a construction that it should take effect only from its passage. I had a conversation with him when I returned here the next year, and I am very clear in my own mind that if he had to make the decision over again, he would never decide as he had done. He intimated as much to me, but he said it was a matter which Congress could easily remedy. That is the statement of the case.

On that statement of the case these persons who were entitled to a pension, as they thought, these widows who were married after 1800, applied to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims have adjudicated the matter; and they say, in so many words, that a fair construction of the law required that it should have taken effect from 1848, as was designed by Congress. Indeed, at the time the amendment was passed, my recollection is very clear and distinct that it was modified at the suggestion of the then colleague of my friend from South Carolina, Judge Butler. He suggested that it was so indefinite that it might go back to 1831; and, at his suggestion, I modified it so that we all understood, and it was so stated in the Senate, that we expected it would go back to 1848, and stop there. It was designed to go back to 1848.

I think, in justice to these widows, in justice to the previous action of Congress, in justice to what is but a fair construction of this law, we ought to make an appropriation to carry it out. If the passage of this bill involves that, I am ready to vote for it; and I am ready to vote for it even as a single case, if you will drive parties to the Court of Claims, and compel all these individuals to go there and prosecute their rights, and obtain the decision of that tribunal. It would be the wiser way, I know, to make an appropriation. I apprehend, if Congress should pass this claim, they would then come to the conclusion to make one general appropriation, covering all the cases. The amount, I think, would be some three hundred thousand dollars—at all events, at the last Congress, according to my recollection, it was about two hundred thousand dollars up to that time.

Mr. CLAY. The passage of this bill is objected to to-day, and it must go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor.) The Chair is informed that there is no rule in force making a single objection decisive against the consideration of a bill. The Senate being in Committee of the Whole on the bill, it is now pending for consideration until disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I suppose the effect of the objection will be to stop the third reading of the bill to-day. Inasmuch as this is a debatable subject, and one which, perhaps, will occupy the whole day, I suggest that we had better postpone it, and proceed with the Calendar, taking up those cases which shall not involve discussion, and thereby dispatch a great deal of business. I move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. POLK. The bill comes from the Committee on Claims; but if the gentlemen wish to inquire into it, as the member of the committee who had the honor to report the bill, I have no objection to its being postponed for the purpose of examination.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The hour of one o'clock being arrived, the unfinished business was announced to be next in order, being the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state to the Senate that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has sent a message to me to-day, requesting that this bill be postponed until he can have an opportunity of being present in the Senate. He thinks great injustice has been done to him in the remarks of some Senators, and he desires to vindicate himself from some imputations which have been cast on him. I therefore move that the bill be postponed until Tuesday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. The remark of the honorable Senator from Georgia is susceptible of some misconstruction, I think. He refers to me, I presume, as the person who communicated to him the wishes of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. His remark was, that he wished to reply to some statements which had been made on the floor that he thought did injustice to him and to the public service—no personal imputation, of course. He did not object to the debate going on to-day, however; but he thought that it was due to him, by the parliamentary practice, to be allowed to close the debate, and he wished to be heard on it before the final vote was taken.

Mr. HALE. According to the suggestion just made, if there are any motions short of the final passage, we may go on with them to-day.

Mr. CLAY. I suggest that those who desire to speak should be heard to-day, and that the Senator from Mississippi be permitted to conclude the debate.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state the reason why I do not desire the debate to go on to-day. If we progress with the debate to-day, it may be concluded then, and we shall have to take the vote on Tuesday. I do not want to take the vote on Tuesday, because I know several Senators are going to Richmond, and will be absent on Tuesday. I shall therefore object to taking any vote on any question involving the merits of the bill, before Wednesday. If we postpone the bill until Tuesday, we can debate it on Tuesday, and that will afford ample time for debate on the subject. I would rather postpone it, and go on with the Private Calendar to-day.

Mr. KING. We might go on with the discussion, but not take the vote to-day.

The motion to postpone was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 18, noes 14.

LUCINDA ROBINSON.

At the suggestion of Mr. STUART, the Senate resumed the consideration of the private bills, the next one on the Calendar being the bill from the Court of Claims (S. No. 88) for the relief of Lucinda Robinson, of the county of Orleans, State of Vermont.

Mr. STUART. That bill involves precisely the same question as the bill which has been postponed. I move to postpone this until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE ASHLEY.

The bill from the Court of Claims (S. No. 89) for the relief of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, the sum of $996 01, being in full for certain planks and boards and other property of Holgate, seized by Commodore McDonough on Lake Champlain, in 1814.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. WADE, February 20, 1857:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the opinion of the Court of Claims in the case of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, report:

This is a claim for compensation for a quantity of lumber taken on Lake Champlain, and converted to the use of the American forces under the command of Commodore McDonough, in 1814.

The committee concur in the unanimous opinion of the court, that "it is a case in which the constitutional provision, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, is strictly applicable;" they therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

"George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, vs. the United States.

"Judge Blackford delivered the opinion of the court.

"This claim was originally presented to the House of Representatives by one Samuel Holgate, of Milton, State of Vermont, in 1825. There have been several adverse reports in this case, by Committees of Claims of the House of Representatives.

"The said Samuel Holgate having died, Harvey Holgate, stating himself to be the heir and legal representative of the decedent, filed the present petition in this court. Since the cause was submitted to this court for decision, the said Harvey Holgate has died, and George Ashley has been appointed administrator de bonis non of said Samuel Holgate, deceased.

"On the 30th of January, 1839, the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives reported the facts to be as follows:

"That the claim of the petitioner has been frequently submitted to the Committee of Claims, and has been uniformly rejected. Your committee have again examined the same, and it appears from the evidence accompanying the petition that about the 1st of July, 1814, the petitioner was the owner of a quantity of lumber at Milton, in the State of Vermont; that he agreed with Ira Hill to deliver to him at Vineyard, in the State of Vermont, in the course of three or four weeks, lumber to build a house and barn. About the same period the petitioner engaged to deliver at Alsbury, in Vermont, some lumber to Ephraim Mott; and Amos Ransom of Chazy, in the State of New York, about the same time agreed to receive lumber, to be delivered by the petitioner at the latter place, and to dispose of it for him. The petitioner procured from C. P. Van Ness, collector of the customs of the district of Vermont, a written permit to transport lumber from Milton, in Vermont, to Chazy, in the State of New York. The raft of lumber, together with ten barrels of tar, and some other property, was taken off the south end of Isle La Motte, or Vineyard, sixteen or eighteen miles south of the Canada line, on the waters of Vermont, by a row galley belonging to the squadron commanded by Commodore McDonough, on the charge of being bound for Canada, and brought to Plattsburg, in the State of New York. The petitioner exhibited his permit to Commodore McDonough, and, on a second interview with him at Plattsburg, produced a letter from Collector Van Ness, a copy of which is among the papers accompanying the petition, expressing his disbelief of an intention on the part of the petitioner to traffic with the enemy. Commodore McDonough, however, notwithstanding these representations, delivered the property to Peter Saily, collector of the district of Champlain, who caused it to be libeled in the district court of the State of New York. In due course of law it was condemned, no defense having been made. Boards and planks being required by the commanding officer of the United States at Plattsburg, the lumber libeled was delivered to the quartermaster general at that place, who paid the marshal, or his deputy, for the same, $416 80. From this sum he deducted $84 55, the costs of suit, leaving a balance of $332 29; for one moiety of which the collector accounted to the United States, and the other was equally divided between Commodore McDonough and himself. The tar and other articles were not delivered to the collector, or libeled. The value of the property taken, according to the estimate of the petitioner, was $1,187 51.—See Report of Committee of House of Representatives, first session Twenty-First Congress, vol. 1, No. 78.

"The facts stated in that report, except as to some immaterial matter, appear from the evidence in the case.

"It further appears, that soon after the raft arrived at Plattsburg, the boards and plank were conveyed by the teams of the United States to the camp-ground at that place, and were made use of, by order of the proper authority, for the benefit of the United States, in the erection of the military works there.

"There is an account, filed by Samuel Holgate, the original claimant, of the quantity and price of the lumber. The sum there charged for the lumber is $996 01; and that charge for the lumber is believed to be correct.

"It also appears that Commodore McDonough, by whose order the lumber and other goods were seized, was sued for the seizure in a State court in Vermont, by said Samuel Holgate, senior; that the suit was removed to the circuit court of the United States in that State, and was there tried on the plea of not guilty; and that a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant.

"The suit against Commodore McDonough is proved by a copy of the record. The other facts are proved by a certificate and affidavits not objected to.

"We will first consider the case as respects the boards and plank.

"The first objection made to the suit is, that the lumber, seized as aforesaid, was regularly libeled and condemned in the United States district court in New York, and purchased by the Government at the marshal's sale under the decree.

"This objection is not well founded. There is an act of Congress which provides 'that the district courts [of the United States] shall have exclusive cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas.' (1 Stat. at Large, 76.) That statute applies to this case. The seizure of the raft was made on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, and was made within the district of Vermont; so that the United States district court of Vermont had exclusive jurisdiction of the case. The condemnation of the property by the New York district court was coram non iudice and void.

"Another objection made in the case is, that a verdict and judgment had been previously rendered in favor of Commodore McDonough, in a suit against him by said Samuel Holgate, for the aforesaid seizure of the goods in question. But that objection is not tenable. In this case, the Government of the United States, and not Commodore McDonough, is the defendant. It is decided, even in the case of joint trespassers, that a judgment in favor of one of the trespassers, in a suit against him alone, is no bar to a suit against the other trespasser. To render a former judgment in favor of the defendant a bar to a subsequent suit, it must appear that the former suit was against the same defendant, or his privy; which is not the present case.

"Another objection to the suit is, that the Government purchased the property bona fide at the marshal's sale, and paid the purchase money. There is nothing in this objection. The marshal's sale depends for its support upon the decree of condemnation rendered by the district court in New York. But, as we have already shown, that decree was rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject matter; and the sale was consequently void.

"The whole case, as to the lumber, is this: during the last war with Great Britain, when the town of Plattsburg was in danger of attacks of the enemy, the said lumber was required, by the commanding officer of the United States army there, for the use of the military works at that place.

"The lumber was accordingly made use of by the proper authority in erecting or strengthening the said military works. The case, therefore, seems to be clear. It is within the principle, that, in time of war, a military officer, charged with a particular duty, may take and use private property for public use, when his doing so is necessary for the public service, and the necessity is urgent. The Supreme Court of the United States uses the following language:

"There were, without doubt, occasions in which private property may be lawfully taken possession of or destroyed, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy; and also where a military officer, charged with a particular duty, may impress private property into the public service, or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner; but the officer is not a trespasser. But we are clearly of opinion that, in all these cases, the danger must be immediate and impending, or the necessity urgent for the public service, such as will not admit of delay, and where the action of the civil authority would be too late in providing the means which the occasion calls for. It is impossible to define the particular circumstances of danger or necessity in which this power may be lawfully exercised. Every case must depend upon its own circumstances. It is the emergency that gives the right, and the emergency must be shown to exist before the taking can be justified.'—Mitchell vs. Harmony, 15 How., 134.

"We have no doubt, from the history of the time, (which it is proper to notice,) and from the evidence, that the making use of said lumber for the public benefit was justifiable, and that it ought to be paid for by the Government. It is a case in which the constitutional provision, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, is strictly applicable.—Const. U. S., Amendments, Art. 5.

"For the other property—namely, the tar, hawsers, and anchor—the Government does not appear to be responsible. No emergency has been shown which required the use of those articles for public purposes; nor is it proved that they were used for any such purpose. They were seized by order of Commodore McDonough, on the charge that the owner was engaged with them in an illegal trade with Canada. If that charge was true, the seizure was lawful, and the owner has no reason to complain. But if, on the contrary, the owner was pursuing a lawful business—that is, if he was only on the way to places in New York or Vermont, as alleged—the commodore might be a trespasser, and personally liable for the seizure; but there would be no legal liability, on the part of the Government, for such seizure.—Mitchell vs. Harmony, above cited.

"We give judgment in favor of the claimant for $996 01, that sum being the value of the boards and planks, as proved by the evidence.

"The claim for interest is refused, on the ground that the well-established usage of the Government is, not to pay interest in such cases.—Todd vs. the United States, and White vs. the United States, in this court.

Mr. SLIDELL. I can only understand this case very imperfectly, from what I have heard read; but it appears to me that this man is now claiming from the United States damages for the seizure of property which was condemned by a court, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. His defense is purely a technical one. We have a right to presume that if the proceedings had been instituted against these planks and boards in a court having jurisdiction of the case, a condemnation would have followed. I am very unwilling to express an opinion about a case which I have heard so very indistinctly as I have heard this; but it seems that to pass this bill would be compensating a man for property which he lost in consequence of its being seized in illicit commerce; and the only plea which is set up is that of want of jurisdiction on the part of the court which made the decree of condemnation. I move to postpone it until to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall not object to its going over. The Senator has a right to put it over by an objection; but I do not wish the case to be postponed with the impression which the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana may have made on the Senate. I think, when the Senate comes to investigate the case, they will find it not obnoxious to the objection of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

JOHN ERICSSON.

The bill from the Court of Claims (S. No. 90) for the relief of John Ericsson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Ericsson the sum of $13,930, in full for the balance due him for his services in planning the United States war steamer Princeton, and planning and superintending the construction of the machinery of said steamer.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. Brodhead on the 13th of February, 1857:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims in the case of John Ericsson, report:

This claim is for services of Captain Ericsson in planning and superintending the construction of the steamer "Princeton" and its machinery.

The court is unanimous in opinion that the sum of $13,930 is due to Captain Ericsson, for the payment of which they resubmit a bill, in which the committee concur. The opinion of the court is hereto annexed.

"IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

"John Ericsson vs. the United States.

"The opinion of the court was delivered by Scarburgh, J. "By an act of Congress approved March 3, 1839, it was made 'the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President, to make preparations for, and to commence, the construction of three steam vessels of war, on such models as shall be most approved, according to the best advices they can obtain, or to complete the construction of one such vessel of war, upon a model so approved as, in the opinion of the President, shall be best for the public interest, and most conformable to the demands of the public service;' and to enable the Department to carry into effect this requirement, an appropriation of $300,000, subject to certain restrictions, was made.—5 Stat. at Large, ch. 95, § 2, p. 364.

"By an act of Congress, approved July 20, A. D. 1840, a similar appropriation of the further sum of $340,000 was made, for the purpose of completing the two steam vessels which had been commenced.

"By an act of Congress approved March 3, A. D. 1841, an appropriation of the further sum of $400,000 was made, to be expended in building and equipping war steamers of medium size.

"On the 11th day of September, A. D. 1841, the Secretary of the Navy, by a letter of that date, addressed to the president of the Navy board, directed the board of Navy commissioners to cause to be built two steam vessels of war—one on Captain Stockton's plan, not exceeding six hundred tons; and one on that of Lieutenant Hunter, not to exceed three hundred tons. Afterwards the acting Secretary of the Navy, by a letter dated the 22d day of September, A. D. 1841, addressed to Captain R. F. Stockton, United States Navy, informed him of the direction which had been given to the board of Navy commissioners, and ordered him to superintend the building of the steamer of six hundred tons, under the direction of the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, making to him, from time to time, during the progress of the work, such suggestions as he (Captain Stockton) might think proper.

"Captain Stockton, in a letter addressed by him to the petitioner, dated October 2, A. D. 1841, expressed a wish to see and converse with him on the subject of the construction of the steamship, the building of which he had received orders to superintend. An interview took place between them, and Captain Stockton, in a letter to the petitioner, dated the 8th day of October, A. D. 1841, requested the petitioner to make the drawings of a ship with the dimensions they had previously spoken of. In subsequent letters, marked in the printed document ('Exhibit A') on file in this case, 'No. 16,' 'No. 17,' 'No. 18,' and 'No. 19,' Captain Stockton gave the petitioner further and more particular instructions in regard to the drawings which he desired him to make. The petitioner complied with the request of Captain Stockton in all respects, and, in conformity thereto, made the drawings and performed the services specified in 'Schedule A,' to be found in the printed document above mentioned.

"The ship Princeton was constructed according to these drawings, and the result was entirely satisfactory to Captain Stockton, and highly advantageous to the United States. Captain Stockton reported her to the Secretary of the Navy as 'a full-rigged ship' of great speed and power, able to perform any service that can be expected from a ship of war.—See 'Schedule M' of 'Exhibit A.'

"On the 14th day of March, A. D. 1844, the petitioner presented his claim ('Schedule A' of 'Exhibit A') for compensation for his services to the Secretary of the Navy; and on the 11th day of May, A. D. 1844, it was rejected, on the ground that Captain Stockton, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, had stated as follows: 'In regard to Captain Ericsson's bill, which was sent to me at the same time, I must say that, with all my desire to serve him, I cannot approve his bill; it is in direct violation of our agreement, as far as it is to be considered a legal claim upon the Department.'—See 'Schedule F' of 'Exhibit A.'

"In a subsequent letter from Captain Stockton to the Secretary of the Navy, he further stated: 'That it has given me great pleasure to acknowledge, upon all proper occasions, the services of Captain Ericsson's mechanical skill in carrying out my well intended efforts for the benefit of the country.' * * * 'I have invariably given him to understand, in the most distinct manner, whenever the subject was alluded to, that I had no authority from the Government to employ him; and that if he received anything, that it must be altogether gratuitous on the part of the Government; that, considering the great opportunity that he, as an inventor, would have to introduce his patents to the world by the aid of the funds of the Government, I did not think it proper for him to make a charge for their application to the Princeton; in all of which he has concurrent, as far as I know, up to the time of the presentation of this extraordinary bill.—See 'BB' of 'Exhibit A.'

"In a letter from Captain Stockton to the petitioner, written in July, A. D. 1841, he says: 'In making up the estimate for the cost of the ship, it will be necessary to consider what must be put down for the use of your patent right. It will be necessary, therefore, for you to write me a letter stating your views on that subject. As a great effort has been made to get a ship built for the experiment, I think you had better say to me in your letter that your charge will hereafter be (if the experiment should prove successful) ; but, as this is the first trial on so large a scale, I am at liberty to use the patents, and after the ship is tried, Government may pay for their use in that ship whatever sum they may deem proper.' In reply to this letter, the petitioner, in a letter to Captain Stockton, dated the 28th day of July, A. D. 1841, said: 'I have duly received your communication on the subject of my patent right for the ship propeller and semi-cylindrical steam-engine; in reply to which I beg to propose that, in case these inventions should be applied to your intended steam frigate, all considerations relating to my charge for patent right be deferred until after the completion and trial of the said patent propeller and steam machinery. Should their success be such as to induce Government to continue the use of the patents for the Navy, I submit that I am entitled to some remuneration; but, considering the liberality that thus enables me to have the utility of the patents tested on a very large scale, and the advantages which cannot fail to be derived in consequence, I beg to state that whenever the efficiency of the intended machinery of your steam frigate shall have been duly tested, I shall be satisfied with whatever sum you may please to recommend, or the Government see fit to pay for the patent right.'—See 'No. 12' and 'No. 13,' of 'Exhibit A.'

"In a letter from Captain Stockton to the Secretary of the Navy, dated February 7, A. D. 1853, he refers to this letter of May 20, A. D. 1844, and, amongst other things, says: 'In that letter I stated the nature of Captain Ericsson's services and the extent of the Department's obligation to him, and admitted his claim to such compensation from the Government as, under the circumstances, he may be entitled to.'

"Time and reflection have not diminished, but rather increased, my estimate of the nature of Captain Ericsson's services, and I have now the honor to reiterate my former opinion, and further to say, that the Government should make him a fair and reasonable compensation for his time and expenses while engaged in superintending the construction of the Princeton's machinery." &c.

"The services rendered by the petitioner were reasonably worth the amount charged by him, to wit: the sum of $15,080.—See the deposition of Charles W. Copeland.

"The question now presented for our consideration is, whether, under these circumstances, the petitioner is entitled to relief. He has shown that it had been determined by the proper authority, in pursuance of law, to build the steamer Princeton, and that, to effect that object on the plan proposed, and on which she was in fact constructed, the very services rendered by the petitioner, to be performed either by him or some other person, were indispensable. It is insisted, however, that the services of the petitioner were rendered gratuitously. If this be true, then the petitioner's claim cannot be sustained.

"In support of the proposition that the petitioner's services were rendered gratuitously, it is urged, first, that he was not employed by any person duly authorized to employ him; and, second, that the testimony of Captain Stockton is direct and positive that they were thus rendered. Nemo presumitur donare; and this maxim applies with great force to a case like the present, where the object on which the bounty to be bestowed is a great and powerful Government, in possession of abundant means for all its legitimate purposes.

"That the determination to build the steamer Princeton, precisely on the plan on which she was built, was made by the proper authority, under an adequate appropriation, is not disputed, and is, in fact, indisputable. It is equally clear that it was not expected that her construction could be effected without an outlay of money. In order to carry out the object contemplated, it was necessary to employ proper agents, and to invest them with the authority requisite for the purpose. Accordingly we find the Secretary of the Navy giving orders to Captain Stockton to superintend the building of the steamer under the direction of the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and to make to him, from time to time, during the progress of the work, such suggestions as he might think proper. If, then, this order was obeyed, she was lawfully built, and everything done in connection with her construction was lawfully done.

"That the petitioner rendered the services for which he claims compensation is undisputed; but it is insisted that Captain Stockton had no authority to make such a request so as to entitle the petitioner to compensation, except under the direction of the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia. If this be true, and Captain Stockton made the request without the direction of the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, he was guilty of a violation of duty. And, moreover, if this direction was essential to the validity of such a request, then it was also essential to authorize Captain Stockton to accept the services of the petitioner, though tendered to him gratuitously. But it is to be presumed that Captain Stockton, in all that he did, acted in the line of his duty, and not in violation of it. No complaint has ever been made against him by the Government, whose agent he was; but, on the contrary, the payment of the petitioner's claim was made by the very authority under which Captain Stockton acted to depend upon his report. It must be intended, therefore, that, in making the request on which the petitioner's services were rendered, he acted by proper authority. If the direction of the commandant of the navy-yard at Philadelphia was necessary, it will be presumed. The Secretary of the Navy himself, in rejecting the petitioner's claim, recognized Captain Stockton as the trusted and duly authorized agent of the Government in the premises. There is, then, no room for question that what the petitioner did was lawfully done, and that his services were rendered at the request of an officer duly authorized to make it. He did not officiously intermeddle with the great public work which was going on. It would, indeed, be a most offensive imputation upon the characters of the honorable men under whose superintendence and direction it was carried on and completed, even to suppose that he could have done so if he had desired. The only point of inquiry, therefore, is, did the petitioner render his services gratuitously?

"The letter from Captain Stockton to the Secretary of the Navy, of the 20th May, A. D. 1844, is explained by his letter to the same officer, of the 7th February, A. D. 1853. If we take the former according to its strict literal interpretation, Captain Stockton may be understood not only as having denied that he had any authority to employ the petitioner, but also as having asserted that the petitioner volunteered his services, and rendered them gratuitously. But he did not mean either the one or the other, as is apparent from the consideration that if he did, the two letters would be in conflict with each other. In his letter of the 7th February, A. D. 1853, he expressly says, that in his letter of the 20th May, A. D. 1844, he stated 'the nature of Captain Ericsson's services, and the extent of the Department's obligation to him, and admitted his claim to such compensation from the Government as, under the circumstances, he may be entitled to.' He meant, therefore, in his letter of the 20th May, A. D. 1844, not only to state an obligation of some kind on the part of the Navy Department to the petitioner, but also to state the extent of that obligation, by admitting that he is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services. But this is wholly inconsistent with the idea that those services were rendered gratuitously. The first letter, therefore, is not to be literally interpreted. It may not be improper here to add, that the letter of the 7th February, A. D. 1853, was obviously designed to be explanatory of the former letter; and to remove all doubt as to his meaning, he, in conclusion, says: 'Time and reflection have not diminished, but rather increased, my estimate of Captain Ericsson's services; and I have now the honor to reiterate my former opinion, and further to say, that the Government should make him a fair and reasonable compensation for his time and expenses, while engaged in superintending the construction of the Princeton's machinery.' &c.

"With the first letter thus explained, the whole case is relieved from difficulty. If the Secretary of the Navy, when he received that letter, had understood it according to this explanation, he would not have rejected the petitioner's claim. When Captain Stockton wrote the letter of the 20th May, A. D. 1844, he was manifestly under an impression that the plaintiff was asserting a special contract for specified services at fixed prices; and he meant to state not only that no such contract had been made, but that he had no authority to make it. It is to such a contract that the whole of the first letter refers. We can very well understand that the petitioner would gladly have availed himself of such an opportunity 'to exhibit to the world the importance of his various patents,' and that to secure it he would have permitted his compensation to depend on the contingency of their success; but we do not suppose that Captain Stockton, or any one else, desired, that, if the result should be entirely successful, the United States should receive the benefit of the petitioner's services without compensation. Taking the two letters of Captain Stockton together, we have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the understanding between the petitioner and Captain Stockton was, that the petitioner should be permitted 'to exhibit to the world the importance of his various patents' in his own way and according to his own plans, and that he should receive just such compensation for his services as should be justified by the result. The petitioner agreed to accept a quantum meruit, dependent on the success of his labors.

"The petitioner admits the receipt of $1,150. He claims $15,080. We shall report to Congress a bill in his favor for the sum of $13,930."

Mr. STUART. If I have understood this case correctly, from the reading of the opinion of the court, it seems to me that the Senate ought to reject the bill as unanimously as the court have reported it. The case seems to show a few facts in connection which, to my mind, are conclusive. Congress made an appropriation for the construction of certain ships, and directed, of course, the Secretary of the Navy to order them to be built. He ordered one of them to be built under the superintendence of Captain Stockton, at a particular yard. Captain Stockton, it seems, consulted this petitioner; at the same time he said in his letter to him that whatever he did must be done gratuitously, for he had no authority to bind the Government at all. He but stated then what everybody knows, that an officer of the Navy, acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy simply to superintend the construction of a vessel, has no authority to make contracts without the consent and direction of the head of the Department.

It also appears that the petitioner had an object personal to himself in view, which was to advertise the efficiency of certain patents that he owned. The correspondence shows that it was regarded highly important to him, individually, that his patents should have an opportunity of being exhibited and tested on so large a scale as would be done by the construction of this vessel and their use in it. Now, he comes in, not to ask pay for his patents, but to ask pay for his services in superintending the construction of the machinery, which placed his patents in the ship and thus tested them and exhibited them to the world. If successful, he might well afford to pay the Government a large sum of money; if the result should be a failure, nobody but the Government was to suffer. The case, so far as regards his patents, presents exactly that state of things: that the Government tested his patents at its own expense, and at an enormous expense. If successful, it demonstrated to the world the usefulness of the patents, and was the best advertisement the owner could possibly have; if unsuccessful, the Government footed the bill; it cost him nothing but the time he spent in the superintendence.

The doctrine of a quantum meruit due to individuals who act under the request of an officer of the Navy or Army, without any authority, certainly will not do to establish in this Government. The Navy Department has rejected this claim, and rejected it upon the distinct proposition that there was no authority on the part of Captain Stockton to call on this individual at all; and the additional fact is presented that Captain Stockton stated in his first letter, that he gave the petitioner to understand that he had no authority to make contracts, that whatever he might do must be regarded as gratuitous, leaving it, it is true, to the discretion of Congress at any time to make him any compensation they might choose. On that state of facts, as I understand from the reading of the report, this court has decided that as a matter of law, the Government is under an implied obligation to pay this man, upon the principle of a quantum meruit. It seems to me that it is a case where Congress ought unanimously to reject the claim upon general principles in the first place, and in the next place, from the nature of the facts incident to the very case itself. He has been benefited largely, it seems, by using the Government as the means of advertising his patents to the world. I may, perhaps, not have understood the case; but I paid as close attention as I could to the reading of the opinion, and it seems to me that the opinion develops precisely the state of facts which I have stated. If so, I beg leave to conclude with the repetition of the remark that the principle of the claim is unsound as a legal proposition; and as applied to the facts of this particular case, there is no equity against the Government of the United States.

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to ask for the postponement of the case, because the Senator from Florida, who is a member of the Committee on Claims, [Mr. MALLORY,] and takes some interest in the bill, and understands the matter, is sick today.

Mr. STUART. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Michigan cannot have distinctly understood the reading of the opinion, or he would not have come to the conclusion to which he has come. There was some confusion and noise, and I think he must have misunderstood some part of the evidence.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

CHRISTINE BARNARD.

The bill (S. No. 91) to continue a pension to Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to continue upon the pension roll, at the rate of thirty dollars per month, from and after July 4, 1857, when her pension expired, the name of Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, captain in company H, regiment of volunteers, who was twice wounded in planting the American colors upon the parapet of Chapultepec, while storming that fortress, and who died from disease contracted in, and greatly enhanced by hardships and fatigue of, the Mexican campaign. This pension is to be held by her, or by her children, in accordance with existing laws in reference to the widows and children of those who died from wounds or disease received or contracted during the Mexican war.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to know if this bill is continuing a pension to this lady, and then to the children. If so, it is carrying the pension laws beyond anything I have known. May I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions what it means?

Mr. JONES. The bill does not come from the Committee on Pensions, but from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PUGH. Let the last clause of the bill be read.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. PUGH. I understand that when pensions are granted for five years the first time, there is a provision by which children, in a certain event, may get the benefit; but I am not aware of any case in which, where we have continued the pension beyond the first five years, we have made the same provision. Wherever we have continued a pension beyond that time by an act of Congress, we have continued it simply to the widow during her life or widowhood. I think this a new precedent, and should like to have the bill lie over.

Mr. IVERSON. I think the Senator from Ohio is mistaken. The bill only provides for the continuance of the pension for five years, if I understand it, and not during her life, or for all time to come.

Mr. PUGH. But it is a continuance of a former pension. The general law gives a five years' pension, and a right to have that pension renewed at the Pension Office.

Mr. IVERSON. But this does not come under the general law. This lady is not entitled to a pension under the general law now existing. This is an exceptional case altogether. Her pension expired on the 1st of July last, and this is to continue it for five years longer, on account of the peculiar circumstances of her case. It is not a case in which she can get a pension by going to the Pension Office. It appeals to the equitable consideration of Congress, to the bounty and generosity of Congress, to continue her pension.

Mr. KING. There are several cases like this before the Committee on Pensions; and a member of that committee, to whom those applications have been referred, is in communication with the Commissioner of Pensions, with a view to some general proposition on the subject, if a reasonable one can be had; and therefore I move that this bill lie over. It is desirable that a uniform rule should be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I think this is a very hard case, and that the bill is a just one. Why not pass it? If any general law is necessary, as I suppose it may be, we can pass it without delaying this bill. If it goes over, it is possible no action may be taken at all. The lady has been left a widow with helpless children, one of whom is paralyzed. Her husband rendered important service to the country, and lost his life in consequence of it. I think it a very hard case, and we ought to pass the bill. It only extends the pension for five years, as I understand. I do not know the widow or her children. Some fifteen or twenty years ago I knew Mr. Barnard. At that time he was a resident of Philadelphia. I hope that the case will not be put over, but that the bill will be passed.

Mr. KING. I know nothing, of course, of this case in particular; but there are a great many of these cases that address themselves very strongly to the sympathy of the Senate, and it was deemed desirable by the Committee on Pensions to obtain some general rule if they could.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not acquainted with the merits of this case particularly, but I hope the bill will not be passed over lightly. It may be to us an unimportant matter, but to the individuals it is very important. Not only their comfort, but their lives may depend upon it; and I sincerely hope the Senate will pass the bill. For my own part, I shall vote for it cheerfully.

Mr. IVERSON. I am very sure that if the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York understood the merits of this case, they would not ask for the postponement. I see no reason for the postponement. Senators can as well understand the merits of the case to-day, as if they were to investigate it for a thousand years. Major Barnard was an officer during the Mexican war, of exceeding merit. The bill states some of his merits. He was wounded in planting the colors on the parapet of Chapultepec. He was one of the storming party at Chapultepec, and was the first to place the American colors on the parapet of that fortress, and in doing so he received a very severe wound. Perhaps there was no more gallant man in the whole service of the United States than Major Barnard. He has died, leaving a widow and three or four helpless children perfectly dependent. They are not worth a dollar in the world; they have nothing to support them except the mere bounty of the Government and the charity of friends. One of the children, a boy now of some fourteen or fifteen years of age, is paralyzed, and is as helpless as an infant, and depends entirely on the nursing of his mother for his support and protection. She is a penniless widow; and, under the circumstances, I think the case appeals very strongly to the generosity of Congress. She was originally allowed a pension by a special act of Congress. She was not entitled to it under the rules and regulations which pertain to pensions generally at the Pension Office, because her husband was not killed in battle, though he died in the service. He died from the effects of wounds, but not in battle. She appealed to Congress for a pension; it was granted by a special enactment which expired last year; and now we only ask that it shall be continued to her for five years more. I trust the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the passage of this bill; but on the contrary I am decidedly in favor of it, as I am in favor of nearly all the bills for the widows and orphans of those who have died in fighting the battles of the country. Almost every day appeals are made to me by widows to report bills and make special cases for them. I am certain the Committee on Pensions have at least a dozen or more such cases before them. They have been referred to a member of the committee, the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER.] He is investigating the matter thoroughly; and the committee desire, if possible, to frame a general bill which will embrace the widow and children of officers and soldiers who have died in consequence of wounds received in the service. I would prefer to have this bill postponed, or referred to the Committee on Pensions, in order that it may share the same fate as the other cases, and that we may deal with all alike.

Mr. PUGH. This bill was read a second time to-day, I understand, and cannot pass to a third reading if there is an objection made. I can see nothing in this bill to distinguish it from others, and I think it may as well lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the postponement.

Mr. HOUSTON. This bill is now ready for its passage through the Senate, and I do not see any necessity for postponing it to suit the convenience of a general bill, when in reality we may pass this bill in a short time; so that, if the general bill does not pass, this widow may yet receive the pension. The honorable Senator from Iowa proposes to embrace the widow in the general bill. To that I see no objection, but I am for embracing the children also in the provisions of the bill. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. KING. As a more brief disposition of this matter, I will waive the motion to postpone. The Senator from Ohio objects to its third reading, and it goes over as a matter of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That point is not yet reached. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate, and then the question will be on ordering it to be engrossed. If that be carried, the third reading can be objected to, and that will postpone it.

Mr. PUGH. It will not be in order, I understand, to commit this bill after it has been ordered to its third reading. ["Oh, yes."] I do not doubt that this is a very proper case for a pension; but there are twenty other cases equally proper, equally meritorious, which have been referred regularly to the Committee on Pensions. We have not had any report on them. The committee say they are maturing a general proposition, and that they decline acting in individual cases. The only difference is, that this bill has traveled through the Committee on Military Affairs, instead of the Committee on Pensions. If we have a Committee on Pensions, this subject belongs to them; and I say, without meaning to detract from this case, that on reading the bill, I do not find that this gentleman died from his wounds; I do not find that he died during the Mexican war. It is said that he died from disease contracted during the war, but his death was afterwards. It does not say that he died in consequence of those wounds. I do not doubt that it is a proper enough case for a pension; but I see no reason why it should be preferred to other cases equally meritorious. I want the Committee on Pensions either to report back all these bills, and let us go on with them, or else to bring up a general bill, and let us pass it. I see no reason why one petitioner should be placed in advance of the others, simply by referring her petition to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is my reason for objecting to the progress of the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I will say to the Senator from Ohio, that this bill was introduced at the last Congress, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and reported back by that committee, and it then passed this body, but failed in the other House for want of time to consider it. It is no fault of the petitioner that the bill has come from the Committee on Military Affairs. The fact that an improper direction has been given to it ought not to prejudice her case.

The whole argument of the Senator is, that because his cases do not come up, this one shall not come up. Is that generous? This case, by order of the Senate, not by the committee or at the instance of the petitioner, has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and the Committee on Military Affairs has acted promptly—perhaps more promptly than the Committee on Pensions—and reported the bill back. Is that any fault of the Military Committee? Is it any fault of the petitioner? When her case is brought up, is it to be postponed because the Committee on Pensions do not act promptly and report other cases? I do not think that is a very fair mode of proceeding. If there are merits in the case; if this party has this question up in its order when she has it before the Senate by legitimate means—and certainly it is not illegitimate to send it to the Committee on Military Affairs—I ask if it would not be hard now to postpone it? Why should you postpone it? Merely because there are other cases that have not been presented to the Senate! Let each be decided on its own merits as it comes up before the Senate, according to the rules of the body. I can see no reason why this bill should be postponed until other cases shall also have a chance to be heard. The other cases are before the appropriate committee, and that committee are acting on them. They will act on them in due time; but because they do not act as promptly as Senators desire, that is no reason why the business of another committee which does act promptly shall be postponed and put down in its progress through this body.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me the Senator has failed to comprehend the point of my objection. We all understand how matters are referred to a committee. A petition is presented, or a bill brought in on notice or without notice, and it is always referred to the committee to which the Senator presenting it proposes to refer it. The question is what jurisdiction the Committee on Military Affairs has over pensions? None at all. Two thirds of our pensions are granted to the widows of officers, either of the Army or of the Navy. If the Committee on Military Affairs, merely because the gentleman who is deceased was an officer of the Army, is to take jurisdiction of military pensions, and the Committee on Naval Affairs on the same ground to take jurisdiction of navy pensions, what is the use of the Committee on Pensions? We had better abolish it; and therefore, without meaning it in any disrespectful sense, I say the bill is not legitimately before the Senate. It has not come through the proper committee. I do not ask that this lady's case shall be kept back because other cases have not been heard; but I say the Committee on Pensions have notified us, through two of their members, that they design to report a general act for all these cases; and why, then, should not this lady's case come under the general act?

I do not dispute that it is a meritorious case so far as I can see from the bill; but I do not see any special merit there stated above twenty other cases. I have interposed, I am sure, not from any lack of generosity, but from a disposition to have justice done to all parties. I am satisfied that if we let one and another of these special cases go through, we shall never have a general law passed; but if you keep them back you will have a general law matured on sound principles, and you will get meritorious cases passed. If you let one and another go through specially, it will be cited as a precedent the next day, and you will never see your general bill.

Mr. CLAY. I concur fully in what has been said by the Senator from Ohio; but he did not make the motion which I thought he would make, to refer the bill to the Committee on Pensions. I now make that motion; and I hope it will prevail. That committee, as has been suggested, have had under consideration a general bill to embrace all such cases. They have not matured the bill because they have not been satisfied whether it would be better to renew all such pensions for five years or to make them life pensions, as is the case of the widows of Navy officers; but I do not intend to commit myself to either of those propositions.

As to there being any peculiar merits in this case, or any of them, I cannot see it; it is all a pure gratuity. They have no claim whatever upon the Government; and if I understand the Senator from Georgia aright, this lady has already enjoyed a pension for five years, which is more than has been accorded to many other petitioners before this body; and inasmuch as she has enjoyed the bounty of the Government for five years, she now comes and predicates upon that a claim, as of right, to a continuance of this bounty.

One great objection I have to the whole pension system is that there is no consistency, no symmetry, no form, no method about it. It is all a system of pure favoritism. One person, perhaps less meritorious than many others, who can secure the support of some active friend in this body, and who may divert her petition from the proper committee to which it belongs, and carry it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the Committee on Military Affairs, may get a bill reported in her behalf, and it may pass; while many others, which are subjected to the severer scrutiny of the Committee on Pensions, are disappointed. I wish to see some system preserved; I wish to see some general legislation, instead of this continual private legislation for individuals, adopted. If this bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions, I think it probable that a majority of them will report some general bill which will embrace this case. At all events, it should not be made an exception to the general rule of referring all such bills and petitions to the Committee on Pensions. I trust that reference will be given to it. I move so to refer the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know who presented this case; I do not know how it went to the Committee on Military Affairs; but it was taken up in that committee, carefully considered, and the report made, I think with the unanimous concurrence of the committee, as a just case. It is here, and I think legitimately here. I think it a good case—a just one; and I see no reason why it should be recommitted, and the bill lost, because Senators desire a general law. Let us pass this bill; and let the Committee on Pensions report a general bill, or make special reports in the several cases. If they report a general bill, we shall give it a fair consideration. It may or may not pass. I doubt very much whether any such bill will pass this body or the other House. If they report on the special cases referred to them, I hope we shall consider each and all those cases on their merits; but it seems to me that no stronger case can be brought before the Senate than the present one, and I hope the Senate will pass it; and then that the committee, at some future time, will report the other special cases which are meritorious, or report a general bill covering them all.

Mr. IVERSON. I can see no reason why this bill should be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I do not see that the Committee on Pensions can do it any more justice than has been done to it by the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported all the facts in the case, and they are before the Senate. The Committee on Pensions may have more ability to elucidate the facts than the Committee on Military Affairs. I am willing to yield them superior claims in this respect; but I do not know that even with their superior ability, if they have it, they can present the facts in a clearer light than has been done by the report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

What is the object of referring it to the Committee on Pensions? If the object is to let it stand until a general bill is brought in, that object can be accomplished by simply laying this bill on the table for the present, or postponing it until the Committee on Pensions introduce a general bill. If the object be to investigate the facts to enlighten the Senate more than it is already enlightened, I shall object to that, because I do not think it is in the power of the committee to do it; and I think it would be a useless waste of time.

The Senator from Alabama has somewhat rebuked the Committee on Military Affairs, and other gentlemen have done the same thing, for taking jurisdiction of this case. The fact is, that jurisdiction was imposed on the committee by the Senate. But let us see how far the Committee on Pensions is itself entitled to be exempt from rebuke. I have before me a petition relating to the claim of Robert Dixon, of the Kentucky volunteers, for an increase of pension. We should suppose that that properly belonged to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Pensions. It is an application for an increase of the pension of a Kentucky volunteer, precisely the same as the bill under consideration. What was done with that petition? It is very extraordinary that this Committee on Pensions, which wants to draw within its jurisdiction all these cases, should have acted as they did in this case. I find this entry on the petition:

"1857. December 22.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions, with bill S. No. 23.

"1858. January 25.—Committee on Pensions discharged, and the case referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia."

You refer these cases to the Committee on Pensions and they will not take jurisdiction, but come back and ask the Senate to be discharged from their consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and now they rebuke the Military Committee, because they have taken jurisdiction, under an order of the Senate, of a bill granting a pension to a widow. I hope the motion will not be sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STUART. I fear we shall be without a quorum. I ask for the yeas and nays, so that we may know whether there is a quorum here.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 13, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Collamer, Evans, Fessenden, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pugh, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Crittenden, Dixon, Doollittle, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iversen, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—24.

So the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Pensions was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the bill read the third time to-day.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

GEORGE A. O'BRIEN.

The bill (S. No. 92) for the relief of George A. O'Brien was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment of $549 33 to George A. O'Brien, for his services as clerk in the office of the Second Auditor, from the 5th of July, 1845, to the 3d of March, 1846.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

NAHUM WARD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 94) for the relief of Major Benjamin Alvord.

Mr. IVERSON. I see on the Calendar, before that, an adverse report by the Committee on Claims, on one of the cases from the Court of Claims—that of Nahum Ward. I ask that that case be considered, and the judgment of the Senate taken on it. The law establishing the Court of Claims requires that all the bills reported by it shall go on the docket, and remain there until disposed of. This bill was reported by the Court of Claims for the relief of this individual; but the Committee on Claims have made an adverse report. I desire that that adverse report shall be considered by the Senate, and passed upon. In order to do that, at the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MASON. What is the bill?

Mr. IVERSON. The bill for the relief of Nahum Ward.

Mr. PUGH. Let us hear the bill. What is it? The Secretary read the bill (S. No. 93) for the relief of Nahum Ward.

It provides for paying to Nahum Ward, of Marietta, Ohio, the sum of $67,678 27, in full for that amount due on forty-three loan office certificates of the United States, dated December 23, 1777.

Mr. PUGH. I have never looked into the bill, and know nothing about it; but a constituent of mine has desired me to look into it, and if there be no objection, I ask that the bill may lie over. I have not had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. IVERSON. I withdraw my motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. PUGH. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJOR BENJAMIN ALVORD.

The bill (S. No. 94) for the relief of Major Benjamin Alvord, paymaster United States Army, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It will be a direction to the Secretary of War to ascertain and pay the value of the property lost by Major Benjamin Alvord, paymaster in the United States Army, who was on board the steamship Southerner, on the 27th of December, 1854, when she was wrecked near Cape Flattery, in Washington Territory; but no allowance is to be made for any property except such as was necessary and proper for, and is usually carried by, such officers while on such voyages, and ordered on distant service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

CREEK DEPREDACTIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians.

Mr. STUART. I suppose it is of no use to consider that bill to-day.

Mr. CLAY. Do you not call that a private bill?

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone it until to-morrow. Let us consider those bills which are not contested.

The motion was agreed to.

DEMPEY PITTMAN.

The bill (S. No. 95) explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Dempsey Pittman," approved August 16, 1856, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the act of August 16, 1856, shall be so construed as to direct the Secretary of War to pay to Dempsey Pittman the compensation and allowances of a colonel of infantry for five months, in full consideration for his services in Florida in 1838.

Mr. KING. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. Weller on the 7th of February, 1857:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Dempsey Pittman, having had the same under consideration, report:

At the last session of Congress an act was passed (approved August 16, 1856,) authorizing the Secretary of War "to pay Dempsey Pittman such compensation and allowances as may be found to be justly due him for his military services in Florida in the year 1838: Provided, That the amount shall in no case exceed the pay of a colonel of infantry for five months." The evidence then before the committee was satisfactory that the petitioner had served as a colonel of infantry in Florida in 1838, from May to November—five months or more. It is of record in the War Department, that Dempsey Pittman served as colonel of infantry during October, 1838, and the affidavit of Quartermaster Thomas M. Brush shows that the petitioner also served the residue of the time for which he claims payment; that the pay-rolls were lost by him (the said Brush,) and also that Pittman was never paid for any period of his service. With this proof before the committee, and other testimony corroborating it, the bill for the petitioner's relief was reported to the Senate, and subsequently passed by both Houses of Congress.

The petitioner states that, on the passage of said act, he applied for settlement and payment of his accounts as a colonel of infantry for five months, as provided for in the act. The Second Auditor of the Treasury, the proper accounting officer in the premises, allowed and passed his account as such colonel from 20th May to 19th October, 1838—a period of five months; but the Secretary of War, to whom this decision was referred for confirmation, decided that the petitioner was not entitled to pay and allowances for any longer period than was shown by the evidence in the War Department, viz: for the month of October, 1838. An appeal is therefore taken from the Secretary's decision. The committee are aware that no legislation was necessary to pay the one month's services as shown by the rolls; and they intended, in passing the act referred to above, to allow the petitioner the pay and allowances of a colonel of infantry for five months; and, having reexamined this case, are fully satisfied with their former decision, and consequently report an explanatory act as prayed for, and recommend its passage.

SUSANNA T. LEA.

The bill (S. No. 96) for the relief of Susanna T. Lea, widow and administratrix of James Maglenen, late of the city of Baltimore, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of James Maglenen $130, being the value of a horse and equipments belonging to him, which were impressed in September, 1814, for the purpose of sending an express to North Point, and lost in that service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEAF, DUMB, AND BLIND.

The bill (S. No. 99) to amend the "Act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that, in addition to the provision made in the act of February 16, 1857, for the maintenance and tuition of pupils in the institution, the sum of $3,000 per annum, payable quarterly, shall be allowed, for five years, for the payment of salaries and incidental expenses of the institution; and the bill appropriates $3,000 for the present fiscal year.

It is further provided that the deaf and dumb and the blind children of all persons in the military and naval service of the United States, while such persons are actually in the service, shall be entitled to instruction in this institution on the same terms as deaf and dumb and blind children belonging to the District of Columbia. All receipts and disbursements under this act are to be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, as required in the sixth section of the act to which it is an amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed?"

Mr. IVERSON. It is with some reluctance that I make any opposition to this bill, and I do not intend to make a speech on the subject; but it appropriates money out of the Treasury for an unconstitutional purpose. If it was a mere act of incorporation, I should not object, but I do not think Congress has the constitutional power to appropriate money in this way. I wish to record my vote against it, and I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have the materials before me in relation to this institution throughout, but I do not think it necessary to trouble the Senate with them. The action of the Government, I think, has very satisfactorily settled this matter in relation to the insane. We have appropriated several hundreds of thousands of dollars to create an insane asylum in this District, and it was for a noble and benevolent purpose—one clearly within our power. I voted for that with great pleasure, and I shall vote for this upon the very same grounds. The people of this District stand in relation to Congress as the people of the States do to their Legislatures; we exercise the same power and control over them that the State Legislatures do over their people. I hope the bill will pass. I shall not take up the time of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Clay, Green, Iverson, King, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, and Slidell—10.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to inquire from some person familiar with this matter, whether this is a private or public institution; whether it is under the direction of the Government, or the direction of private individuals?

Mr. HAMLIN. Private individuals.

Mr. BIGGS. And this is an appropriation of money for the purpose of assisting private individuals, I understand, in carrying out the charity of this institution.

The bill was passed.

ELIZABETH MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. No. 30) for the relief of Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Hugh Montgomery, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with an amendment to add,

And that the said sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

So that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Elizabeth Montgomery, daughter and sole heir of Captain Hugh Montgomery, of the ship Nancy, of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, the sum of $5,000, as a full compensation for his successful efforts in saving the powder and munitions of war belonging to the United States on board the said ship, and for his interest in the value of the said ship, which he blew up to prevent her and her cargo from falling into the hands of the enemy during the war of the Revolution; and that the said sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that that bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. I see no reason why it should be postponed, unless some Senator desires to debate it. It is a bill of extraordinary merit; the services of the father of the party in whose favor the bill is, were of an extraordinary character, and, I think, if any Senator will read the details of the testimony he will be perfectly satisfied that the bill ought to have passed long ago. It was reported at the last session.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have some recollection of having examined it then, and I am not prepared to vote for it. I prefer that it should go over.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

JOHN M'NIEL.

The bill (S. No. 100) releasing to the legal representatives of John McNiel, deceased, the title of the United States to a certain tract of land, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the title of the United States to island No. 4, of section nineteen, in township seven north, of range five west, and the islets adjacent thereto, situated in Michigan, shall be released to the legal representatives of John McNiel, deceased, the island having been in the occupancy of him, and of those from whom he purchased it, since 1832; but this is not to be construed so as to interfere with the rights of third parties.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

BENEVOLENT CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 97) to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington City.

It provides that each of the Christian churches in the city of Washington, without distinction of sect or creed, may, on or before the last day of August of each and every year, appoint one person, and that the person so appointed, and their successors, shall be a body-politic and corporate, under the name and style of "The Benevolent Christian Association of Washington City," with the usual powers incident to a corporation. The purpose of the association is to relieve the wants of the suffering poor.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment providing that the corporation should not hold property of more than two hundred thousand dollars in value, and also proposed the following additional sections:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the said corporation to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or any other evidence of debt, to be used as a currency.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That each of the corporations in said corporation shall be held liable, in his individual capacity, for all the debts and liabilities of said corporation, however contracted or incurred, to be recovered by suit, as other debts or liability, before any court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That Congress may, at any time hereafter, alter, amend, or repeal the foregoing act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise for the purpose of making a statement which, I presume, is to be regarded as in the nature of a personal explanation. I notice, in the official journal of yesterday, a publication signed "Texas," in regard to which I have a few words to say. My political and personal character is open to animadversion by anybody; but of my official acts I have a particular care.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks the consent of the Senate that he may proceed to make some remarks on the subject indicated by him. This requires the unanimous consent of the Senate. If no objection be made, the Senator will proceed with his remarks. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. On Monday last I presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Texas during the past month. For the better understanding of the remarks which I have to make, I will read the resolutions:

"SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That whereas, divers charges have been made against John C. Watrous, district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Texas, before the House of Representatives of the United States, with a view to his impeachment, and a committee of said House have reported the following resolution: 'Resolved, That John C. Watrous, United States district judge for the district of Texas, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors;' and it is required for the honor of the State of Texas, and is due to the accused, that all of said charges be promptly and fully investigated and finally acted upon: that without intending to express any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Judge John C. Watrous, the representatives in Congress from this State are hereby requested to take such steps as may be necessary to cause a full investigation to be made by the House of Representatives of the United States, during the present session, of all the charges that have been made against said John C. Watrous, and to use their best exertions to cause definite action to be taken thereon.

"Sec. 2. Be it further resolved, That the Governor is hereby requested to forward to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and also to said John C. Watrous, a certified copy of this joint resolution."

These resolutions having been transmitted to me, in pursuance of the direction contained in them, I presented them to the Senate. I made no remarks upon them; I presented them in the ordinary course of business. Unless it was intended that I should make some disposition of them, there was certainly no use in sending them to me; and the only course left for me was to submit them to the Senate. I did so, without expressing any opinion, or giving any intimation, as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. The article in the official paper, to which I have alluded, says:

"In presenting these resolutions in the Senate, Mr. Houston must have misapprehended their purport. Under the Constitution, the Senate is the body to try an impeachment when one is preferred by the House of Representatives."

That I was fully aware of.

"In this instance, the Legislature of Texas did not instruct their Senator to seek to have the charges against Judge Watrous investigated, or to do anything else inconsistent with the delicacy of his position as the contingent judicial trier of the accused."

Did I do anything derogatory to my position, as one of the triers of the accused, in simply discharging the duty of presenting the resolutions to the Senate of the United States, without expressing any opinion as to his guilt or innocence? I think not. The article continues:

"They requested their Representatives in Congress to use their exertions to have these accusations investigated during the present session, without intending to express any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Judge J. C. Watrous, in the very words of their resolutions."

I cannot see that it was necessary to call in question, and bring before the notice of the public, an act performed by me, in the discharge of my official duty in this body, as if I had done anything that could prejudice the individual to whom the resolutions refer. I think I acted with propriety and with delicacy. The subject is an important one, and the people of Texas desire to have it determined. I know not that this officer has been guilty of any offense, nor have I charged him with any; but the subject has caused excitement and agitation in Texas for the last ten years. It has claimed the attention of the Legislature of that State, and is of impressive interest to her people. At the recent session of the Legislature, when one House was about acting on the subject, the accused addressed a letter to that body, expressing his desire to have an investigation; and therefore, if, by presenting these resolutions, I sought to give forwardness to the investigation, I was only acting in accordance with the wishes of the Legislature and the views of the accused, as submitted to that body.

Judge Watrous is a high judicial functionary, whose jurisdiction controls the interests and the lives of the citizens of Texas under the Federal aegis. It is due to him and the people of Texas that he should have an opportunity of vindicating his character before the world; so that, if the charges against him be false, he may be restored to that confidence which is so necessary to a high judicial magistrate. If, on the contrary, the people have suffered under judicial tyranny, redress should be afforded. But, sir, in presenting the resolutions of the Legislature, I forbore the expression of any opinion, if I had one, in relation to his guilt or innocence. I intend that, in presenting them, I was only discharging my duty. I presume that the person who penned this article is not very favorable to an investigation. All that is desired is a hearing—not a condemnation in advance of that hearing.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after sometime spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 19, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but before that motion is put I wish to offer a resolution that all debate upon the Indian appropriation bill be terminated tomorrow, at two o'clock, p. m.

Mr. HOARD. I rise to a question of privilege. I have received a letter, which, if read to the House, I suppose will explain that question. I desire to have it read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the letter, which is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 18, 1858.

SIR: You took occasion, on last Friday, in the House of Representatives, from the Clerk's desk, to report to said House, from the New York Tribune, a false and foul slander against me, the tenor of which you know without a repetition from me.

The charges therein set forth, if true, would disqualify me from a seat on the floor of this Congress.

You reported the slander without any provocation on my part. I knew nothing of you, said nothing about you, nor of any member on your side.

The paragraph had no name to it, and you refused to indorse it. I pronounced it then, as I do now, a falsehood of the foulest kind. If you suspicion that I am guilty of the crime of being bribed, as set forth, I ask you to examine into the truth or falsity. If you find I am innocent, it is most certainly due to me that you rise in your place and set me right.

I await your response.

Yours,

JOS. BURNS.

Hon. C. B. HOARD.

Mr. HOARD. I desire to respond to that letter.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is no question of privilege to be brought before the House. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. HOARD. I desire the Speaker to decide if this is not a question of privilege—if I have not the right to respond to that letter?

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman can respond by writing another one. I object.

The SPEAKER. As the matter is presented to the Chair now, he does not perceive that a question of privilege is raised by the letter at all.

Mr. HOARD. Is it not a letter threatening in its character? Is it not a letter calculated to intimidate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now insist on my motion.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me a moment while I report to the House a bill to pay the deficiencies in the printing, lithographing, and engraving, the failure to provide for which is a matter of very great complaint upon the part of the men to whom we are indebted.

Mr. HOARD. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot yield.

Mr. HOARD. I desire, if the House will not give me consent to make a personal explanation, to take a respectful appeal from the decision of the Chair. I however first ask the House to grant consent as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BURNETT. I object, because the gentleman can make his response in another way.

Mr. HOARD. I withdraw my appeal.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to know if it is a friend of the author of that letter who makes objection to a response?

Mr. FLORENCE. I object, except in the way—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order upon either side of the House.

Mr. HOARD. Another word, if you please.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. BILLINGHURST demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Blair, Bliss, Boccock, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemons, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Collins, Coming, Corde, Burton, Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dodd, Edie, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Penton, Florence, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Gooch, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Haykins, Jackson, Jewett, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Landy, Macfarlane, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Millson, Oliver A. Morse, Pendleton, Pettit, Phillips, Pottle, Quinlan, Ready, Ricard, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Searing, Shorter, Spinner, Stephens, Talbot, Thayer, Underwood, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus K. Wright, and Zollacofer—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Billingham, Bishop, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Cobb, James Craig, Curry, Damrell, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Doyell, Durfee, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lorejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Merrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Sawdage, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, Tappan, George Taylor, Miller Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wilson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—82.

So Mr. DAVIS's motion was agreed to.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, stated that Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was detained from the House by severe indisposition.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES to terminate debate in committee on the Indian appropriation bill to-morrow, at two o'clock.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES called the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. At two o'clock to-morrow, when the House has agreed to adjourn over until Tuesday!

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is all right.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I demand the previous question, and decline to modify my motion. Two o'clock to-morrow will answer my purpose.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his motion, and say two o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That motion takes precedence.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion, and allow the committees to report private bills. Let us consume the morning hour in that way.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I object to debate.

Mr. CHAFFEE. There is now more upon the Calendar than we can dispose of in two weeks, and I must insist upon my motion to go into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAFFEE's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. STANTON in the chair,) and proceeded to consider bills and reports upon the Private Calendar.

JOSEPH STOKELY AND OTHERS.

The first case upon the Calendar, which was taken up, was an adverse report (C. C. No. 109) upon the petition of Joseph Stokely and others, heirs of Nehemiah Stokely.

Mr. COVODE. I move that that report be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask to have the opinion of the committee in that case read.

Mr. PHELPS. This being objection day, I will object to that bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken. This is only the third, and not the fourth Friday of the month.

The opinion of the court was read, and is as follows:

"This claim is presented by the heirs-at-law of Nehemiah Stokely, who is alleged to have been a captain in the army of the Revolution. It should have been prosecuted by the administrator of Stokely; but we shall at present examine the case in relation to the statutes of limitation.

"The following facts are stated in the petition: Nehemiah Stokely died in the year 1792. He was commissioned by Congress a captain in the eighth Pennsylvania regiment, in the continental service, in the war of the Revolution, and served as such until the end of the war, or until he was reduced or retired. By the resolution of Congress of October 21, 1780, it was provided that the officers who should continue in service to the end of the war should be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of their reduction. By the resolution of March 22, 1783, it was provided that officers then in service, and who should continue therein until the end of the war, should be entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay in money, or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient, instead of the half pay promised for life by the resolution of October 21, 1780. By the resolution of March 8, 1785, it was provided that the officers who retired under the resolve of December 31, 1780, are equally entitled to the half pay or commutation with those officers who retired under the resolve of the 3d and 21st of October, 1780. The petitioner states that neither the half pay nor commutation provided for in the foregoing resolves has ever been paid, but remain still due; and that the claim was presented to Congress in the year 1848.

"The question in this case is, whether the claim is not barred by the resolutions and statutes of limitations. We have already made two decisions upon this point: one in the case of Chamberlain vs. The United States, and the other in the case of Marnay vs. The United States. This case is identical in this particular with those two cases; and as the resolutions and statutes upon this subject were stated at length in the opinions delivered in those two cases, it is unnecessary now to recapitulate them. It is not alleged or proved that the claim in this case was presented at the Treasury before the 1st day of May, 1794. In accordance with the decisions in the cases mentioned, this claim is now barred by the statute of limitations, and the claimant has no cause of action against the United States."

Mr. COVODE. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the merits of this case were not considered before the court, but that the plea of limitations was applied to it. Now, Mr. Chairman, the claimant, who is a constituent of mine, is debarred by the action of the Court of Claims, simply because his father never put in his claim; nor did he do so while he was in circumstances to dispense with it. I send to the Clerk's desk a paper, which I ask to have read.

The paper was read, as follows:

"Mr. STANTON, from the committee appointed to inquire whether, and if any, what, description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law, made the following report:

"That all claims for services rendered and supplies furnished or done, prior to the 4th of March, 1789, are barred by sundry resolutions of Congress, passed in the years 1785 and 1787, and by laws of the United States passed 2d February, 1793, and on the 3d March, 1795, and on the 9th July, 1798. Your committee are of opinion that justice and sound policy require that all just and equitable claims against the United States, which are thus barred, should be fully paid and satisfied; we therefore recommend the following resolution: "Resolved, That all just and equitable claims against the United States, for services rendered and supplies furnished during the revolutionary war with Great Britain, and for loan office certificates, final settlement certificates, indents of interest, and balances credited on the books of the Treasury, which are now barred by any law of the United States, ought to be provided for by law."

Mr. COVODE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I only ask that this case shall be decided on its merits. I want to see whether the Government will establish the principle of pleading the statute of limitation against just claims. There appears to be no question as to the justice of this claim, and the only difficulty about it is as to the limitation. I wish to have the case reported back to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I ask to have read the decision of the Court of Claims in the other case referred to in this report. The decision does not refer to the laws or recite the facts, but only states that it is based upon the grounds set forth in another decision. I ask that that decision may be referred to and read, in order that the committee may be in possession of the facts and understand the principles involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana will please indicate the case that the report is in.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. The decision itself states it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk advises the Chair that the report is not before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Then I suggest the propriety of having the case laid over till we have the other report before us, because this decision does not state the facts or grounds on which the ruling is made.

Mr. DAVIDSON. What is the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. That the report of the Court of Claims be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it be committed to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I have a suggestion to make to my friend from Pennsylvania. If he desires to have anything done with that claim he had better not send it to the Committee of Claims; because he would want to have the evidence, the law, the equity, and the inspiration of Almighty God to get anything from that committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, those who know my worthy friend from Louisiana, [Mr. Davidson,] will probably appreciate his remark as a mere jest; but it will go to the country as a reflection on the members of the Committee of Claims; and, as a member of that committee, I must protest against his remark as unjust. It is too severe a charge to make in jest, and there is nothing to justify any such remark in respect to that committee. I take it that every member of it acts from the same motive as the gentleman from Louisiana does, and acts conscientiously; and if they see proper not to have so loose a hand as to grant every claim presented, I think that that is no just cause to stand up and charge that committee as the gentleman from Louisiana has done.

Mr. DAVIDSON. It is time enough for the gentleman to take offense when any reflection is made upon him. I have made none. This is the judgment of the Court of Claims against this claim; and if I have made any charge against the Committee of Claims, I am myself as much implicated in it as is the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Moore.] It shows too much sensitiveness on his part to appropriate all the action of the committee to himself.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Davidson] in the same light in which they seem to have been understood by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Moore.] I belong to the same Committee of Claims; and I supposed that the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana would be understood by the country in a highly complimentary sense; in the sense that we were the vigilant and faithful watch-dogs, the Cerberus of the Treasury; that we would allow no claim to pass unless it came before us with the highest authentication. I hope that the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Moore] will not be understood by those who will read them as meaning that any such intimation could possibly be displeasing to any member of that committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I consider the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana in the same light in which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Maynard] has been pleased to consider them. I think them complimentary to the Committee of Claims, as showing that that committee is not disposed to report favorably on claims unless compelled to do so from the evidence submitted to the committee.

I presume that the members of the House generally have observed the number of claims on the Private Calendar. It is one of the surest evidences of the corruption of our Government and of the times in which we live; of the disposition to live on the Government in one way or another. These private claims run up by hundreds, and I think it probable that before Congress adjourns they will have run up to thousands. It obstructs the business of the Government; it dams up the channels of legislation, and great and grave questions of national importance are postponed for the consideration of private claims of from one dollar to thousands. Now, sir, I will admit that there is a certain class of claims against the Government which are just and equitable. Occasionally such a case presents itself, but such cases are comparatively rare. It does seem to me that if you once permit a man to get his hands into the Treasury, he never will be satisfied.

Now, sir, it seems to me that it is the duty of the Committee of Claims, when a petition is presented to them, to consider it and examine the evidence upon which it is predicated, and, if it is just and equitable beyond controversy, to make a favorable report. But I hold, that whenever a claim is presented under a statute, that statute should be applied rigidly to that claim.

If, in cases in issue between individuals, the statute of limitation is to be applied, much more should it be applied to individuals in their demands upon the Government. When a party applies to the Government for relief, the statement of the case is always ex parte. He makes out his claim with no one to represent the other side; and all professional men know how easy it is, if there is no party to present the opposite view, to make out your case. It must be a very poor case that cannot be made out prima facie in this way. And, sir, in cases like this, coming up long after the men are dead, when all the facts are forgotten, it is impossible for human ken to tell what were the circumstances. I, therefore, insist on applying the statute of limitations with strictness, and I stand here to say that I for one will never vote for a claim that is old and stale.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say the Government is to plead the statute of limitations against a just debt?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. A just debt! No, sir. But where is the evidence of that? It is not to be presumed that persons would slumber for years and years over a just claim. Men are not so negligent of their rights. If the gentleman from Georgia had a claim against the Government, I venture to say he would not allow it to slumber.

Mr. SEWARD. I never have any dealings with the Government in that way.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I rather think a requisition for the gentleman's pay comes very soon after it is due.

Mr. COVODE. I hope we shall get rid of this difficulty. The suggestion has been made that this report should go to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and, inasmuch as objection has been made to referring it to the Committee of Claims, I move that it be reported back to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Wright,] that I propose to test this case upon its merits. If the claimant cannot show that the money has never been paid, it ought to fail. All I wish is, that the case shall be tested upon its merits.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I do not propose to detain the House for more than a moment or two. I do not know in what manner this discussion has arisen in regard to the conduct of the Committee of Claims, this morning. I think it has not legitimately arisen. But, sir, as it has arisen, I wish merely to make a remark in regard to the conduct of that committee, because it is very important that its credit and character, in the investigation of the cases which are submitted to it, should not be invalidated or destroyed before this House.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I rise to ask a question of the Chair. The question is upon reporting this case back to the House, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I ask whether, upon that motion, it is in order to discuss it upon its merits?

The CHAIRMAN. If the question is raised, the Chair supposes he should be compelled to rule that it was not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Debate has been allowed by others, and I hope I shall be allowed to saw a word.

Mr. WINSLOW. The motion, as I understand it, is to refer to the Committee of Claims; and I suppose, of course, it is in order to discuss the character of the committee upon that.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I suppose the line of remarks I propose to pursue will be strictly in order. I will detain the committee but a few moments. As the conduct and the mode of proceeding in the Committee of Claims have been arraigned before this House, it is very proper that that committee should be heard in its defense. There is no committee acting under the direction of the House which has more onerous, more delicate, or more laborious duties to perform than the Committee of Claims; or more thankless, as has been suggested. They have to perform labor for which they can gain no reputation. The Committee of Claims, or a majority of them at least, have acted upon the principle that they are not to consider this Government a great almshouse for distributing relief to all the unfortunate persons in the country, who, by misfortune, or by the wrong of others, have been reduced to poverty and want. There may be one or two of my colleagues on the committee who consider that every person who brings forward a claim against the Government is prima facie in the right; and that if the Government cannot bring forward evidence to show that the claim is wrong or fraudulent, it ought to be allowed. The liberal and charitable gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Davidson] probably honestly takes that view.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The gentleman, I presume, expects to be judged by his own acts, and he must allow me the right to be so judged. He has no right to make such an imputation as that upon me.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I have no doubt that my colleague acts upon what he deems to be upright, honorable, and correct principles. But, sir, there are others on the committee, constituting the majority, who believe that the House ought to look with scrutiny into every claim presented for our consideration; and who believe that no claim ought to be allowed, unless substantiated by proof satisfactory and conclusive. Certain it is, that the adoption of a different principle would bankrupt the Government in less than four years. There is no Government on earth that can stand up with a loose mode of allowing claims against it. The Committee of Claims, this House, and Congress, must act upon legal principles, well established in the administration of the Government since its foundation.

There are, sir, growing up out of the late war with Great Britain, claims from those along the Canadian frontier, who, by the ravages of war, were reduced to poverty. The whole Canadian frontier, it will be remembered, was swept at the time with the besom of destruction. The individual sufferers have come forward under one pretext and another, and presented claims against the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that, on the motion to report this bill to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, it is scarcely in order to discuss the general policy of the Government.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I am satisfied that the Chair is right in his ruling, and I will confine myself to the point of reference.

The question is, should this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. As the principles by which that committee is governed in its action, and the modus operandi pursued by it have been attacked and discussed, I have deemed it proper, occupying the position I do upon that committee, that it should be vindicated from any attempt made to prejudice it before the House. I will say, at this time, that a majority of that committee, upon any case before it, endeavor to act justly and right, according to well-established legal principles. We do not attempt, in a loose way, to dole out alms to citizens who, by misfortune or otherwise, have been made to suffer. Such, I conceive, is neither the purpose of the committee nor the object of the Government.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I am interested in this bill. The applicant in this case comes from my section of the country—from Western Pennsylvania. So far as I have looked into the claim, I conceive it to be just and fair. It seems that no objection is urged against it but the statute of limitation—an ungracious objection, that ought never to be tolerated for one single moment by an honest man.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. I feel obliged to do so. It is now nearly the first of March, and I believe that the House has not acted on the report of a single committee on a private claim. My point of order is, that the merits of the case are not debatable on the motion to report this bill to the House for reference to the Committee of Claims. Let us dispose of these reports at once, and leave discussion until they shall come up for passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The point raised by the gentleman from Maine is that the merits of the claim are not up for discussion on the motion to report to the House, with a recommendation that the bill be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point is well taken, but he would not hold gentlemen strictly to the rule that they cannot show reasons why the motion should not be passed, or why it should. But the motion does not strictly involve the merits of the case.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. With all deference to the judgment of the Chair, I think the question before us is this: Is there a claim before the committee that need be referred to a committee for investigation? The merit of the claim is the basis upon which the House acts, and therefore it is indispensable that I should discuss the merit of the claim in order that I may show the ground for my desiring to have it referred. Here, sir, is the claim of an old revolutionary soldier. It is just or unjust. If it is unjust, that can be proved. If it is just, it ought to be paid. If it has been paid, the records of the Government will show that fact beyond dispute.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must insist on my point of order. There should be a good precedent established in this case. If hereafter, on motions to refer, the whole merits of claims are to be opened for discussion, we certainly ought to know it. I think it is important that there should be an established rule on the question of reference, and that the discussion on the merits of the claim should be withheld until the committee have made their report and the whole subject is up on the passage of the bill. The question now before the committee is, whether this case shall be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims? and to that point I think the debate ought to be confined.

Mr. EDIE. I call the gentleman to order. He is discussing his point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am merely stating my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the same latitude of debate is allowable in Committee of the Whole on this motion that is allowable in the House on a motion to commit. In every case, however, it will be a question whether the remarks made are relevant to the propriety of the reference. The merits of the case can hardly be said to be open to controversy, still it is difficult for the Chair to draw the distinction, whether the remarks made are such as to show that the case ought or ought not to be referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then that opens the whole debate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will make a suggestion. I think that the decision of the Court of Claims which has been referred to, presents a valid and sufficient reason for reporting this matter back to the House with the recommendation that it should be referred to some committee. The House will observe by a reference to the decision just read, that the grounds of the decision are not stated, and that it is necessary to refer to another decision of the Court of Claims, in order to ascertain the grounds upon which the question was disposed of. Under these circumstances, it seems to me to be proper and right that the matter should not be acted on at this time, but reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to one of the committees.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. All I desire to get before the House is the fact that the Court of Claims predicated their action against the claim set up in the present case upon the statute of limitations. The simple question is, whether the same rule which regulates the conduct of a court should control the action of this House?—whether, sir, the Congress of the United States should set up the statute of limitations as a defense against the claim of an old revolutionary soldier, whose time was given and whose life was risked to secure the liberties which we now enjoy? This to me is a monstrous doctrine. It is an ungracious defense, and rarely set up by any honest man. That it should be set up by Congress is an anomaly and a monstrous outrage against a brave old soldier who has defended his country. If he has been paid, the records of the Government will show that fact; but if it is a debt due now, it ought to be paid. I ask that it be sent to the House for reference to a committee to test its merits, and to report it to the House for its decision.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. It is that, where a case has come from the Court of Claims reported upon adversely, it cannot again be referred to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. COVODE. The motion is to refer the matter to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. COX. I do not wish it to be referred to any committee, and especially not to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, of which I am a member.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is, that the gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in order to raise that point.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor absolutely, or only for explanation?

Mr. DAVIDSON. He yields to me simply for explanation. I regret exceedingly that the remark which I made, and which was intended only to signify to the House the principle which the committee had unanimously adopted, should have been construed by the chairman as a charge made against the committee. It is well understood by the committee, and I among them, that the committee are not willing to undertake to revise all the claims which have been decided against by the Court of Claims. Hence it was that I made the remark. When the gentleman undertakes to assert that I feel disposed to consider every claim made upon the part of any person as a just claim against the Government, he goes further than any action of mine authorizes him to go. The only thing which has occurred—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has held all such discussion to be out of order. The pending question is on the motion to recommend to the House that the report be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Then it is not to refer to the Committee of Claims?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Then I am satisfied.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If I can obtain the attention of the committee for one minute, I will not trouble them longer. If I understand the motion in this case, it only proposes that this claimant shall have the same justice meted out to him as has been meted out to every other claimant for the last thirty years; that it shall be referred to a committee; that the same rule shall govern this case which has governed all other cases for the last thirty years—a thing which cannot be done if we take the decision of the Court of Claims as correct, when it may be opposed to the whole practice of this House. The whole question is, shall it go to that committee? The only question to decide at this time is, shall it be sent to a committee and receive from their hands the same consideration, be governed by the same rules, be construed by the same principles, and controlled by the same laws which have governed all other cases for the last thirty years. If there is anything lovely in justice in a legislative body, it is to deal out justice with an even hand. The same justice should be dealt out to this man, which has been dealt out to all others heretofore. I am in favor of referring the case to the proper committee, either the Committee of Claims or the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in order that we may have their judgment in regard to its merits. I do not enter into a discussion of its merits.

Mr. PALMER. I simply rise to express my surprise that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WRIGHT,] speaking on behalf of the Committee of Claims, should make the declaration to this House that that committee has come to a determination, as an invariable rule of action, to reject all claims which are not substantiated by legal evidence beyond all controversy. Sir, I take it that there are few claims presented to the consideration of Congress which do not meet with more or less controversy, and I suppose that the very reason why these cases are reported back by the Court of Claims to this House is, that we may examine and review them. I reaffirm what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] that it has been the practice of this Government for thirty years, and ever since its organization, to pass claims similar to this, notwithstanding the statute of limitations may be pleaded against them. There are upon this Calendar many such cases coming from the district which I represent in this House.

As was said by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, the country lying along the Canada frontier includes among its citizens the descendants of many revolutionary soldiers, and particularly of those two regiments which, you remember, were raised in Canada, which encountered all the hardships and dangers of the revolutionary army, and, in addition to that, incurred the risk of confiscation of their property, and which confiscation did take place in almost all cases. After the Revolution, these men, in many cases, failed to present their claims previous to 1794, and, therefore, were technically cut off, if this statute of limitations is to be enforced here. I hope the House will reject that doctrine, and that the Committee of Claims, this committee, and the House will feel it to be their duty to act upon all claims upon principles of equity and justice, without reference to the statute of limitations.

Mr. MILLSON. I feel reluctant to take part in a discussion upon a private claim, and especially upon a motion to refer to a committee; but it is proper that I should inform the House that this is not the first time that this claim has been before it. Some eight years ago it became my duty, as one of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to make a report upon this very case, by the instruction of that committee. That report I now have before me. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims were unfavorable to this demand, and in making the report, the grounds of their unfavorable opinion were not that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, but that there never was any merit in it; that the claimant received in his lifetime all that he was entitled to receive for the services he had performed as an officer of the continental line.

I merely rose to call the attention of the House to that simple fact, in order that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, when this case may be referred to them, may have the opportunity of examining the facts as presented by the former Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Now, I do not oppose the reference at all to that committee. I think it proper that it should go again to that committee to be considered; for it may be that the present committee may come to a different conclusion from that which the former committee, eight years ago, came to. I thought it proper to make these remarks, because it seems to be insisted, upon all hands here, that there never was any better reason for rejecting this demand than that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations.

According to the report which I made on this case, eight years ago, it appears that this man

Stokely received, in his lifetime, from the Government of the United States, all he was entitled to for his services in the revolutionary army, and that he never was entitled to commutation pay by reason of his continuance in the army, because of becoming a supernumerary officer.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to interpose an objection to the gentleman's line of remark, and I do it upon the ground that he is making the most potent argument which can possibly be made against the claim, while it is not in order to do so upon this motion of reference, or in order for me to advocate it, as I desire to do. I therefore hope the gentleman will not oppose it now, or enter into a discussion of its merits.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from Iowa ought to be aware that, if I pleased to do so, it is entirely competent for me to make an argument against the claim, and to move that the committee concur in the adverse report of the Court of Claims. But I am not disposed to do so, for I have intimated already, with, I think, becoming modesty, that the present Committee of Claims may possibly differ in their conclusions from those arrived at by the committee of which I was a member some eight years ago. But I state these facts, because it has been alleged on all hands that this was a meritorious claim, to which no other objection was made than that it was barred by the statute of limitations. I do not even wish to have my report on that occasion read to the committee; but I deem it proper (if I had not so deemed, I would not have said what I have said) that I, who am, perhaps, the only member of this House cognizant of the fact, should state to the committee that this is not a case presented for the first time, or a case rejected simply because of the lapse of time, but one which has already received a deliberate examination by a committee of this body.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. I ask him whether he does not know that this claim has been twice reported on favorably by this same Committee of Claims of two successive Congresses?

Mr. MILLSON. I do not know the fact, but I am certainly not disposed to question the accuracy of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. COX. When I was on the floor a while ago, I raised a question of order, whether or not, after a claim has been reported upon adversely by the Court of Claims, and placed upon the Calendar under the law constituting that court, it can be again referred to a committee of the House, to be again reported upon? I do not know whether that question has ever yet been decided in the House. Perhaps it has been. Perhaps the Chair can inform me whether it has been or not; for it is of some importance to the committee to know whether or not claims, which have been passed upon by a court constituted by Congress for this purpose, are again to be thrown into the House, and again to be thrown into the committees; whether the committees are to be choked up with business of this character, so that it will be utterly impossible for them to attend to the ordinary business of the country in the House? I should like to know whether or not this question has ever been decided. I do not want to raise a question of order captiously, but I raise this question for the purpose of saving the committees from extra labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that the question has been ever decided. He thinks it has not been.

Mr. COX. Then I present the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] raises the question of order, that the motion now before the committee is not in order under the rules and the law. The Chair overrules the point of order, because the law and the rules of the House evidently contemplate the power on the part of the House to reexamine the decision of the court. There is nothing in the rules, so far as the Chair understands them, to prevent such reports being referred to committees.

Mr. COX. All that I have to say in conclusion is simply this: that, so far as I am concerned, as a member of this Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which it is proposed to refer this case, I will never sanction the course of reexamining claims that have been adjudicated upon on proper legal evidence, with the statute of limitations, too, operating on that evidence. I think that the rule applied to private persons in courts of justice should be applied with more force and cogency to claims brought against the Government. It may be dishonest for a man who knows that he owes a just debt to plead the statute of limitations; but the Government, in these ex parte cases, should set up some limit to these claims that are vamped up, and revamped up, year after year. It has appeared, in the course of this discussion, that this case has been carefully examined by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] and yet we are to have it here again. We are to go over the same thing; and if any defects are found in the claim, evidence may be supplied, and the committee will have to go over the same old work, so that there will be no end to the labors of the committees.

I, for one, will say, as chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, that we have already enough to do in examining these claims, so musty, so stale, and so worthless, and can hardly attend to our ordinary business in the House. I think that the statute of limitations should be applied; and I know that I speak the sentiments of other members of that committee, who will rigidly apply that rule if this claim be referred to them.

Mr. COVODE. If the statute of limitations is to be applied, I have only to say that I am perfectly satisfied that it should be applied in this case, and carried out for all future time. That is what I want to get at. The claimant is not a friend of mine; he is a political opponent of mine. But I am ready to meet the question, and let the decision of the committee be persisted in.

Mr. MAYNARD. This matter turns on the law organizing the Court of Claims. By an examination of that statute, it will be seen that the practice of that court is, in the first place, to have presented to it the facts of the case, in the form of a petition, which is to be considered by the court, and, for the purpose of that consideration, is to be taken as true. If, on the facts disclosed in the petition, the court decides that the claimant is entitled to relief, it directs that the testimony be taken to establish the facts. If, however, on examining the petition itself, as on a demurrer to a bill in chancery, the Court of Claims consider that the petitioner is entitled to no relief, then an adverse report is made on the case, and referred to this House. The fourth section of the statute prescribes the proceedings which are then to be taken. It is as follows:

"In all cases where it shall appear to the court that the facts set forth in the petition of the claimant do not furnish any ground for relief, it shall not be the duty of the court to authorize the taking of any testimony in the case until the same shall be reported by them to Congress, as is hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That, if Congress shall in such case fail to confirm the opinion of said board, they shall proceed to take testimony in such case."

I understand that in the case now before us—the facts in the petition being taken as true—the court held that the petitioner is entitled to no relief, solely and simply on the ground that his claim is barred by the effect of time, the statute of limitations—the staleness of his case, or whatever term you please to use to designate the neglect to file it at the Treasury prior to May, 1794. And the only question now presented for the committee to decide—sitting as a revising tribunal, passing on the correctness of the decision made by the Court of Claims—is, whether this claim shall be so barred? And, sir, I must dissent most seriously from the position taken by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] While I am honored with a seat on this floor, I shall never, with my present views of duty, be found turning from this Hall an old revolutionary soldier, or his widow, or his child, because their claim is barred by the lapse of time, when, in all probability, they have been here from the very foundation of the Government, soliciting their just right—a right which ought to have been admitted and liquidated years ago.

This is a question of importance, affecting not merely the interest of this individual claimant, but establishing a general principle of action which is to affect the whole class of demands against the Government that come up from this deep recess of times long gone by. I think it one that we ought to consider carefully and deliberately before we determine it; and in order to do that, I think, with the gentleman who made the motion now before us, that this case should be referred to the appropriate committee; either to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, or to the Committee on Claims. Being a member of one of those committees, I shall not make even a suggestion as to which it should be referred. Let the committee examine it upon the facts disclosed in the record, and report to the House. Upon their report, as printed, we can determine what action we ought to take. From the limited knowledge of the claims presented against our Government which I have gained in the last three months as a member of the Committee of Claims, I must be permitted to say that many of them are of the most frivolous character; but that should not deter us from considering and allowing those which are well founded and just.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I did not intend to occupy the time of the House on this or any other matter to-day. Nor should I now have risen had it not been for the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] As a member of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, I deem it my duty to repudiate the doctrines advanced by him as the chairman of that committee. The plea of the statute of limitations has never been favored in the courts of law. It is looked upon in a very unfavorable light, if not characterized as a dishonorable plea. In this case perhaps there may be more excuse; but so long as the Government is able to pay its just debts, and more especially the debts which it owes to our revolutionary sires, so long should they be paid without reference to the time they have remained unpaid. Whatever the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims may think on the subject, or whatever principle he may adopt, I, as a member of that committee, will never allow the plea of the statute of limitations to interpose so far as any action of mine is concerned. Sir, these debts are of the most sacred character. So long as we feel pride in the institutions of our country, so long as we feel honored in defending those institutions, so long as we look back to our revolutionary sires with pride, so long as we cherish their memory, so long should we be willing to render them some return at least for the many sacrifices which they made in achieving our liberties, and establishing our free institutions. I believe that it is the duty of patriotism—a duty too long neglected by Congress, and by the country—to provide for the payment of the debts due our revolutionary fathers; and to see to it, that this injustice to them should not be longer continued.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I take it for granted that the gentleman assumes all the claims presented to be for just debts.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I am compelled to take it for granted, because I presume that our revolutionary sires and their descendants, being patriots, are just in making their claims; and I presume further, that no person will present a claim for a debt due by the Government that has not, at least, some justice in it.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Upon what ground is the statute of limitations predicated?

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The statute of limitations, if I understand it, is predicated upon the fact, that after a certain period of time, evidence could not be had; from a rule of evidence, that lapse of time prevented a fair investigation of claims.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me to tell him what I understand to be the ground for the statute of limitations?

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I shall be happy to hear the gentleman?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Either that the debt at its inception was not just, or, if just, that it has been paid; and it is predicated on the nature of man, and his proneness to look after his rights.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. That may have been one reason. But, I do not desire to detain the House. In my opinion, the business before the Committee on Revolutionary Claims is not so onerous as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] supposes. I am satisfied that, as members of that committee, we could transact our business in one tenth of the time, if we would only give our attention to that business, and if members would attend the meetings of the committee, and not absent themselves on other business—attending, probably, to Kansas, or some other exciting political topic, to the neglect of just private claims, which we, as an honorable nation, ought to pay.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a single word? I merely wish to correct him in relation to one matter. I will say that if the gentleman had been more punctual himself in his attendance on the meetings of the committee, he would have known more as to the amount of business to be transacted. I believe that I have missed but one meeting of the committee, and the gentleman has missed at least half a dozen.

Mr. DAWES. As the members of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims are defining their positions, I desire to say a word. I do not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] to say that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims has come to any such conclusion as he has announced, as to what effect shall be given to the statute of limitations, or that the matter itself has been before the committee at all; but I understand him to express his opinion as an individual, and to assume to speak for some other members of the committee. To what particular members of the committee he alluded, I do not know.

Mr. COX. I will tell the gentleman; I alluded to the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DAWES. I presume those gentlemen will speak for themselves.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. I wish to make the question of order that this debate has wandered entirely from the question of reference under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules that the character or conduct of committees is not in issue before the committee.

Mr. CHAFFEE. The other members of the committee have been filing caveats here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware that a good deal of irrelevant discussion has been indulged in; but he has sustained an objection whenever it has been raised.

Mr. DAWES. I understand it to have been urged in this committee as a reason why this bill should not be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, that some members of that committee are disposed to enforce the statute of limitations, and therefore I think it is in order for me, as a member of that committee, to say that if a just demand were presented against me, I should be ashamed to plead the statute of limitations in bar of it; and I should be just as much ashamed to set up the statute of limitations in bar of a just claim against the United States.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have but a few words to address to the committee on this subject. I presume that I am entitled to discuss the question before the committee. It is simply a question of reference whether the report now before the committee shall be reported to the House for reference to the Committee of Claims, or whether we are now prepared by the material which we have before us upon the Clerk's desk to discuss and decide the entire question. I am of the opinion that, under the law and the rules we have made for ourselves, how is the time, and that we are amply prepared—quite as much so as we ever shall be—to dispose of the point whether the statute of limitations shall run against a claim which, in all other respects, has been pronounced by the committee of this House, and the Court of Claims, to be a just one. It is to that point that I will direct the attention of the committee for a few moments. We have established by law a Court of Claims. The duty of this Court of Claims is to report to this House these claims, together with the evidence submitted to them, and upon which they have passed. Not only are they to submit the reasons for their decision and their report, but, in addition, are to submit the briefs of the solicitor and of the counsel for the claimant. They present their logical reasons upon which they base their decision. What more can you procure from the Committee of Claims? Can you procure as much? Are they constituted with reference to judicial examination?

Mr. COVODE. I must say to the gentleman from New York that the Court of Claims has not sent in these reports, as he says that it is their duty to do. They refer to other cases in which the statute of limitations was made to run against the claimants, and decide upon that without sending in the other papers.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If they have sent no papers here, then they have decided within the purview of the law. The case does not require, for its elucidation and the purposes of justice, that any papers should be sent. In fact, it may be that there are no papers. The question arises, whether, having a report from a judicial committee—a committee authorized by law, and not simply under the rules of the House—a report declaring, over the signatures of the court, that there is no reason or foundation for this claim, because of the running of the statute of limitations against it—the question is, I repeat, whether that decision is proper or not? If you send it to another committee, and to another committee after that, and so on for a series of Congresses, you will never have arrived at a point in your inquiry where you will be more capable of determining the fact whether the statute of limitations should run against this claim, than the present time. I put it to the committee, whether they are not prepared, at this time, to pass on this question in the negative, that this case shall not be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims?

Mr. ADRAIN. Mr. Chairman, quite an interesting discussion has arisen here this morning. An old revolutionary soldier presents his claim. It is a claim which touches every patriotic heart. It is a claim which ought not to be thrown lightly aside. It is a claim which ought to be considered calmly, dispassionately, and patriotically; and the question comes up here this morning, whether we are to refer his petition to another committee, or whether we are to reject his petition, and to accede to a report which has been made by the Court of Claims adverse to the claim? Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the facts of the case. I do not know the old petitioner; but it is stated here, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY], that this claim is a just one; that there is no just ground against it, except what is set up by the statute of limitations. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when he made the statement, made it after an investigation of the case. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] has said that there is no merit in the claim. Whether that is so or not, I cannot determine; but the fact that he states that there is no merit in it, and the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania states that there is, and the further fact that the only objection is the statute of limitations, throw doubt upon the question. I am not ready to decide on the point now. It shows, then, the necessity that this matter should be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, asks why is his committee to be clogged up with these old stale claims? Yes, sir, his committee ought to be clogged up. He ought to investigate every claim, I care not how old it is, if it be the claim of an old revolutionary soldier who has fought, and was ready to die, in the service of his country. I do not suppose, when this matter is referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, or any other committee, that it will be reported except upon the true state of the facts in the case. If this old gentleman is not entitled to his claim, it will not be admitted. I understand that there have been but five cases reported to this House from the Committee of Claims, showing that there is no disposition on the part of that committee to report in favor of any claim unless it be just and honest.

I do not wish to occupy the time of this House further than this; we must recollect that our old revolutionary soldiers are fast passing away from the stage of action. There are but few of them remaining with us; but while they do remain, while they still linger upon earth, and connect the present with the past, I hope we will smooth their path to the grave, and do all in our power to return the debt of gratitude which can never be paid to the brave and illustrious men who fought out so gloriously the American Revolution which has given us the civil and religious liberty we enjoy now, and which makes us the greatest and freest nation upon the face of the earth.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I agree with the honorable gentleman from New York, who addressed the House a few moments ago, that this is an important subject; and, for one, I am ready to vote upon its merits. I do not think that they deserve much discussion. The case is simply this: according to the organization of the Court of Claims, when a petition is filed there and they find a legal bar to the claim, then they do not go into the proof at all, but, deciding on the legal bar, send the claim here. This petition was filed in the Court of Claims, and that court very properly decided that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. They therefore refused to take proof upon its merits, and sent it to us. The question is, whether we should bar the claim by the statute of limitations? I am ready, as a member of this House, to say that we should not. Why? Do gentlemen in this Hall understand what that limitation was?

The statute of limitations which is attempted to be applied here, is a statute which ran out upon the claim in one year from the date of the act. The class of claims to which this belongs is one which arises under the resolution of 1780. In 1783, the Congress of the United States passed an act, that whoever presented a claim belonging to this class, prior to one year after the passage of the act, should receive a money commutation, in lieu of full half pay for life, which had been promised him by the resolution of 1780. Afterwards, another act was passed in reference to this commutation claim. One year's limitation was placed upon those claims, and they were to be barred, unless presented at the Treasury within that time. And then, again, Congress gave that statute a sweep down to 1794; so that if you take the time from the date of the first act, to the date of the last act—from 1783, the time of the peace, down to 1794, the time to which the last act was limited—you would have upon your revolutionary claims a statute of limitations running through seven years.

Here is a claim which was not presented at the Treasury within those seven years; a case where the heirs of the party deceased present it to your Government, and you send it to the court. The court say to us, and say properly, "this claim is barred by the statute of limitations arising under a law of Congress, and we do not choose to go further to put this party to the trouble to take proof, but we apply the statute." The man comes here for that claim; and it is for us now to say whether we will act upon the principle upon which we direct the court to act; whether we will here say that we will carry out the law as it existed in 1794, and bar all claims against the Government which were not settled at the Treasury before 1794. Prior to the organization of this Court of Claims, this rule has been violated so often that I think it would be monstrous in the House of Representatives now to attempt to apply it. I do not choose to sing any song of praise to the memories of those who fought in the Revolution. When one of these claims comes here that is founded in no equity, that presents no particular call upon me to do justice, I would as soon reject it as I would the claim of any other citizen in the Republic.

But my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] a member of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, rises here and asks us not to refer revolutionary claims to his committee, because it interferes with his duty in the House. I will say to him, that if his committee is not strong enough we will strengthen his arm by putting more gentlemen upon the committee; but I cannot listen to excuses coming from that committee, that they are required to handle the musty claims of those old revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Kentucky, as did the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRAIN,] seems to proceed upon the idea that these claims are presented here by those old revolutionary men themselves. That is quite a mistake. This very claim, I am informed, is presented by the heirs of an old gentleman who has been dead for sixty-five years; and the gentleman from New Jersey wished that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims should pass upon it in order to smooth his way down to the grave. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADRAIN. I was speaking generally of old revolutionary soldiers, and not of him specifically.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The explanation of the gentleman from Ohio may go to the country for what it is worth. I would suggest to him, however, that it would be better for him to retract his former proposition, than to attempt to carry it off upon the idea which he now suggests.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit me, I will finish my explanation. I wish to say to the gentleman, that to all cases properly brought into this House, and properly referred to us, there has been, and there will be, proper attention paid; but this is a claim which has been referred to the Court of Claims, and adjudicated there upon legal principles. Now, I hold that the proper way to act upon the matter is to repeal the statute of limitations, if you are not going to carry it out. The statute, so long as it remains, is for our guidance.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman's remark is entitled to great consideration; in fact, that his remark indicates the proper direction we should take.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. It appears, from the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, who is a member of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, that these claimants are heirs of a revolutionary soldier. Has it not been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, or was it not the opinion of the Attorney General, that the heirs of revolutionary soldiers who did not claim a pension, are not entitled to it; that it was personal in its character?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This is not the case of a pension. A pension is a gratuity. This is a debt which is prosecuted here, and you are asked to plead the statute of limitations against it.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. It was for services rendered as a soldier in the war.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This man was entitled to half pay for life, under the resolution of 1780. After he had rendered the service, after he had become entitled to the pension of half pay for life, Congress passed an act giving him a certain commuted legal amount in lieu of that half pay, agreeing, if he presented that claim to the Treasury within one year from the passage of the act, to acknowledge the claim and pay the money. It is a debt, then, and no gratuity. This man, in his lifetime, did not present the claim. You may say it was not a debt. If it was not, then the heirs of this man are entitled to a pension equal to half pay for life.

I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that while a law exists upon the statute-book, the law should be enforced. Hence I say that the Court of Claims could do no less than to apply the law, and therefore properly turned the claim over to us. But we are not bound by the law. We are a high court, and make a law for ourselves. The man comes here with his claim, and I say that it rests upon the same equity upon which we have heretofore allowed thousands of claims. Why not allow it to this man? Does it lie in our mouths to say that we intend to be bound by the statute of limitations—that we intend to observe the statute of limitations—that we intend to shelter ourselves under the statute of limitations of 1774, while we have been acting on another practice from the foundation of the Government down to the present time?

I will answer, in another observation, one of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] and the same answer will apply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Wright.] He says that the old man died sixty-five years ago, and that the applicants here are his heirs. Do not the people of his part of the country pay heirs or administrators the debts they honestly owed to the man when he was alive? This is a debt, or it is not anything.

This applicant does not come here for a pension. He does not ask a gratuity. He is claiming your bond; and you are attempting to intervene between your bond and its payment—to intervene a plea which no man in this House would set up in a court of justice.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am not sure that I understand the resolution; whether it is to refer the report to the Court of Claims or to a committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter pending before the House is a report of the Court of Claims on a case decided in that court; and the motion is, that the committee report it to the House, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think that a very improper reference. You are going to refer to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims the decision of a court, the propriety and legality of which decision has not yet been assailed by any one on this floor.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I understand that this motion also carries the case—not the report alone, but the whole case—to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair certainly understands that the reference of the report carries with it all the papers in the case; but the report is the matter on which the House is called to act.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. The motion refers the whole case on the merits to the committee.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I suppose that the report carries with it all the matter of law. I do not understand that it carries with it anything beyond what accompanies the decision of the Court of Claims. The act of Congress prescribes what shall accompany their decisions.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the object which the friends of the measure have in view can be better reached by them in another way. I suppose that the Court of Claims acted right in this matter; and I understand gentlemen to acknowledge that, under the law, the court could come to no other conclusion. If we concur in the report, this memorialist can apply again to Congress, and not to the Court of Claims. He can apply where he will not be fettered by legal restraints—such as the statute of limitations. He can have his petition referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, or Revolutionary Pensions, or some other committee; and he can then have it considered on its merits, free from the difficulties connected with the adverse report from the Court of Claims.

I do not understand any gentleman to assert that the action of the Court of Claims precludes, in any manner, the action of Congress. On the contrary, the act of Congress establishing the Court of Claims prohibits a reconsideration by that court on the same evidence originally before it; but any attempt of a prior Congress to impede the action of a future Congress would be inoperative, and is not attempted here. I appeal, then, to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Covode,] who seems to take an interest in this claim, to consider whether or not the best method of having this question considered on its merits is not to let the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in, the correctness of the decision being uniformly admitted to be correct. Let this memorialist come to-day to Congress with another application, and it can then be considered on its merits.

Mr. COVODE. I have been informed that, if Congress confirms the decision of the Court of Claims—that court not having examined the case on its merits, but referred to the Marnay case—the claimant will not be permitted to come here again. That would settle the business.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let me ask a question of both my colleagues. Do not all of these papers go from this House, without special reference, to the Court of Claims? Was this case not referred at the end of last session of Congress? or was it referred by resolution, and with the consent of the party, to the Court of Claims?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The application was made directly to the Court of Claims. I have the petition in my hand. My colleague is mistaken in supposing that it was referred to the Court of Claims by the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. That was my recollection of it; and I supposed it had gone without the consent of the party.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The recollection of my colleague seems to be in error. I hold in my hand the original application, and it is directed to the judges of the Court of Claims. Now the court did not consider the merits of the case. It did not stop to inquire whether the claim was well-founded or not; because it found a stubborn principle of law in the way—the statute of limitations; and the court expressly says so.

Now, I hold that, if we concur in the report, that does not prevent the memorialist from applying again. I hold in my hand the act of Congress establishing the Court of Claims; and my colleague [Mr. Covode] will find from it that the restraint is only on action by the court itself. I think that, with the adverse report on the merits made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Milson] on a former occasion, and with this adverse report from the Court of Claims on a legal point—the correctness of which no one questions—we ought not to reverse this report, or to refer it to any committee with a view to its reversal, on grounds other than those on which the report itself is based.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand that in this case the petition was addressed directly to the Court of Claims. I believe that, under the law, petitions are referred, by order of the House, to that court; so that petitions come before them, in some instances, by direct application, and in others by reference from either House. When an application is made to the Court of Claims, and a report thereon, either favorable or unfavorable, is sent to the House, I understand that to be equivalent to the presentation of the petition to the House, with the recommendation or report of the court, either for or against.

Now, sir, in this case of Stokely, I understand that it is, in substance and in effect, before us here as the petition of Stokely. And, sir, I hold that he has a right to bring before Congress proper matter for its consideration; that he has a right, through the Court of Claims, to present his petition here; that he has a right to have it acted upon by the House; and that the House is bound, morally bound, to act upon it. It is a rule which should be always observed, to have his petition referred to a committee of the House; otherwise, you substantially deny his right of petition. That is what it comes to. If we say that, by the intervention of the Court of Claims, and by the effect of the law precluding claims from coming a second time before Congress, individuals shall not have their measures presented to a committee, and developed and presented to the House to be acted upon, we do substantially deny the right of petition, and deny to individuals the right to come before Congress with their claims for relief.

Now, sir, with these views, and I believe they are correct, I hold that if any one individual member of the House moves to refer one of these adverse reports to a committee of the House, the House is bound to make the reference; and the only question is as to which is the appropriate committee; and that question is only debatable as to the propriety of the reference. All other debate is out of order. I hope the Chair will so rule in this case, and in all other cases which may arise in the disposition of these adverse reports of the Court of Claims. If we go on to discuss this case upon its merits, without the evidence before us, we shall either be compelled to decide against the petitioner without evidence, or else we shall refer it to a committee; and when they have reported it back, this discussion must be had over and over again.

Now, sir, the only just and reasonable ruling, and the only ruling which will secure early action upon the Private Calendar, is that these adverse reports shall only be regarded as petitions, and as such, shall be referred, as a matter of right, if any gentleman desires it, to one of the committees of the House, to be by them reported back to the House.

Mr. POTTLE. I know that this question has been discussed at such great length that the House is tired of it, and that whatever may be said will meet with but little favor. But, sir, it is an important question, establishing the law not only for this case, and for all the cases which we now have before us, but establishing a precedent for all cases of the same class that shall be reported by the Court of Claims to this House. In regard to the merits of this particular claim, I know nothing whatever, and I do not consider that its merits are legitimately within the scope of this debate. It is simply a question whether, upon a report from the Court of Claims that they have been prevented from an examination into the merits of the case by the statute of limitations, whether, upon such a report sent back to this House, we are to consider it an end of the claim, or whether it shall be referred to some committee of this House for investigation? Sir, I consider, as I said before, that the whole question is to be settled by our deliberations in reference to this particular case, and that it shall not be settled without deliberation.

I think that several of the gentlemen who have addressed the committee upon this subject—and I refer particularly to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox]—have entirely misunderstood the position of the House. If I understand it, if we are to be confined strictly to technical rules of law in the decision of these cases, we should have nothing to decide, for the cases that may be settled under the law, as strictly construed, are settled at the Departments. It is only those cases which are technically defective, and which cannot be decided at the Departments, which come before Congress. I understand that this House stands in reference to the applications that are made here for relief precisely in the relation of a court of equity, sitting to do right in reference to the claims presented against the Government, and to administer justice upon principles of equity, and not upon the naked technicalities of law that may be set up.

It has been said by the gentleman from Ohio that in all courts of law this statute of limitations is considered a defense against a claim. That is true; but in no court of equity would it be allowed to be set up as a defense. Surely this Government would allow no man to set up the statute of limitations against itself, and if the Government is willing to enforce its equitable claims against others, I trust the time has not yet come when it may be said that the statute of limitations shall bar the enforcement of an equitable claim against the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to state that the statute of limitations cannot be set up in a court of equity?

Mr. POTTLE. I understand that the statute of limitations is of itself an inequitable defense, always and everywhere.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the right to set up the statute of limitations as a defense in a court of equity is not recognized?

Mr. POTTLE. I mean to say that the statute of limitations is in itself an inequitable defense upon the face of it. It is clearly apparent that when justice demands that you should give relief the statute of limitations never should, under any circumstances, prevent it.

Now, sir, I do not know what are the merits or demerits of this claim. I trust that it will be referred to a committee where it may receive a proper investigation. We have no means of knowing here, and we have no right to prejudice it. We have nothing to do but to send it to the proper committee where it will be investigated, and upon the report of that committee we may decide it upon its merits, and upon its merits alone. But I protest against the merits of this case being dragged into this discussion. The precedent should here be established that the Government is not to take advantage of the statute of limitations. The establishment of the other ruling would destroy hundreds of equitable claims against the Government. I believe in the entire truth and entire justice of the remark of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WRIGHT], that there are a very large number of inequitable claims sought to be enforced against the Government. That is a necessary part of our system, and forms no good reason why we should refuse to consider other claims which are equitable.

Sir, let us examine this claim, let us put it in a position where we can understand it. If inequitable claims are presented, let us reject them; but do not set up the statute of limitations to prevent their examination.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to place myself right in regard to this particular claim. When I stated to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] that I wished to say something in favor of this claim, I supposed it was one of a class of claims for commutation of revolutionary officers.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. So it is.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I wish to say that I did not speak of the merits of this particular claim. I do not know that I shall vote in favor of it, but I spoke of a class of claims relating to revolutionary officers which I desired to have fairly investigated. If this case is included in that class of claims, then I go for its reference to the proper committee of the House, which I suppose to be the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

I refer to the class of revolutionary claims that were committed, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has explained. This claim now before us purports to be of that class, but it may fall on its merits, and as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] suggests, for the want of merit on other grounds. I therefore wish that it may be referred to the proper committee, to be considered without regard to the time elapsed since it accrued, and without regard to statutes of limitation. The proper committee is that of Revolutionary Claims; and I am sorry to hear the chairman repel the submission because the claim is old. All the revolutionary claims are old claims, and the very purpose of the committee is to investigate that description of obligations. I am satisfied that such claims ought to be fairly investigated, and I hope the chairman of the committee will himself see the propriety of taking them up notwithstanding they may be old, neglected, oft-deferred revolutionary claims. Otherwise, I submit that the committee itself ought to be abolished.

I hope, under the circumstances, that this bill will be referred and fairly considered. I hope that the statute of limitations will not be pressed. We are not here merely for the purpose of taking into consideration such matters as are not barred by the statutes of limitation. We are here for the purpose of making laws as well as to expound them; and it is our duty to remove all those obstructions to justice and equity which ancient rules and laws seem to intervene, for the purpose of securing to citizens their just rights. If the statute of limitations cuts a man off from his rights, and there is merit in the claim, then that is a reason why we should act, and not an excuse for refusing to do so. We have sovereign power; and it is in such cases that we ought to exercise that power. We have sovereign power under the Constitution, a gentleman near me remarks; and I, of course, accept that limitation; and certainly the Constitution gives us the power to pay all well-established revolutionary soldiers. If we find, after investigation, that their claims are meritorious and just, we will allow them, although they have been barred by a thousand laws. If the statutes of limitation were always enforced, as in courts of common-law jurisdiction, it would cut off most of the claims which come before Congress; because, as everybody knows, it takes many years before a claim can be brought to the final consideration of Congress. Many of the claims which now come before the committee of which I am a member, are more than twenty-one years old. I do not consider myself bound there or here by the statutes of Henry VIII., or Queen Elizabeth, or any other statutes which may have served as a means to retain and transmit these ancient rules of law. We have a right to consider the equity of the claim, and relieve it from the strict rules prescribed for courts of law. I hope that the report will be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; and I know the chairman of that committee will, after full consideration, report that Congress has the power to go into the merits of the claims, and to decide on them.

Mr. COVODE. I have prepared a substitute for the proposition before the House, which will authorize the court to decide the case upon its merits. I move to lay the bill aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the House pass this order:

Ordered, That the report of the court be referred back to the Court of Claims, with directions to take the proof on the merits of the claim.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, is it not in order, at this time, to move that the committee rise, with a view to submit a resolution closing this debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Then I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STANTON reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and more particularly adverse report (C. C. No. 109) upon the petition of Joseph Stokely and others, heirs of Nehemiah Stokely, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the adverse report just stated to the House, be closed in five minutes after its consideration shall be resumed; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STANTON. This motion only cuts off the hour debate.

The SPEAKER. It is only general debate that is precluded under it. Special provision is made in the rules for five-minutes' debate on amendments. The motion does not cut off that debate.

Mr. STANTON. I want the motion modified, so as to cut off all debate or amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not entertain a proposition of that kind unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS's motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. STANTON in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the business before the committee to be the adverse report of the Court of Claims on the petition of Joseph Stokely and others.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I wish to understand the motion now made in reference to this question. If I remember rightly, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not to report this back to the House, to be referred to a committee, but to report it back with the recommendation that it be again referred to the Court of Claims, with instructions that they shall take evidence upon the merits of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion pending.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I will make this inquiry: whether it is not incompetent for the House to do that, as it will have the effect to amend an act of Congress by the action of one House? It would have the effect to change the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; to change the character of the action which it is compelled to take under the provisions of the law. I am inclined to think that it would be better to modify the proposition, and simply refer the case to a committee of this House.

Mr. COVODE. If my proposition will produce any difficulty, I will withdraw it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to withdrawing it, for I think the proposition is exactly right. The fourth section of the act declares that

"In all cases where it shall appear to the court that the facts set forth in the petition of the claimant do not furnish any ground for relief, it shall not be the duty of the court to authorize the taking of any testimony in the case, until the same shall have been reported by them to Congress as hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That if Congress, in such case, fail to confirm the opinion of the board, they shall proceed to take testimony in the case."

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I understand that that section requires the action of Congress, and not of one House only.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If this House fail to confirm the opinion of the court, the duty of the court is then established by the law. If Congress shall fail to confirm the opinion of the court, then this is a case finally disposed of, or it is a case where they have failed to take proof on account of a legal bar. That is the question. The court have come across the statute of limitations, and they refuse to take proof, refuse to hear it, and send the case to us. What is to be reported to us? The petition, the petitioner's proof, the brief of the counsel for the United States, and the decision of the court. There has been no proof taken, because they found the statute of limitations in their way. It comes to us; what shall we do with it? We fail to confirm the opinion of the court. Is that enough? What are we going to do with the bill? I say their decision is correct, and that we should recommend to the House that they send the case back to the court with directions to hear the case upon the merits. If the court has finally decided the case, and the decision is conclusive upon us, then the court occupy a new position under the law, which, by its jurisdiction, cuts off the plenary power which this House has to consider the case.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, moved an amendment pro forma, and said: do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to insist that the proper course for this House to take, after a bill comes here from the Court of Claims, would be to send it back, by an order of this House alone, without the concurrence of the other branch of the national Legislature?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. It strikes me from reading the fourth section of the act, that such a construction cannot be placed upon it. It provides that—

"In all cases where it shall appear to the court that the facts set forth in the petition of the claimant do not furnish any ground for relief, it shall not be the duty of the court to authorize the taking of any testimony in the case until the same shall have been reported by them to Congress as hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That if Congress shall in such case fail to confirm the opinion of the board, they shall proceed to take testimony in the case."

It seems to me that this act contemplates the action of both branches of the Legislature, before a case can be sent back to the Court of Claims. I do not see how any other construction can be placed upon it. The word "Congress" is used in the body of the section, and also in the proviso, and I have no doubt that that was what the framers of the law meant at the time the law was framed. It strikes me, therefore, that it would be premature for this House to undertake to decide this matter in that way. I think the best direction to be given to this matter, would be to send it to a committee of this House for investigation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If we fail to confirm the opinion of the court, Congress cannot confirm it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Would it be in order to move a substitute for the motion and the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

Resolved, That the report of the Court of Claims in this case, together with the papers therein, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims for a report upon the merits of the case.

I have only to say that I think we would sooner reach the case in this mode than in the other, and probably save much expense to the parties now presenting their claims for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the gentleman's amendment, in the form in which it is presented, is not in order. It would be, if modified so as to provide that the committee report back the papers in the case with a recommendation that the case be referred, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I will modify it in that way.

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT of Georgia, and COVODE were appointed.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] had withdrawn his proposition; and this is the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdrew his proposition, and the question arises on the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, as an original proposition.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I submit, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his proposition, whether the proper question to be taken is not on the reference of this matter to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the proposition now pending, offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is to refer to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions. The original proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was to refer it to that committee, without instructions. That is the only difference between the two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from New York in lieu of his own.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I did not understand that.

Mr. COVODE. I have withdrawn my proposition.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move to strike out that portion of the motion of the gentleman from New York relating to instructions. I make that motion because I do not think that the House ought, at this early stage of the proceedings, to hamper the committee at all. It ought to be referred to the committee, and let them act upon it in such a way as they may think proper, and report to the House. We will then have all the facts to enable us to decide the case. But, by the action now proposed, we undertake to pre-judge the case; we undertake to say they shall report in a particular way—to report that if the facts justify it this claim should be allowed, notwithstanding the grounds which the Court of Claims has interposed under the statute of limitations.

The court may have interposed the statute of limitations for reasons that would be satisfactory to those gentlemen who are opposed, as a general rule, to the Government pleading the statute. Therefore, I think that the action proposed would be embarrassing to the committee, and embarrassing to the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to know of the gentleman who made the motion, what would be its effect? Will this case remain pending in the Court of Claims until we send word back whether we approve of its decision or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that every gentleman may determine that for himself.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman who has charge of this business whether it is his proposition that this case remain pending in the Court of Claims until we decide whether we approve or disapprove of its decision?

The point that we are to decide upon is: we are to confirm the decision as it is rendered to us, or we are to reject it. The case pends in the court till we do one or the other. But without giving the court any notification we overslaugh the court, treat it with disrespect, and undertake to hear the case ourselves on its merits.

The question was taken on Mr. CRAIGE's amendment; and it was rejected, there being, on a division—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

The question occurred on Mr. TAYLOR's proposition, on which tellers had been ordered.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes ninety-five, noes not counted.

So the adverse report of the Court of Claims was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions.

JEREMIAH M. WILLIAMS, AND OTHERS.

The case next on the Calendar was an adverse report from the Court of Claims (No. 110) in the case of Jeremiah M. Williams, and others.

Mr. THOMPSON. This case is precisely the same as that which we have just disposed of; and I submit the like motion, that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to report on the merits of the case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the report and of the testimony in the case. I am inclined to the opinion that a motion that it be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the House agree to the report of the Court of Claims, would take precedence of that just submitted. The affirmative would be on agreeing to the report of the Court of Claims. If it be in order, I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York by substituting that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would not the motion that I have indicated take precedence of the other?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any rule that gives it precedence.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That would be the question submitted to the committee, if there was no motion made. That is the standing motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I insist on my motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The reading of the report has been called for.

The report was read, as follows:

"This is a claim for commutation money or half pay, for depreciation on certain pay certificates, and for bounty land. The first two claims should be prosecuted by an administrator. The claim for bounty land may, according to the rules of the department, be prosecuted by the descendants of the person entitled; but that claim is abandoned.

"The petition states that Thomas Williams, now deceased, was commissioned by Congress as a quartermaster and lieutenant in the continental service in the war of the Revolution; and served as such until the close of the war, or until reduced or retired. The claim for commutation or half pay is founded upon the same resolutions of Congress upon which the claimants relied in the case of Marnay vs. the United States, and Stokely vs. the United States. It is not alleged or proved that the claim was ever presented at the Treasury before the 1st day of May, 1794; and in accordance with the decision in the cases mentioned, the claim is now barred by the statute of limitations, and the claimant has no cause of action.

The second claim is for the sum of '$604 38, depreciation on pay certificates due May 30, 1779, and interest.'

"On the 10th of April, 1780, Congress resolved that 'when Congress shall be furnished with proper documents to liquidate the depreciation of the continental bills of credit, they will, as soon thereafter as the state of the public finances will permit, make good to the line of the army and the independent corps thereof, the deficiency of their original pay occasioned by such depreciation.' * * * 'It being the determination of Congress that all the troops serving in the continental army shall be placed on an equal footing. Provided that no person shall have any benefit of the resolution, except such as were engaged during the war, or for three years, and are now in service, or shall hereafter engage during the war for three years, and are now in service, or shall hereafter engage during the war.'

The question now is, whether Thomas Williams was in service at the date of the passage of the resolution.

The resolution of the Assembly of the State of New York, of March 20, 1783, provides for bounty land to persons belonging to several different classes, of which it is necessary only to enumerate the following:

"The officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the two regiments of infantry, commanded by Colonels Van Schaick and Van Cortlandt.

"Such officers of the regiment of artillery commanded by Colonel Lamb, and of the corps of sappers and miners as were, when they entered the service, inhabitants of the State, and such of the non-commissioned officers of the two last-mentioned corps as are credited to this State, as part of the troops thereof.

"All officers deranged by any acts of Congress subsequent to the 16th day of September, 1776.

"All officers recommended by Congress as persons whose depreciation on pay ought to be made good by this State, and who may hold military commissions in the line of the army at the close of the war."

The claimant has produced in evidence the book, well known as the New York Balloting Book, containing a list of the persons entitled to bounty lands under the resolution of the New York Legislature. In this book the name of Thomas Williams occurs but once, and that is on page 67, where he is put down as lieutenant in the third regiment, which was commanded by neither Van Schaick nor Van Cortlandt, but by Colonel Peter Gansevoort. He does not therefore come within the class first mentioned; nor within the second class composed of certain officers of Colonel Lamb's artillery, &c. He might have come within the class of officers deranged by any acts of Congress subsequent to the 16th day of September, 1776, or he might have belonged to the class of officers recommended by Congress whose depreciation in pay ought to be made good, &c., but there is no evidence showing that he belonged to either of these classes. He might have been entitled to bounty land from the State of New York, as belonging to one of the two classes last mentioned, without having been in service on the 10th of April, 1780. The Balloting Book, therefore, is not evidence to show that he was in service at that date. It is only evidence to show that he was at some time a lieutenant of the third regiment.

The claimant has produced in evidence an original commission, dated March 2, 1776, signed by Colonel Wynkoop and Lieutenant Colonel Cortlandt, field officers of the fourth New York regiment, appointing Thomas Williams quartermaster to that regiment. He has also produced a commission, signed by John Hancock, dated November 21, 1776, appointing Thomas Williams 'quartermaster to the third battalion of the New York forces.' This commission is expressed 'to continue in force until revoked by this or a future Congress.'

Upon the first organization of the army the various corps were styled battalions, and the quota of New York was four battalions. (Res. September 16, 1776.) Subsequently, upon a reorganization of the army, the various corps were styled regiments. (Res. May 27, and November 24, 1778.) This accounts for the fact that in the Balloting Book the corps to which he belonged was called a regiment, while in his commission it is called a battalion. In the New York resolution before referred to, no officer below the rank of captain is specifically mentioned, but every subaltern and surgeon's mate is entitled to one thousand acres; a lieutenant being a subaltern, was also entitled to two hundred acres, by a resolution of Congress. The course pursued was, that an officer entitled to bounty land under the New York resolution, and also entitled under the resolution of Congress, assigned to the State the land to which he was entitled from Congress, and received the amount of both bounties from the State. This was the reason why Thomas Williams is set down in the Balloting Book as entitled to one thousand two hundred acres of land.

Now there is evidence to show that he was at one time a quartermaster and at another time a lieutenant, but how long the different commissions remained in force does not appear. By the resolution of May 27, 1778, the quartermasters were to be taken from the subaltern officers, and he might at the same time have been both lieutenant and quartermaster, as the quartermaster, being a staff officer, received a certain pay in addition to his pay in the line. As he held the lineal rank of lieutenant, he is properly so designated in the Balloting Book.

Now his commission was to continue until revoked by Congress, and there is no evidence of its revocation. In the return by Lieutenant Connolly, in the Balloting Book of officers resigned, &c., his name is not returned as resigned. From the small number of officers contained in this list, it would appear to be incomplete; but there is no evidence in the case anywhere tending to show that he resigned. In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, the presumption may perhaps be that he continued to hold his commission in the army on the 10th day of April, 1780, which would entitle him to the depreciation on his pay under the resolution of Congress of that date.

"The claimant has produced in evidence a paper, of which the following is a copy:

Liquidation of the account of Thomas Williams, Jr., late quartermaster third New York regiment.

	Months of service.	Wages per month.	Amount of wages paid.	Depreciation of the four eastern States, averaged at several periods, as below.	Real value of one dollar at said time, in decimals.	Real value of pay received.	Real value of pay due.

To my pay as quartermaster, to the 31st of December, 1778.....	12	27 50	330 00	5.882	.170	56.100	273.900

"This paper we cannot consider as competent evidence against the United States. It is not proved to be in the handwriting of Thomas Williams. If it be in his handwriting, it is a mere statement of his claim, and as such is not proof of a debt. It is not authenticated in any way or in any manner, and is not even signed by him. It is entitled to no more weight than if it had been copied into the petition as part of his claim, and of course, without additional proof, we cannot come to the conclusion that he has made out any cause of action against the United States.

"But, even if the claimant had made out a cause of action, it is barred by the resolutions and acts of Congress which have been so distinctly stated in the cases Chamberlains vs. the United States, and Marnay vs. the United States, that a repetition of them is unnecessary."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It seems, from the reading of that opinion of the court, that they have decided this case upon its merits. If the claimant is barred by the judgment of the court, it is not in consequence of the application of the statute of limitations.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman is mistaken entirely in regard to this case. If he will read carefully the opinion of Judge Gilchrist, he will see that the first claim is alleged to be a good claim, but barred by the statute of limitations. He says "it is not alleged or proved that the claim was ever presented to the Treasury before the 1st day of May, 1794, and in accordance with the decision in the cases before mentioned, the claim is now barred by the statute of limitations, and the claimant has no cause of action." Now, sir, he does not base his rejection of the claim upon the ground that it is inequitable, but simply upon the ground that it was not presented in time, and is, therefore, barred by the statute of limitations. In relation to the second claim, it relates to depreciation on pay certificates which the claimant took. The judge says the amount of those certificates does not appear, and still he admits that the calculation which was made is evidence against the United States. If, then, it be evidence against the United States, it would be the foundation of a valid claim based upon it unless barred by the statute of limitations in that case as well as the other. But the judge says, in that part of his opinion, that if this were taken as evidence and the case made out, the statute of limitations would bar it. Both these claims are therefore upon precisely the same footing as that which has just been laid aside to be reported to the House to be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and it seems to me equitable and just that this case should take the same course.

I understand, as a matter of fact, that this claim has been frequently presented to Congress, and that other claims of the same description have been allowed; and there is no reason why the course of the Government should be changed in this respect, and the statute of limitations set up to bar just claims.

Gentlemen have said, in reference to other claims, that they delayed the action of Congress upon more important matters. Now, sir, if such is the fact, why not dispose of these claims, and not have them brought here session after session for our consideration, time after time, and Congress after Congress, with no redress or relief? But, sir, while upon what are denominated important matters, such as Kansas, every gentleman is willing to express an opinion, it is almost impossible to secure the attention of Congress to a private claim, concerning which members are to get no reputation here or standing at home. I hope, therefore, that the statute of limitations will not be set up in this case, but that it will be referred to a committee for investigation, as the last case has been.

In my judgment, sir, it would be illegal to send this back to the Court of Claims, because when it goes back there your statute of limitations stands as a valid law upon your statute-book, and they have no right to disregard it. They would send it back here with the same report, as often as it was referred to them. I hope it will take the same course as the other case has taken.

The question being on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions,

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.
Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALDRON and CLEMENS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.
Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Illinois, and HAWKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 61; no quorum voting.

The roll was accordingly called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Barksdale, Bingham, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, Clingman, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Davis of Massachusetts, Dick, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Gillis, Gooch, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Hickman, Hill, Horton, Hughes, Jenkins, Keitt, Kellogg, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, Mason, Matteson, Moore, Oliver A. Morse, Nichols, Olin, Pike, Powell, Roagan, Roberts, Russell, Savage, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Talbot, Thayer, Trippie, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, and Woodson.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STANTON reported that the committee, having found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called and the absentees to be noted, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

One hundred and sixty-two members having answered to their names, which is more than a quorum, the committee resumed its session.

The question recurring on the motion to rise, it was put, and was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STANTON reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and particularly an adverse report (C. C. No. 109) upon the petition of Joseph Stokely and others, heirs of Nehemiah Stokely, and an adverse report (C. C. No. 110) upon the petition of Jeremiah M. Williams and others, heirs of Thomas Williams; which he was directed to report to the House, with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to inquire into the merits of the cases.

Mr. STANTON moved that the House concur in the report of the committee; and on that motion called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the report be laid upon the table.

The motion was disagreed to.
Mr. STANTON's motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object to all explanations upon that side of the House, since they objected to a similar request by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOARD] this morning.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, I hope not. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GILMER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, simply for reference. It is a bill to prevent the accumulation of an unnecessary surplus in the Treasury, [laughter,] and to equalize the grants of lands to the several States.

Objection being made, the bill was not introduced.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I objected to allowing the gentleman from New York [Mr. HATCH] to make a personal explanation, solely because objections were made upon that side this morning to allowing the gentleman from New York upon this side [Mr. HOARD] to make a personal explanation. Being assured that that objection will be withdrawn, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, when I was absent from the House yesterday, I learn from the report in the Globe that the gentleman from Tennessee made a personal allusion to me. I desire to say it is my right, as a member of this House, to discuss any questions of public interest. No power on earth can deter me in the faithful and fearless discharge of that duty. The other day I spoke of a large party in this country, and their alleged oaths. These oaths, of course, can only be known to the members of the secret societies who compose that party. I did not, and do not propose to, go into questions of veracity with any member of this House, as to their existence, or make my opinions, as to their reasonableness or unconstitutionality, questions of veracity.

In reference to them I sought to bring before the House the most accredited authority for their existence that I knew of, and that was a respectable journal in my State. I do not vouch for their genuineness. The gentleman from Tennessee pronounces these allegations false. If he is right, then he takes issue with my authority, which I have given him.

When I make a personal issue with any gentleman in this House, or out of it, I hold myself personally responsible; but I cannot consent to be diverted from my purpose in meeting an issue of a public nature and character before the whole country, as it is known and understood in my section, involving questions of the constitutional rights of its citizens, by a gentleman rising in his seat and giving to it a personal and local application. It may be true, as the gentleman has stated, that such oaths are not known in Tennessee. I made no such assertion. I did not allege that the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other gentleman, had taken or knew of such obligations. My purpose was simply to express the belief that a party or society exist in it who have taken oaths and obligations, in my judgment, directly in conflict with the Constitution of the United States and the rights of citizens, and cite the authority upon which this opinion is founded.

I feel it to be my duty, Mr. Speaker, to say thus much in order that the country may understand that I have made no personal issue with the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other member of this House; and with this statement I close.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Mr. Speaker, it may be possible that I misapprehended the spirit which animated the member from New York, [Mr. HATCH.] I will say to him, that whilst I felt it due to myself to state to the House that the obligations which he read were not, in letter or in spirit, identical with the obligations I had knowledge of as a member of the American party in Tennessee, yet that that particular point in his speech which attracted my attention, and induced me to feel that I owed it to myself to throw off the imputation, was the charge (taken in connection with the animus which it seemed to me pervaded his speech) that the obligations of the American party were "treasonable and unconstitutional."

I have been in the habit of treating political opponents, and everybody else, with courtesy and respect. All that I ask of them is to treat me with like courtesy and respect.

Mr. GILMER. Permit me to say a word here. I thought my friend from Tennessee would have done well not to have answered the gentleman from New York at all. I thought, when he boast-

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 51.

ed in this House that he came here as the representative of foreigners mainly—

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know by what right the gentleman from North Carolina is speaking?

Mr. GILMER. By the leave of my friend from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is not in order.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I will say in conclusion—

Mr. GILMER. When the gentleman from New York—

Mr. BURNETT. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina will suspend; he is out of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I must hold gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House strictly to the terms upon which I withdrew my objections.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to the gentleman from Tennessee speaking, and I will listen to him with great pleasure; but I do object to the gentleman from North Carolina speaking.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Mr. Speaker, I will say in conclusion, that it has never been my purpose to make a personal issue with any member, upon any question, if I could well avoid it. But I felt that an exigency had arisen in this case in which I owed it to myself as a man to make a personal issue; but if I misapprehended the gentleman from New York, I have nothing more to say upon the subject.

Mr. GARTRELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GARTRELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a privileged motion. I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I beg to remind the gentleman from Kentucky that the objection made on this side of the House, to the personal explanation of a member on the other side, was withdrawn on the understanding that gentlemen on this side were to be at liberty to exercise the same privilege.

Mr. PHELPS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; only eighteen members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division, yeas 57, noes 87.

Mr. HOARD. I desire the consent of the House to follow up the reading of the letter this morning, with a few remarks in the shape of a personal explanation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object to the personal explanation. I have not withdrawn my objection.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask whether my resolution for the close of debate on the Indian appropriation bill is not pending?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] object to the gentleman from New York making a personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. The pending question is on the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill, terminate at two o'clock to-morrow; and on that the previous question is demanded.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SICKLES called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELSEY, and CRAIG of North Carolina were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 44, noes 82.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES to close debate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The motion made by me this morning was to terminate debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill, to-morrow at two o'clock. I propose now to fix Wednesday at two o'clock. That will allow the whole of Tuesday and part of Wednesday. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SICKLES. I ask the gentleman [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to withdraw the call for the previous question, and I will renew it.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable anyhow.

Mr. SICKLES. I want to make a statement to the House, which will not occupy a moment.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 59, noes 87.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SICKLES. I ask permission to make a statement, in reference to the misunderstanding under which my colleague [Mr. HATCH] was allowed to make his explanation.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Several VOICES. Withdraw your objection.

Mr. BURNETT. I have reasons satisfactory to myself for making the objection, and I do not withdraw it.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to state that the terms on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] withdrew his objection to the personal explanation of my colleague, [Mr. HATCH,] were that objections should be withdrawn to the personal explanation of my colleague, [Mr. HOARD.] I desire to see that arrangement honorably carried out by this side of the House. I therefore ask that the same courtesy shall be extended to one gentleman as was extended to the other.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the gentleman cannot proceed with his personal explanation.

Mr. HOARD. Then I only wish to say that I am surprised that this small courtesy should not be allowed me.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. HOARD. Then I rise to question of privilege. I submit the following resolution:

Whereas, a statement has been made by a member of this House, importing that the Hon. Mr. BURNS, of Ohio, had stated to him, in a conversation on the subject of his vote on the resolution of Hon. Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, to commit to a select committee the President's message on the Kansas investigation, that he was to have certain official patronage, or appointments to office, at his disposal; and whereas, the Hon. Mr. BURNS had previously been free in his avowal of sentiments, with which his vote on that subject was in conflict, thus furnishing ground to suspect that some improper influence had been exerted to bias the said member's official action as a member of this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made, directly or indirectly, by any persons connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any other person, with their advice or consent, to influence the action of any member of this House upon any question or measure upon which the House has acted, or which it has under consideration, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, the letter which was read at the Clerk's desk this morning, though dated yesterday, was received by me night before last.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. Is the private letter to which the gentleman refers a matter of privilege to which the gentleman can speak, and has he a right to answer that private letter in a speech upon this floor?

Mr. HOARD. I am explaining my resolution.

Mr. SICKLES. Under the precedent of the other day, it will be for the House to decide whether it is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. BURNETT. I have not asked the gentleman from New York for his opinion about the matter. I make the question that the resolution presented by the gentleman is no question of privilege. There is no charge contained in the preamble or resolution whatever against any member. It cannot be made a question of privilege unless a direct charge is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, following the precedent which was adopted the other day, and which he finds, upon examination of authorities, is fully sustained by the precedents of the House, will submit the question to the House in this form: "Shall the resolution be received and entertained upon the ground that the privileges of the House are involved?" The Chair is of opinion that the question is debatable, and the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOARD. Mr. Speaker, the letter read this morning by the Clerk, although dated yesterday, was received by me night before last, and I endeavored, yesterday, to obtain the floor to reply to it. I take the earliest opportunity to respond to it.

I am informed that the Hon. JOSEPH BURNS, of Ohio, had been open in his condemnation of the Lecompton constitution, and that, after the vote upon raising the select committee for investigation upon that subject, on which occasion he voted against the friends of the resolution, he [Mr. BURNS] said that certain executive patronage, or appointments to office, were to be at his disposal. This is the substance, according to my information, of the admission made by Mr. BURNS to an honorable member of this House, upon being inquired of how he came to give such a vote.

In calling the attention of the House, the other day, to the subject out of which this letter has grown, I was actuated by no feelings of personal unkindness towards any one, and especially toward Mr. BURNS, whom I do not know by sight.

The charge that I made on Friday last, was, that I believed the executive department was attempting to influence the votes and action of members of this House, by improper offers of the patronage of the Government; and I cannot consent that attention shall be diverted from the real and important questions to any incidental side issue that may spring out of it. This opinion was founded upon various circumstances which had transpired, and some of which I stated when the resolution was offered for a committee of investigation. For reasons then expressed, I thought these circumstances and reports involved the dignity, prerogatives, and independence of this House, and that it was essential that the House should institute an investigation, in order that those who had been implicated might have the opportunity to clear themselves of suspicion, if innocent, and that this House might assert its constitutional rights and independence.

So far as I had given any currency or countenance to these reports by bringing them to the attention of the House, I should have felt myself bound to make the most ample reparation in my power, if the charges contained in those reports had been found to be groundless. But so far as I have been able to investigate the case of Mr. BURNS, the information justifies the charge made here on Friday last.

The honor of this House, and justice to its members, in my opinion, now demand an investigation of the facts in this, and in every other case of a similar character that may come to light; and in the hope that the House will concur in that opinion, I have offered this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, the Administration have the majority in this House; and it is for that majority to decide whether these charges shall be investigated or smothered.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I will renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House but for a moment or two. The reason why I objected to a personal explanation by the gentleman from New York was, that I well understood what was to follow—it. I am opposed to gentlemen bringing their personal difficulties upon the floor of this House. If a man denounces me as a slanderer, and charges that I have traduced his character, I know how to meet that sort of charge; I will never seek to stab him indirectly. I will meet him face to face, to settle it as all such questions ought to be settled by honorable men.

I knew this thing was to come up under the guise of a privileged question. I knew that an effort was to be made, under the pretense of a question of privilege, to raise a committee to investigate a charge made against a member of this body, who, in a private letter, addressed to the member from New York, told him: "Sir, the charge you made on last Friday is false and slanderous in its character, and I hold myself responsible for what I say." The gentleman who wrote that letter is absent. The gentleman from New York, instead of responding to the letter addressed to him as an individual, as it should have been replied to, brings it into this House; and, without any action on the part of the gentleman from Ohio, and without his consent, makes it public. It was a private letter to the gentleman from New York, who made the charge, declaring that that charge was false and slanderous, and that for so branding it the writer was responsible. Instead of responding to that letter, the gentleman from New York comes here and spreads it upon the record, and makes it a part and parcel of our proceedings. Then, he claims the right to make a personal explanation to meet that private letter. I am always ready to give every man a fair and full opportunity to vindicate himself from charges of a public character. I will never hesitate, by my vote, to vindicate the character and reputation of any member upon this floor; but I will never permit any man, by my vote, to raise a committee, without good cause, to blast and ruin the character and reputation of one of my peers.

In the response read by the gentleman from New York to this House, what is the charge? The charge is, that in a private conversation with some honorable member upon this floor, (I do not know who,) the gentleman from Ohio admitted that he was to have the control of some executive appointments. Admit that the member understood the member from Ohio to make such an admission: it is a well known rule of law that such testimony is of the weakest character. In what can it result? Here stands the assertion of one member upon one side, who is entitled to credit, that the charge is false and slanderous; and on the other, the gentleman from New York does not take the responsibility of saying that he has any knowledge of the fact charged. He does not come here and say that he knows this man to be guilty of these things, and for that reason demands an investigation. No, sir; he says no such thing; but he becomes the accuser. So long as I have a seat upon this floor I will never give any aid or countenance to such a system of warfare against any man.

This much I wanted to say in vindication of my position in objecting to the personal explanation of the gentleman from New York. I did not want these private matters between the gentlemen brought here. I knew that it was not with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio that it was done. In fulfillment of my promise to the gentleman from New York, I renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday next.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. R. Eckard.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FITCH presented the petition of Jane Ransdell, widow of James Ransdell, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed the pension due her under the act of 1838; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of Grinnell, Minturn & Co., and numerous other merchants and ship-owners of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill before the Senate to repeal the laws allowing fishing bounties; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of mechanics of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of a law for the enforcement of mechanics' liens on buildings in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND presented additional papers in support of the claim of Richard W. Meade, for the repayment of expenses incurred by him in consequence of the refusal of the commander of the Pacific squadron to allow him to take command of a vessel, in obedience to an order of the Secretary of the Navy; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the petition of E. G. Spaulding and others, citizens of the United States, praying that the public lands may hereafter be held for the use of actual settlers, at the lowest possible rates; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. IVERSON presented an additional paper in relation to the claim of Richard G. Dove, to compensation as messenger in the office of the Third Auditor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Edward Merritt, late an army express rider, in the Mexican war, praying to be allowed a pension or other compensation, for services rendered and injuries received in public service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of additional mail facilities in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the McGregor, St. Peters, and Missouri River railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Isaac Varn, sr., and the petition of David L. Palmer, of the firm of Palmer & Ferris, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Eliza A. Merchant, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 163) for the relief of Eliza A. Merchant, widow of the late First Lieutenant and Brevet Captain Charles G. Merchant, United States Army. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Mrs. Jane M. McCrabb, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 164) to provide for the settlement of the accounts of the late Captain John W. McCrabb. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That two thousand additional copies of the report of the Committee on Territories on the message of the President communicating a constitution for Kansas, with the views of the minorities of the said committee, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MAP OF FLORIDA.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That five thousand extra copies of the map of Florida, accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, illustrative of the recent surveys for a canal in that State, communicated to the Senate the 11th of June, 1856, be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to extend the limitations of the act entitled "An act for the relief of citizens of towns upon lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," approved March 23, 1844; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Mr. PUGH. On Friday, on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] Senate bill No. 46 was laid on the table, instead of being postponed. I move that it be taken up, and restored to its proper place on the Private Calendar, simply that it may not lose its chance. I suppose the Senator intended to move to postpone it until the next private bill day. It is a bill to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; and its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

LAKE PEPIN RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the bill (S. No. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1854, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to amend the act of July 17, 1854, so that the body of land known as the half-breed tract, lying on the west side of Lake Pepin and the Mississippi river, in the Territory of Minnesota, and which is authorized to be surveyed by that act, shall be subject to the operation of the laws regulating the sale and disposition of the public lands, with a proviso that, when any of these lands are claimed by preemption, under settlement and cultivation, heretofore made, proof and payment shall be made within three months after the passage of the act; and when any of the lands come within the provisions of the act of 23d May, 1844, "for the relief of citizens of towns upon lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," such proof and payment shall be made within three months after the passage of the act; and, in either case, if the entries are not made at that time, the claim shall be forfeited.

The provisions of this law are not to extend to any tract or subdivision which may have been settled upon, in good faith, by, and is in the occupancy of, any of the half-breeds or mixed bloods, which lands, so settled upon and occupied by the half-breeds, are expressly declared to be subject to no other disposition than location by the "certificates" or "scrip" authorized to be issued by the act of 1854, for the benefit of these Indians.

Mr. STUART. I am instructed by the committee to offer two or three small amendments. The first is in line fourteen, to strike out "three" and insert "twelve" so that it will read, "proof and payment shall be made within twelve months." Then, in line two of the second section, I move to strike out the word "law" and insert "act." I also move to add at the end of the second section the following:

Nor shall the provisions of this act extend to any lands located prior to its passage on half-breed scrip, without the consent of the settler or settlers thereon.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

Mr. STUART. I ask the Senate to take up another bill of an important character, reported from the Committee on Commerce. It is the bill S. No. 77.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 77) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851.

Its object is to declare that the provisions of the "act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, shall be applicable to the owner or owners of steam-boats, sail vessels, and propellers used in the navigation of the great northern lakes, in the same manner and to the same extent as the owners of such vessels upon the ocean.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the first bill on the Calendar—Senate bill No. 64. It is a bill that ought to be passed promptly.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 64) to equalize the salaries of certain judges of the courts for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEARCE. I desire to have that bill postponed for a while. I wish to move an amendment to it. I am exceedingly unwell to-day, and unable to attend to it. I should like to have it passed over. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL LA FAYETTE'S LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. SLIDELL. The first bill on the Private Calendar was postponed on Friday last at my instance, on account of the absence of my colleague. It is the bill (S. No. 71) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4, and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette," approved February 26, 1845. I ask the Senate now to consider that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded as in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

It proposes to amend the "Act to authorize the relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4, and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette," approved February 26, 1845, that the legal holders or assignees of the warrants Nos. 4 and 5 may relocate them upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to entry at private sale at the sum of $1 25 per acre; but such location is to be made in accordance with the legal divisions and subdivisions of the public surveys.

Mr. SLIDELL. The reason why I asked for the postponement of this bill when it was last before the Senate, was, that I desired to offer an amendment. I do not think the bill in its present shape does justice to the merits of the application. It is to enable the present holders of land warrants that were granted to General La Fayette, and which were entered on lands that proved not to be subject to entry, to relocate them. The Committee on Private Land Claims have reported a bill giving relief; but not to the extent to which I think it ought to be carried. They confine the locations to lands subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre. I think the same privilege ought to be accorded to the present holders of these warrants as were given to General La Fayette; and that the right of location ought to be extended to all public lands not subject to some special reservation. I have consulted with my colleague, and he agrees with me as to the amendment I now propose to offer; and I presume there will be no objection to it on the part of the Senate. The faculty of entering his warrants on any land was given to General La Fayette in 1804; and these men, after having made various attempts to locate their lands, find themselves now, after having paid a large price for these warrants, if this bill be passed in its present form, with the simple privilege of entering lands at $1 25 per acre. My colleague, on a further examination of the case, assents to the amendment. I move to strike out the words "subject to entry at private sale at the sum of $1 25 per acre," and insert "not specially reserved." I presume that will be sufficient.

Mr. PUGH. That seems to me a very important amendment, changing the character of the bill, and I think the Senate ought to hesitate before agreeing to it. I am not aware that such warrants have been heretofore entered except on lands subject to private entry.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if he hears the report read, he will be satisfied.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I might perhaps satisfy the gentleman from Ohio with a word or two. These land warrants were originally issued in favor of General La Fayette. He was authorized to locate them on any lands of the United States, to have them surveyed to suit himself anywhere, and to locate the warrants anywhere, without reservation, even on unsurveyed land. He was also authorized to sell his warrants. He sold his warrants for a price largely exceeding $1 25, for which public lands subject to entry can be obtained; and these warrants were located under the act of March 27, 1804. The location of warrants numbered three, four, and five, was found to be on lands which were claimed by private individuals, and their claims were subsequently confirmed. The location was therefore null.

Subsequently, in 1845, Congress authorized a relocation. The warrants were again located; but on application for a patent the locations on two of the warrants were canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, because the lands were covered by live-oak timber, so that here again was a special reason for not allowing the location. This is a third attempt to locate these warrants; and now instead of giving the entire privilege allowed General La Fayette originally, which was to select lands anywhere, we confine these holders of his rights to the location of lands which have been already surveyed and that are not reserved, but we allow them to select lands which have not yet been offered for sale. We limit the right of General La Fayette's assignees, but we give them something more than the right to enter the lands offered for sale at $1 25, because that, in reality, would only give them ninety to one hundred cents an acre for their rights—the price at which a land warrant can be bought. These parties paid large sums, much exceeding the ordinary price, in consequence of the privilege given to General La Fayette to locate them anywhere. In fact the words which my colleague proposes to strike out, were inserted as the usual formula from our Committee on Private Land Claims without any special intention so to limit the right of the parties making the application. I think their equity is a very clear one, and I have no objection to my colleague's amendment.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator tell me the date of the land warrants and the acts?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The first was in 1804 and the second act was in 1845.

Mr. PUGH. But what was the date of the original warrant which could be located on any land?

Mr. BENJAMIN. 1803.

Mr. PUGH. Since that time most of the public lands have been surveyed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether the bill as proposed to be amended, will extend the privilege of locating these land warrants on the alternate sections reserved in the railroad grants. They are not reserved after a certain time, but they are put at $2 50 an acre. Would not this authorize the parties to locate on those lands?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think it would, and I think it is far less than the rights originally intended to be granted to General La Fayette. I happen to be familiar with this subject from the fact that I was the counsel in the litigation for many of these land warrants which were originally located by General La Fayette and his agents immediately around New Orleans, on city lands. Many of these locations held good, and the land which was covered by them is worth thousands of dollars per acre, instead of hundreds of cents. Three or four of the warrants were placed on land which ultimately was confirmed to private claimants. The land thus located would have been worth probably one hundred thousand dollars or more on these three warrants. The location failed by reason of private claimants making good their title under the former French or Spanish Governments. The relocation, if made by General La Fayette, would have been made under the statutes of the United States upon any land in the United States belonging to the Government which he had a right to select himself, to have surveyed, and to ask a patent for. It was a special favor granted to him. When the relocation was made in 1845, the Commissioner of the General Land Office decided that live-oak timber being especially reserved by statute from entry, he would not permit the location to be on such land. This is now a third attempt at the location. These parties have all the rights of General La Fayette and I think that the amendment proposed by my colleague restricts them within much narrower bounds than he himself would have if he were still owner of the warrants, because he or his heirs could select any land, but his assignees were not allowed this benefit by the General Land Office, on what ground I am not able to state. I think, however, their equity is a very clear one.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to look into this bill. I prefer to have it postponed. It is not usual for the Committee on Private Land Claims, I believe, to report a bill allowing warrants to be located on public lands; that subject rather belongs to the Committee on Public Lands; but I make no objection on that score. It is very evident this is claimed to be an exceptional case; and under the bill as proposed to be amended, these land warrants may be located on alternate sections, which we have reserved in the railroad grants. I believe my friend from Louisiana acknowledges that the bill does go to that extent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. After those lands become hereafter subject to entry.

Mr. PUGH. But the amendment is to strike out that, and to authorize them to be located on any public lands not specially reserved; so that, if we to-morrow pass a bill which we had up at the last Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to abolish certain military posts, these claimants may locate on the lands occupied by those posts the next day after the Secretary of War finds the posts to be unnecessary. I do not fully understand it; but it seems to me we are leaping in the dark by conferring a power as great as this. I am sure I would do almost anything for the heirs of General La Fayette; and I would go as far as any Senator to give the purchasers the full consideration, and even more than they have paid for these warrants; but I am apprehensive it will interfere sadly with the general system of surveying and exposing the public lands to sale. My own State has been harassed by the Virginia military titles, where every man was his own surveyor, and located to suit himself; but I think the owners of that property have paid for it in the amount of litigation they have had to undergo in order to establish anything like a rule of possession. I am very much disinclined to allow any holder of a warrant to locate it on his own survey. I prefer that it should be confined to public lands which have been surveyed; and I prefer also that some of the public lands should be excepted out of the grant; for instance, the alternate sections of railroad lands.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the bill confines the entry expressly to lands that have been surveyed.

Mr. PUGH. I was under the impression that that had been stricken out.

Mr. SLIDELL. No, it is not. If the Senator from Ohio has any special reservation to make, I have no objection that it should be embodied in the amendment, if he fears there will be any abuse.

Mr. PUGH. I suggested two cases. I think it ought not to be applied to alternate sections on railroads. I think they ought not to have the privilege of locating on any site that has been a military post, or anything of that sort. They might have taken up the Fort Snelling property, before it was sold, and located the warrants there, under this provision.

Mr. SLIDELL. Of course I am not as familiar with the sale of public lands as the Senator from Ohio; I believe he is a member of the Committee on Public Lands; but as I understand it, neither of the cases to which he alludes will come within the purview of this bill. The alternate sections on lines of railroads are already entirely exempted by the operation of law. When that reservation ceases, this faculty will apply to them. As regards military posts, I am satisfied that under no circumstances can they ever be brought into market or be subject to entry or location except under the authority of the War Department, and perhaps by the legislation of Congress. I am quite sure that his apprehensions are imaginary as regards these two cases; but if he wishes to guard the bill against any possible abuse, I have no sort of objection to any amendment that he may propose. In order to afford time to the Senator from Ohio to do that, let the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and then he can offer such amendment as he thinks necessary.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

TENNESSEE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BELL. I desire to present a certain preamble and resolutions, passed by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee; and I ask that they may be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Whereas, the act of 1820, commonly called the Missouri compromise act, was inconsistent with the principles declared and laid down in the acts of 1850, better known as the compromise acts of that year; and, whereas, the Missouri compromise act was a palpable wrong done to the people of the slaveholding States, and should have been repealed; and whereas, the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill meet our unqualified approbation, and should have received the cordial support of our Senators and Representatives in Congress. Whereas, one of those Senators, Hon. JOHN BELL, in a speech delivered against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, May 25, 1854, said: "A noble, generous, and high-minded Senator from the South, within the last few days before the final vote was taken on the bill, appealed to me in a manner which I cannot narrate, and which affected me most deeply. The recollection of it affects and influences my feelings now, and ever will. I told the honorable Senator that there was one feature in the bill which made it impossible that I should vote for it, if I waived all other objections. I said to others who had made appeals to me on the subject, that while it would afford me great pleasure to be sustained by my constituents, yet, if I was not, I would resign my seat here the moment I found my course upon this subject was not acceptable to them." As for my standing as a public man, and whatever prospect a public man of long service in the councils of the country might be supposed to have, I would resign them all with pleasure. I told that gentleman, that if upon this, or any other great question affecting the interest of the South, I should find my views conflicting materially with what should appear to be the settled sentiment of that section, I should feel it my imperative duty to retire. I declare here to-day, that if my countrymen of Tennessee shall declare against my course on this subject, and that shall be ascertained to a reasonable certainty, I will not be seen in the Senate a day afterwards." Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we fully concur with the Hon. JOHN BELL, as to the duty of a Senator, when the voice of his constituency has decided against him on a question materially affecting their interest.

Be it further resolved, That in our opinion, the voice of Mr. BELL's countrymen of Tennessee, in the recent elections, has declared against his course on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, a question of vital importance to the South.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby instructed, and our Representatives are requested, to vote for the admission of Kansas as an independent State, under what is termed the Lecompton constitution, transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, by President Buchanan in his message to them, dated the 2d of February, 1858.

Be it further resolved, That the Governor of this State forward a certified copy of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Adopted February 10, 1858.

DANIEL S. DONELSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN C. BURCH,
Speaker of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, the novel and, as I think, extraordinary character of these resolutions will, I trust, be a sufficient apology for me, if I should extend my remarks somewhat further on them than, under other circumstances, might seem appropriate and meet for such an occasion.

The first thing which I think will strike the attention of every gentleman who has listened to the reading of the preamble, and the two resolutions of the series which have been presented to the Senate, will be the time or date of their adoption by the Legislature of Tennessee, which was on the 10th of this month, nearly four years after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act. You know, sir, that it has been usual, in the past history of this country, when the constituents of a representative in either branch of Congress feel themselves aggrieved by his course or vote upon a question materially affecting their interests, to express their displeasure and declare their censure promptly, or within some reasonable space of time after the knowledge of the obnoxious course or vote has reached them. This is sometimes done by calling public meetings of the people for that purpose; in other instances, by resolves of the Legislature, when it shall be assembled, if it be not in session when the political transgression occurs. In this case, in regard to my vote on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, there was no public meeting of the people called to censure or disapprove my course, nor was there the least excitement among the people on the subject; nor has there been any resolve of the Legislature of my State upon the subject until the present month; nor am I aware that I have lost a political friend on that ground since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act.

The next thing which will be apt to strike the attention of those who have listened to the reading of the first clause of the preamble of these resolutions with some surprise, is the uncommon hardihood manifested by the majority of the Legislature of my State to indorse and approve, unconditionally, the repeal of the Missouri compromise, after the mischievous results of that measure have become so patent and unmistakable in the developments of the last four years. They cannot plead ignorance of those results, particularly after the President had duly and frankly informed them, in his late special message, that one of those results has been the convulsion of the Union, and has shaken it to its very center; that it has lighted up the flames of civil war in Kansas, and produced dangerous sectional parties throughout the Confederacy—(I use the language of the President.) The question whether Kansas shall become a slave State or a free State, has riveted the attention of the whole people to such a degree that no person has thought of anything else. Those who supported this preamble and resolutions may have had some reason to ignore the statement of the President, which they do not care to give to the public in express terms. That purpose may be easily conjectured. But I pass on.

The majority of the Legislature say, in the first resolution of the series—

"That we fully concur with the Hon. JOHN BELL as to the duty of a Senator when the voice of his constituency has decided against him on a question materially affecting their interest."

The second resolution declares—

"That in our opinion the voice of Mr. BELL's countrymen of Tennessee, in the recent elections, has declared against his course on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, a question of vital importance to the South."

I agree that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was a question of the deepest importance to the South; but I disagree with the majority of the members of the Legislature of Tennessee in the opinion expressed by them that the people of Tennessee have declared against my course in the recent elections. I take it for granted that by the "recent elections" referred to in the second resolution—the three general elections which have taken place in Tennessee since the passage of that act, are included under the descriptive adjective "recent;" and I proceed briefly to notice those elections in the order in which they occurred.

The first election which occurred in Tennessee after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, was in August, 1855, about fifteen months after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act. The staple of the discussion in the canvass which preceded that election was Americanism, or the principles and formula adopted by the party which had recently sprung up in the country. This was so on both sides, pro and con. The Kansas-Nebraska bill may have been adverted to to some extent, but I never heard during the pendency of that election, that the Kansas-Nebraska question was made one of any interest except in those districts the former representatives of which had voted against that bill. The result of that election was that the party in opposition to the Democracy, in other words the Americans and Whigs who did not belong properly to the American party, but who stood in opposition to the Democracy, carried the majority of the members of both Houses of the Legislature; but the Democratic candidate for Governor defeated the American candidate by some three thousand votes. I have not recently referred to the statistics on this subject, and state them from my present recollection. I will not go into the particular causes which led to the defeat of the American gubernatorial candidate in that election, considering it inexpedient under the circumstances, because to do so might lead to a discussion between my colleague and myself, who was the candidate of the Democratic party in that election.

In the canvass of that election I did not participate, even to the extent of making a single speech, not feeling called upon to do so by any attack upon my course upon the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Nor was I called upon by the leaders of the American party to say anything in their support, they feeling the utmost confidence in their strength to carry the election without any aid from me.

If I were technically minded on such a subject as this, I might bar all further proceedings against me as to any pledges I may have made by pleading that, upon questions of political transgression, after so great a lapse of time, there ought to be no reckoning; but I disdain such a protection.

The next election which came off was in November, 1856—two years and six months after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. In that election, as you know, sir, Mr. Fillmore was the candidate of the American party; Mr. Buchanan of the Democratic party. In the canvass which preceded that election, Americanism, as in 1855, was the principal subject of controversy. The Kansas-Nebraska bill, however, was occasionally introduced in the public discussions, and, to some extent, debated; but, in the progress of the canvass, both these subjects, on the part of the leaders of the Democracy, came to be but little dwelt upon; and, towards the close of the canvass, they may be said to have been superseded altogether. The strong indications developed in the canvass at the North of the probable success of Mr. Frémont, the candidate of that formidable Republican party which has had such potent effects in the elections of the South, furnished a more powerful and effective argument for the Democratic leaders; and they availed themselves of it. Both Americans and Whigs were appealed to, in the most forcible and pathetic strains, to waive all party prejudices, past and present, to discard all prejudices and party predilections, and rally to the support of Mr. Buchanan, who, it was insisted, could alone defeat the election of Mr. Frémont. It was declared that Mr. Fillmore had no chance to be elected; and that, if it should happen that Mr. Frémont should be elected, the probability was that the Union would be dissolved; or, at all events, that the interests of the South, particularly in relation to the subject of slavery, would be sacrificed.

I make these statements without the fear of contradiction from any quarter. After the result of the State election of Pennsylvania was known in Tennessee, thousands of Whigs and Americans, influenced in part by the fears inculcated by the leaders of the Democratic party, and in part by their own reflections on the subject, lost heart, lost confidence in the election of Mr. Fillmore, and went over to the support of Mr. Buchanan. The result was that Mr. Buchanan carried the State of Tennessee; and it was the first time in a period of twenty years that that party had succeeded in a presidential election in that State. It is a significant fact, connected with the subject of these resolutions, that Mr. Fillmore, who had declared that if he had been a member of Congress he would have voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, received sixty-six thousand votes from the freemen of Tennessee, under all the apprehensions which had been excited of the election of Mr. Frémont, and that his election would be the signal for the separation of the southern from the northern States. Mr. Buchanan had a majority of only about seven thousand votes. I allude to the fact merely to show how little weight the result of such an election as that could have in determining the question whether my constituents had decided against my course on the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

The next election which took place in Tennessee came off last year, in August, 1857—more than three years after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act. It is true that, in that election, the Democracy carried both branches of the Legislature, and that their Governor was elected by a largely increased vote. The fact was, that the American party, and the Whigs who united with them in the recent contests in Tennessee, discouraged and depressed by the unexpected defeat in the fall of 1856, only some six or eight months before, could not be incited to make an active canvass except in a few counties, while in numerous others great numbers of them did not even go to the polls. That I state as a fact notorious in the section of Tennessee in which I reside.

As to the extent to which the Kansas-Nebraska bill assisted the results of that election, I have to state that, so far as I am informed, that subject was made a topic of discussion wherever on the part of the Democracy they believed capital could be made out of it; but only in a single congressional district, that of my late colleague in the House, Mr. Etheridge, was that the main or exclusive question discussed in the canvass. The result of the contest in his district was that he was defeated by a very small vote, according to my present recollection, derived from the public prints; by no more than one hundred and forty-two, or not exceeding one hundred and fifty votes, and that in consequence of the apathy or over confidence of his friends in one or two counties of a district which embraced seven or eight. What effect it ought to have I will not say; but I will say that, in 1855, eighteen months after the vote given by that gentleman against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, he carried his district and was reelected by an increased vote; getting at that time a vote exceeding his proper party strength in his district. In 1855, I ought to have stated in fairness, that two of the members of Congress who had voted against the Kansas-Nebraska act, were defeated; but from the inquiries I made at the time, I came to the conclusion, which I have not since changed, that their defeat was not the result of their course on the Kansas-Nebraska act as upon the question of the American principles and formula, which was the main point on which that election turned.

From this review of the three several elections in their order which have taken place since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, I think I am warranted in saying that upon no fair rule of interpretation applicable to such questions, can it be said that my countrymen of Tennessee have declared against my course. But I pass on, sir.

In one of the garbled extracts quoted in the preamble of these resolutions and taken from a speech I made in the closing debate on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in the Senate, in 1854, and in which I stated the circumstances under which I should feel bound to resign my seat in the Senate, I said, that "if, upon this, or any other great question affecting the interest of the South, I should find my views conflicting materially with what should appear to be the settled sentiment of that section, I should feel it my imperative duty to retire;" implying clearly that to such a sentiment, fixed and settled in the way which I must have had in my mind when I made that declaration, I ought to defer, holding that it was more likely to be sound and correct than my own individual judgment, however well considered; and that if I could not conscientiously conform to such sentiment, I ought to retire. Now, as to the question whether at any time since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act there has been any settled sentiment in the South in relation to the wisdom of the Kansas-Nebraska act, I venture to say that at no time since the passage of that measure has there been any settled sentiment of the people of the South in its favor. If you take the result of the several elections which have taken place during the last two or three years in the South as a test of the sentiment of the people on this question, I grant you that a large majority would appear to have been in favor of it; but what are those elections in general, and in almost every instance, but a trial of strength between parties in which many other questions are mixed up with this, both in the South and in the North, so that they show nothing conclusively as to the number of citizens anywhere who approved or disapproved of such a measure? Besides, in several States of the South, it may have been that the sentiment in favor of the repeal of the Missouri compromise appeared too strong to be resisted, and that the opposition, upon principles of expediency, might not choose to make any issue with them upon that subject.

Again, there is another consideration, entitled to great weight, in showing whether these elections afford any proof whatever of a settled sentiment on the part of the people in relation to the Kansas-Nebraska act. There is, in every State of the South, in every community, a large class of quiescent citizens, who follow their party leaders, and vote with them in all elections, and who cannot be moved to investigate or take any interest in questions having only remote consequences. Whatever may have been the sentiment of a majority of the people of the South in the last two or three years on this subject, I venture the assertion now, that if they were all polled, and their free opinions, uninfluenced by party considerations, or interest, or associations, ascertained, an overwhelming majority would pronounce the repeal of the Missouri compromise the most unfortunate measure ever sanctioned by Congress.

I said that the extracts quoted in the preamble from my speech in 1854, were garbled. They are so, as every gentleman will find who will take the trouble to read the whole of that speech. In that speech I said, in reply to the charge of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] that I was misrepresenting my constituents—I do not refer to it with any displeasure now, but I speak of it as a fact; I stated then that I had but little doubt—I am not certain that I did not state that I believed—that the impressions of the people of Tennessee, my constituents, were at that time in favor of the measure which I was then opposing. In several other passages of that speech I stated in substance that I took my course, relying on the intelligence of the people when time could be allowed them to exercise their judgment in relation to the subject, in the confidence that when they came to understand the provisions and probable objects of that bill, and to see its mischievous consequences, they would sustain me in my course, whatever their impressions might be at that time. There were parts of the context that ought to have been quoted or referred to in the preamble to those resolutions, as furnishing the true interpretation of the extent of what I said in relation to resigning my seat in Congress; but it did not suit the purposes of those who got up this proceeding to do so. I do not wish to speak of any portion of the members of the Legislature with disrespect; but I must say that the preamble and the first two resolutions of the series were got up for the purpose of disparaging me with the public, by giving the solemnity of a legislative declaration to the charge of violated pledges. But, sir, I thank God that neither my character nor my honor is in the keeping of such men. I regard the preamble and first two resolutions as a gratuitous insult in all its circumstances, entirely characteristic of those who plotted it. I do not say this of all who voted for or supported those resolutions.

Now, sir, it gives me pleasure to advert to the third resolution, instructing my colleague and myself to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, because I can speak of this with all the respect and consideration with which I would desire to speak of all the acts and proceedings of the Legislature of my State. I have been for a long period of years in the public service as a representative of the people in one or the other branch of Congress; but I have never had occasion to speak publicly of my sentiments on the subject of the right of the Legislatures of the States to control the course or vote of their Senators upon all or any of the questions which may arise in that body, nor shall I enter into the subject at large now. I will not so far trespass on the indulgence of the Senate. This doctrine had its origin, as those who are intimately acquainted with its history well know, under the Confederation, when the States not only claimed, but had the power, to instruct their representatives in Congress, and to recall them too, they being nothing more than ambassadors from independent sovereignties attending a general Congress of the States. That is the origin of the popular notions which have prevailed on this subject. Practically, we know that this doctrine has long ceased to be of any great use in protecting the public interests of the country. I believe (I speak without perfect knowledge on the subject) that this doctrine is incorporated as an article of faith in the creed or political platform of none of the political parties of this day. The late Whig party discarded it altogether. The Democratic party, I believe, still profess the doctrine, particularly in some of the States; but from my observation here, I beg leave to say that I find Democratic Senators obeying or disobeying instructions at their discretion. The truth is, that its general use may be aptly termed an abuse. It is resorted to for the most part as an engine of party and to promote party ends, instead of protecting the public interests of the country. This doctrine, so far from having any support in the Constitution, in my judgment is directly at war both with the spirit and literal provisions of the Constitution as I interpret them. A principal aim of the framers of the Constitution, in giving to the Senate its peculiar structure and organization, was to secure greater stability to the policy of the Government, and greater consistency to the national legislation, than could be expected were both branches of Congress so constituted as to admit an entire change of its members every two years.

The advocates of this doctrine have contended that the right of instruction springs naturally from the relation which exists between the constituent and the representative—a plausible argument; but Senators do not represent the Legislature of their States. They represent, it is true, the sovereignty of their States—all that portion which is reserved to them after carving out that portion which is conferred on the Federal Government; but, on fundamental principles, that reserved sovereignty does not exist in the Legislature: it is in the people of the State. From my observation of the use which is made of this doctrine of instruction, I should say that the people would be, in general, a much safer depositary of the right of instruction than the Legislature; especially in times when the Legislatures become but little more than political juntas to manage the interests of a party, and to promote party ends.

Then, again, if the position that the right of instruction follows from the relation of constituent and representative, and that the Legislature, having the power to appoint Senators under the Constitution, must be regarded as their constituent, be well founded, it would follow, upon the same principle, that the electoral colleges of the States ought to have the right to control the policy and the measures of the President. They are as much the constituents of the President as the Legislatures are of Senators.

Again, the Constitution expressly provides that all the legislative powers granted by that instrument are vested in a Congress of the United States, to be composed of a Senate and House of Representatives. If the Legislatures of the several States have the rightful power to control the votes and the course of their Senators upon all questions which may arise in the Senate, that provision of the Constitution ought to be amended, so as to read that all the legislative powers herein granted are vested in a Congress of the United States, to be composed of the Senate and House of Representatives, and in the Legislatures of the several States. That would follow as an inevitable corollary. The true theory of the Constitution upon this subject, I think, is, that the Legislatures have been selected as the most convenient and proper instruments, by the framers of the Constitution, to appoint or choose the representatives of the States in the Senate; and that when they have performed that duty, they have no longer any control over them.

From these views it will be seen that I do not acknowledge the instructions of my Legislature as carrying with them any obligation of obedience; nevertheless, there is no member of this body who would be less willing to detract from, or to disparage, or to treat with indifference or disrespect, any expression of the opinions of a legislative body, in whatever form such opinions may be addressed to their Senators and Representatives, whether in the language of instruction or that of recommendation, or any other form which they think proper. Their views and opinions, in all cases, are entitled to respect; and when their opinions, expressed in the form of instructions, or any other form, appear to have proceeded from convictions springing from a full understanding of the subject in hand, in all its bearings and consequences, I would say they were entitled to great weight and influence with the Senator in deciding upon his course in relation to it—nay, sir, in whatever case the expression of the opinions of the Legislature should come to me, formed upon such an understanding of its bearings and consequences as I have described, and involving no constitutional difficulty, I should shape my course in deference to, and in conformity with, that opinion.

But, sir, that is not the present case; and it is unnecessary to inquire under what circumstances of knowledge or of influence this instructing resolution has been adopted by a majority of the members of the Legislature of Tennessee. I know, we all know, that we have not full and satisfactory knowledge of many material and important facts connected with the Lecompton constitution and its presentation here; and I have no reason to suppose that the members of the Legislature of Tennessee had more light or better information than we have here. But if, after availing myself of all the information within my reach, I should find myself constrained, by a sense of duty, to take a course adverse to that recommended by a majority of the members of the Legislature of Tennessee, it will be some consolation to me to know that when the proposition to instruct their Senators in Congress was first debated and brought to a vote in the House of Representatives of the Legislature of my State but a few weeks ago, it was voted down; and it will still be greater consolation to me to know, under all the circumstances, that at least three fourths, so far as I am informed, of my political friends in the Legislature, and perhaps even a greater proportion to the last, manifested their confidence in me by deciding that, on a question so great and involving such consequences as the present, and in the absence of full information upon the subject, I should be left free to take whatever course, in my judgment, should be best and safest for the protection of all great interests of the country. This they did under circumstances which warrant me in declaring that, by their conduct, they furnished an example of moral courage rarely, if ever, equalled and never surpassed, in the political history of the country.

They represented slaveholding communities; they were themselves at the same time sensitively alive to the consequences of any error they might fall into, which course might compromise southern rights. They sat as members of the Legislature, in the midst of a slaveholding community; and any one can appreciate the embarrassments and obstructions which they had to encounter from the sensitiveness of the owners of slaves, engendered and created by the long-continued agitation of the subject of slavery, to every step or movement of their representatives on a question touching even remotely their rights and interests. To add to the embarrassments arising from this cause, private advices and assurances from persons in Washington, said to be well informed and reliable, were circulated, to the effect that the admission of Kansas, with the Leocompton constitution, would not only make it a slave State for the present, but that it could be maintained permanently as such. Meanwhile, one of the most influential and leading journals of Tennessee, in the interest of the American and Whig parties, took decided ground in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Leocompton constitution, announcing that the time had come when the South must stand up against the North, come what might, and at the same time pointing its battery on every southern man who should dare to take an opposite course; and, in effect, denouncing them as recreants to southern rights, and allies of northern Abolitionists. Sir, it is not surprising that under such a fire there should be some faltering in the ranks of the minority of the Legislature; but yet the great body of that minority moved steadily on in their course of opposition to the policy of instruction.

I will endeavor not to disappoint their generous confidence in me, and as the best assurance I can give of my gratitude and my high appreciation of their noble daring, I will try to imitate it; and I now declare that, whatever might have been done under other circumstances, when I behold the angry storm cloud which now lowers over my country and theirs, if I should cower to it, and desert my post, I should consider myself self-abased—unworthy the confidence of such friends, and false to the great trust confided in me by my constituents. I move that the resolutions be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I regret, sir, that the remarks which have been made on this occasion compel me to say a few words in vindication of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. It is a very delicate thing to be compelled to make an issue with a colleague, on this floor or elsewhere; but I do not feel that I should be doing justice to what is commonly denominated the Democratic party of the State of Tennessee, if I were to remain silent and abstain from any reply to, or explanation of, what has been said by my colleague.

In making his remarks, my colleague has taken a course by which he intended to justify himself; and the conclusion of it was that he felt that the instructions of the Legislature of Tennessee were not binding upon him. He acknowledges no obligation of obedience to their instructions. He endeavored to prove, by a history of parties and events there, that the Legislature was not reflecting the popular sentiment. When we come to examine the history of parties in Tennessee, going no further back than 1854, we find that the Kansas-Nebraska question was then a matter of discussion throughout the State of Tennessee. I again repeat that I regret that this discussion has been imposed upon me; but, painful as it may be, I shall not shrink from a duty when it is imposed upon me. But for the remarks made by the Senator himself on the resolutions which have been presented, I should have been spared the performance of this painful duty.

The honorable gentleman undertakes to show that the Legislature of Tennessee, or the people of the State through their Legislature, have slept too long; that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed in 1854, and that it is strange, remarkably strange, that they should have waited until the present period of time before they instructed him. When we go back to the proceedings of the Legislature in 1854, we find that the subject was then before the Legislature prior to the passage of the bill in this House; and the Senate of Tennessee then passed the following resolution:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the bill now pending before Congress, called the Nebraska bill, the leading principle of which is that Congress has no right to legislate on the subject of slavery, but that the same is an institution over which the people alone, in forming their organic law, have full power and control, meets our cordial approval and is sanctioned clearly by the principles of the bills creating territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah, and we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives to give it their hearty support."

This resolution passed the Senate with but only one dissenting voice: it went to the House of Representatives; and there Mr. Lamb, a member of the Legislature, introduced a resolution in substance the same. Mr. McKnight, a representative from the county of Rutherford, moved a resolution in lieu of Mr. Lamb's, as follows:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we cordially approve of the amendment proposed by the Hon. Archibald Dixon, of Kentucky, to the bill reported to the Senate of the United States by the Committee on Territories, for the organization and government of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. That we believe the principle involved in said amendment—that is, the extension of the principles of the compromise to those Territories—just and equitable in itself, and that it is in conformity with the Federal Constitution, with the treaty by which those Territories were acquired, and with the compromise of 1850."

This was introduced by a Whig member of the House of Representatives, and voted for by every Whig in that body. In 1854, while the Kansas-Nebraska act was pending before Congress, the instructing resolution which I first read was passed in the State Senate. The resolution went to the House of Representatives, and there a substitute was offered by Mr. McKnight, who was a Whig member, and every Whig in the Legislature voted for that amendment, which expressed approval of the proposition of Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky, to repeal the Missouri compromise. When we take these two resolutions together, one passed by the Senate of Tennessee in 1854, and the other voted for by every member of the Whig party, to which my honorable colleague belongs, in the House of Representatives of Tennessee, can there be any mistake about public opinion there? Can we pause, for a single moment, in reference to public opinion on that question? It seems to me not.

But my honorable colleague spoke of the contest of 1855. He will pardon me for making the allusion, but I was engaged in that contest. I was one of the candidates for Governor. I canvassed the State from the mountains of Johnson county to the Chickasaw Bluffs in Shelby county. I was in nearly every county in the State; and well do I recollect the exciting events that took place during that canvass. I had a competitor who was eloquent, who is known to many members of this House, who was with me on every stump in the State. One of the leading issues in that canvass was the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I pressed my competitor upon it before every audience, and there were scarcely ever such turn outs in the State as during that canvass. It was one of the main issues between him and me. I pressed him upon it in every single speech I made in the State; and he uniformly declined to take ground. He was afraid to take ground against it or for it, as was then believed, for fear it would injure him in the canvass. He was afraid of coming in conflict with my honorable colleague and others in the State. There was no doubt, in fact, that he harmonized and agreed with the Democratic party on this point; yet he shrank from the responsibility with a view of getting many votes by taking a non-committal course. If he had taken bold ground against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, with the other issues pending in that canvass, he would have been beaten thousands and thousands throughout the State; but from the fact of his taking a non-committal position on the Kansas-Nebraska act, he was enabled to get many votes which he would not have received if he had taken bold ground on that question.

So far as the canvass of 1855 is concerned, can there be a doubt as to what the popular sentiment was? Can there be any mistake about it? After one of the most bitter and vindictive, and I may say malignant canvasses ever conducted in any State of this Confederacy, the Democratic party were triumphant throughout the State of Tennessee; the popular vote decided that the Democratic party was right. Then there can be no mistake in the history of the question thus far.

In November, 1856, we had another election. Prior to that election, however, the respective parties laid down a platform, and they took ground upon that platform. At Cincinnati, in June, 1856, upon the Kansas-Nebraska question, the Democratic party passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents; and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

This was laid down as one of the tenets in the Democratic creed. Mr. Buchanan, in his letter accepting the nomination, referred to this question, and placed himself upon that precise issue. In the fall of 1856 the canvass came on, with this as one of the main issues discussed in every district, in every county, in every town throughout the State. Mr. Buchanan's committal to the resolution adopted in 1856, in the Cincinnati convention, was well known, and it was the main issue throughout the State. We had carried the State in 1855, by a handsome majority under the circumstances; and with this the main issue in the canvass of 1856, the electors in the fields, and hundreds of other speakers throughout the State, Tennessee was carried for Mr. Buchanan, on the Kansas-Nebraska issue, by 7,500 votes. In our elections which took place last summer, following the popular impulse, and the decision made by the people of the State in the preceding year, the majority of the Democratic party was increased, and our present Governor, after canvassing the State from one extreme to the other, was elected by a majority of 10,000 votes.

Then can there be any sort of doubt, can there be the slightest semblance of a doubt, as to the opinion of the people of Tennessee on the Kansas-Nebraska question? Can we hesitate for one moment? Can we hesitate as to the opinion on this great question that has distracted and divided the public mind from one extreme of the country to the other? Can we believe for a moment that the people of Tennessee have not made up their minds on this subject? In addition to that, after the recent election for Governor, in which the Democratic candidate triumphed by ten thousand majority, we find both branches of the Legislature reflecting that popular sentiment, and sending it here in the shape of resolutions.

It is of this that my honorable colleague seems most to complain. The Legislature, having a majority of Democrats in both Houses, have by resolutions undertaken to reflect what they conceive to be the will of the people; and to this he objects. Can the Legislature be mistaken as to the will of the people? Have they misrepresented the people? Have they done any injustice in declaring that the will of the people of Tennessee is in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Leocompton constitution?

But my honorable colleague states that these resolutions contain a garbled extract of his speech, and he complains of that. Whether he intends it or not, his remarks are calculated to make the impression that there has been some portion of his speech taken from its context, and that by the separation of some material part he has been represented as meaning something that he did not mean. When we turn to the speech and examine it, we find that no injustice has been done to the honorable Senator. I have before me a pamphlet copy of his speech on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, revised and corrected by himself, I presume, and circulated all over the State of Tennessee, in which I find this declaration:

"I was told, by some of my friends, that if I opposed the bill, such a course would be utterly destructive to me; that it would lead to a disruption of the Whig party in Tennessee, and furnish a plausible ground for imputations upon my motives. And those friendly warnings were given me up to the time of the final vote in the Senate. I said to some of those who thus kindly interposed their counsel frankly, that if my course, whatever it should be, was not approved by the Whigs of Tennessee, I was not ready to retire from the Senate—that I would do it most cheerfully."

On referring to the resolution introduced by Mr. McKnight, in the House of Representatives of Tennessee, we find that it was introduced by a Whig, voted for by Whigs, and that party as a party in the House of Representatives declared that they approved of the gist, the main point incorporated in the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That is no garbled extract. They did not recite this in the resolution. They did not go as far as they might have gone. But what they did recite will be found in the speech which has been read by the honorable gentleman, and I think the Legislature have done him no injustice in the extract they have quoted:

"A noble, generous, and high-minded Senator from the South, within the last few days before the final vote was taken on the bill, appealed to me in a manner which I can not narrate, and which affected me most deeply; the recollection of its effects and influences my feelings now, and ever will. I told that honorable Senator that there was one feature in the bill which made it impossible that I should vote for it, if I waived all other objections. I said to him, and I said to others who had made appeals to me on the subject, that, while it would afford me great pleasure to be sustained by my constituents, yet if I was not, I would resign my seat here the moment I found that my course upon this subject was not acceptable to them. As for my standing as a public man, and whatever prospects a public man of long service in the councils of the country might be supposed to have, I would resign them all with pleasure. I told that gentleman that if, upon this or any other great question affecting the interest of the South, I should find my views conflicting materially with what should appear to be the settled sentiment of that section, I should feel it my imperative duty to retire."

My honorable colleague said, in another portion of his speech, that he would not be seen in the Senate another day after it was ascertained that his course was not acceptable to the people of Tennessee. Why, then, should the Legislature be complained of? The honorable gentleman says he looks upon the resolutions as an insult. An insult to recite his own language and address it to him in respectful terms, and present it to the Senate of the United States! That is no garbled extract. It is the speech as it is in its context, and reads just as it is. There is the fair, unequivocal declaration, that if his course came in conflict with the views of the people of Tennessee, he would not be seen in the Senate another day. Where is there anything wrong or insulting in reciting that? It seems to me that it is an improper construction put upon the resolutions, and great injustice has been done to those who passed them.

I have shown that the Whigs in the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, in 1854, voted to instruct their Senator to go for Mr. Dixon's amendment, or in other words, the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Now, the honorable gentleman says that repeal has produced agitation and confusion and strife throughout the country; has led to those mischievous influences that have been exerted from one end of the country to the other. As that subject has been introduced, I think we may just as well go into it understandingly and put it right. The query comes up, who is responsible for the passage, in the language of my honorable colleague, "of this most unfortunate act," as he says to-day "that was ever passed by the Congress of the United States?" If its consequences have been mischievous and dangerous, if it has caused a sectional division of parties, and if, as some infer, it may lead to a dissolution of the Union, I ask who is responsible? Where did the repeal of the Missouri compromise begin? In 1850 there was a bill passed establishing a territorial government in New Mexico. One of the provisions of that bill declared that New Mexico, "when admitted as a State, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of admission." In what condition was New Mexico at that time? New Mexico ran up to the forty-second degree of north latitude. You went on to fix the southern boundary, and embraced a certain area as the Territory of New Mexico. Prior to the establishment of the territorial government in 1850, what was the condition of that Territory between 36° 30' and 42°?

In 1845, on the motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the Missouri compromise was extended to the western boundary of Texas, along the line of 36° 30'. The Missouri compromise was in existence to the western boundary of Texas in 1850, when we passed the bill establishing a territorial government for New Mexico. When was the Missouri compromise repealed? Without the incorporation of that provision in the bill establishing a territorial government for New Mexico, the people north of the line of 36° 30' would have been excluded from the introduction of slavery; but in the bill, you say that when they are admitted into the Union, they shall be admitted with or without slavery, as they may prescribe in their constitution. This is clearly a repeal of the Missouri compromise restriction, and enables the people, if they think proper, in the formation of their constitution, to establish slavery in that Territory. The Missouri compromise extended to the western boundary of Texas, along the line of 36° 30', and excluded slavery in the Territory between 36° 30' and 42°. The incorporation of that provision into the New Mexico bill, providing for their admission into the Union with or without slavery, removed the slavery restriction from 36° 30' up to 42°. That is the gist, that is the point, that is the great thing which was gained in 1850; that is what was understood to be the pivot on which all the compromise measures of 1850 turned. It was the removal of the slavery restriction, in fact, from New Mexico, and the establishment of a principle on which all future Territories were to come into the Union as States. We cannot misunderstand this.

Then, who voted for that repeal in 1850? And was not the Missouri compromise then repealed? It was to that extent, and the principle was established of admitting all future States into the Union on the policy of non-interference with slavery, allowing the people to have it or not, as they might prescribe in their constitution. Who voted for the repeal—that most unfortunate act? Who voted for the repeal—a measure which has resulted in bringing on the country so many mischievous consequences? Did not my honorable colleague stand up in 1850 and say "repeal it?" Then we get a beginning-point. Now what extent of territory was that? Some may think there was none there; but what extent of territory is there between 36° 30' and 42° in New Mexico, from which the restriction was removed in 1850? I have taken the trouble to look at the map, and I find that there is enough of territory from which the slavery restriction was removed in 1850 by the repeal of the Missouri compromise to make eight States: in other words, there is enough to make a State larger than eight States in this Confederacy. There are 20,050 square miles in New Mexico, above the line of 36° 30', from which the slavery restriction was removed by the act of 1850, for which my colleague voted. New Hampshire has only 9,280 square miles; Vermont, 10,212; Rhode Island, 1,306; Connecticut, 4,674. Even the State of Massachusetts has only 7,800 square miles; New Jersey, 8,320; Maryland, 11,120; Delaware, 2,120. This Territory was ten times larger than some of these sovereign States of the Confederacy. In 1850 the slavery restriction was removed from this, extent of territory; for it was free territory then, and it was made discretionary with the people to have slavery or not afterwards in forming their State constitution.

Then we come to 1854. The Kansas-Nebraska territorial bill was first reported by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Illinois, and it came before this body. It was then sent back to the committee, and they reported it with a provision—doing what? Making no new law, but simply interpreting what was meant by the act which was intended as a repeal of the Missouri compromise, for they refer to the act of 1850, and establish that as a principle. Then they incorporate another provision in the following words, which are familiar to every member of the Senate:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Another provision of the Kansas-Nebraska act is in identically the same words as are contained in the bill establishing the territorial government of New Mexico. What are they? That when they are admitted into the Union as a State they shall be admitted with or without slavery as the people may prescribe in their constitution. The words are the same in the New Mexico bill as in the Kansas bill. All you did in 1854 was simply to interpret what you meant by the act of 1850, and that was that the people should come into the Union as a State with or without slavery as they might prescribe in their constitution; that it was not the intention of the act to legislate slavery in or out of the Territory, but to leave the people free to act upon the subject, and it is nothing more nor less than an interpretation of the act of 1850. In this body this identical proposition came up on a motion to strike out a portion of the bill. Mr. Dixon's amendment substantially was incorporated into the bill and perfected a little more by the chairman. A motion was made to strike out that clause, and upon it the yeas and nays were taken. That involved the very measure that my honorable colleague says has resulted in so much mischief, has produced agitation, and may bring about a dissolution of the Union; but he, under the solemn sanction of an oath, with all the lights before him, said "no; let it remain in the bill; repeal the Missouri compromise; that is the correct interpretation of the act of 1850; that is what I voted for then, and that is what I affirm now." If this has been the most unfortunate act, if it has produced agitation, if it has produced distraction, and in the end should bring about a dissolution of the Union, my worthy colleague voted to put that very thing in the bill which has brought about all this agitation throughout this country.

But when the bill was put on its passage, after this provision was incorporated in it, it is true my honorable colleague voted against it; but the point, the gist of the thing, was voted for in 1850, and retained in the act of 1854. On a naked, clean proposition to exclude it from the bill, my honorable colleague said "no, let it remain there;" and now he tells the country that the repeal of the Missouri compromise was an unfortunate act—the most unfortunate that ever passed the Congress of the United States!

I know that, in my own State, and I have no doubt it is the case in most of the States of the Union, there is one party who deny obedience to popular sentiment, and who are always ready and willing, when they can do so plausibly and successfully, to evade the popular sentiment, especially when it comes in conflict with their peculiar notions. I know that there is a party in this country who have a great dread of popular sentiment; and hence many assume the position that the Senate of the United States is placed beyond the reach of the popular will, and should be so. I hold to no such doctrine. I hold that the popular sentiment, when fairly and fully expressed, should be obeyed by public agents in this Government. We assume here that all power is in the people, that they are sovereign; and when the sovereign expresses his will the agent is bound to obey. I know, as well as my honorable colleague, that there is nothing in the Constitution which requires or compels a Senator or Representative to obey instructions, further than what is acknowledged by the respective parties of the country. The Democratic party, as I understand, lay down the doctrine that their public servants are always bound to obey the popular will when it is fairly and fully understood and expressed. Take the expression of the Legislature of Tennessee in 1854; take the expression of the people in 1855; take the expression of the people in 1856; take their expression in 1857; and in every step we find that the popular sentiment is directed to one unerring point; and the people are in favor of the great principle laid down in the Kansas-Nebraska bill. What principle is that? That the people are the source of power; that when they come to form their organic law, it is for them to determine the nature and character of their institutions, without interference on the part of the Federal Government. The Democratic party hold that Governments are instituted for the good of the people; that a Government derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed; that government is made and organized and established for the people's convenience, and not the people for the Government; that the Government should always feel itself under the control of the popular sentiment, instead of the people feeling that they are under the control of the sentiment of the Government; that the Government should always be dependent on the people for support, instead of the people looking up to the Government to be protected and supported by it.

There are two parties in this Government, as there have been in all Governments, since men were organized into communities, and the Kansas-Nebraska bill tests the fundamental principle of the two parties in this country. The Kansas-Nebraska bill proclaims the great principle which was incorporated into the Declaration of Independence in 1776, when it issued forth from the old Congress Hall in Philadelphia, as a blaze of light and as a beacon to the patriots of the Revolution. It asserts the great principle which was established by the successful Revolution of our fathers. What was that? That these Colonies are free and independent, and have a right to form their own constitutions, to regulate their own domestic institutions; that they are not dependent on Parliament; that they are not dependent on the Crown. Reversing the old notion of the divine right of kings; reversing the notion that an aristocracy, or a particular class of the community, has a right to govern contrary to the popular sentiment, they established the great principle that the people are sovereign; that the people are the source of power; that all government must be derived from the consent of the governed.

What, however, is the principle set up by those who opposed the Kansas-Nebraska bill? It is that sovereignty must reside somewhere; that it must have a lodgment; that it must have an abiding place; and they say this sovereignty resides in Congress. If Congress, by the passage of an organic law, can determine the nature and character of the institutions of the Territories in the formation of their State governments, do not the Territories occupy, towards the Congress of the United States, the same relation that the Colonies occupied to the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain? The Kansas-Nebraska bill proclaimed, in unmistakable language, that sovereignty resides in the people. That is the difference between the principles of the friends and opponents of that measure.

Nowadays we hear men talk about enabling acts on the part of Congress, as it would seem to develop sovereignty; and some tells us that Congress has sovereignty over the Territories vested in it as a trustee. I say this is reasserting the old doctrine which our fathers repudiated, and on account of which the separation of this Government was brought about from the mother-country. What, sir, an enabling act to authorize those who are sovereign to make a State? Opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska bill is a denial of the exercise of the great principle that man is capable of self-government and has a right to make his own government. My honorable colleague, while he voted to incorporate the mischievous and unfortunate part in the bill, then turned round and recorded his vote against it, thus denying the exercise of that great principle by the people in their original, organic character.

Some gentlemen who argue this question do not seem to be aware of the conclusions that naturally result from their premises. I have laid it down as a rule for myself that where I cannot see results clearly, where I cannot see all the collateral issues that may be brought up; where there is a principle involved, in the language of that philosopher and statesman, Mr. Jefferson, in all doubtful questions I will pursue principles. In the pursuit of correct principle, you can never reach a wrong conclusion. In this discussion there is involved a great principle—a principle of free government. We started in the revolution on the great idea that the people are sovereigns, that the people are capable of self-government, that the people have a right to originate their governments and determine the nature and character of their own institutions. When men get into Congress, however, removed from the people, their view becomes circumscribed; their vision is not quite so acute; they do not discriminate so nicely in reference to the power of the people; they become timid; they dread popular sentiment; they do not discover the true location of sovereign power. A distinguished gentleman of this body has informed us that Congress holds the sovereignty of the Territories as trustee, that it is here in a state of abeyance. The idea of a man who can reason from cause to effect, who can discover the relation and dependencies of one thing on another, who understands something of that great law which observes the relation of things, talking about sovereignty being vested in the Congress of the United States, strikes me as very singular. What is this Federal Government? It is a government of derived, of limited powers, not possessing a single original power. Can we by any process of reasoning convert the derivative into the primitive? Can we convert the creature into the creator? Whence does this Government derive its power? From the States. It is the agent of the States, exercising delegated but not sovereign power. Where do the States derive their power? From the people. The people are the source, the original lodgment of power. Power is inherent in man now as in the Revolution. When a State is to be formed you must go back to this original power. Congress cannot impart it.

We are told by some that when a Territory has assumed the shape of an inchoate State, it may petition. I am noticing these objections in connection with the bold position taken by my colleague in opposition to the people making their own government, and in opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It is said that after the people of a Territory have organized themselves, not as a State, but in somewhat of an embryo condition, as a State in incipency, an inchoate State, they may come here with a constitution in the shape of a petition, and that Congress, by a subsequent act, may cure the defects, may overlook the informalities or irregularities, and admit them.

Now, when we come to examine this proposition, it seems to me its absurdity is so striking, that those who wish to be right cannot fail to see it. What can Congress do on this subject? The Congress may—it is not compelled to do so—admit new States. The grant of power to admit a State does not confer on Congress power to make a State. The Congress may admit new States, but it has no power to make one. The idea of a community coming before Congress as petitioners, and Congress, by an act of admission overlooking irregularities and converting that community into a State, is an absurdity; it is a contradiction of terms that cannot be reconciled. Congress cannot admit anything but a State; and it must be a State in the technical and proper sense of that term before Congress can admit it; so that it is not the act of admission that makes it a State. The simple act of admission merely makes it a member of this Union of States. It must be a State before. Congress cannot admit anything but a State; and it is not the act of admission that makes the State.

I see that some of the opponents of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, when hard pressed, when hunting for power in the Constitution in reference to legislation by Congress in regard to new States, abandon that old clause they used to rely upon that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," and consequently can pass laws in reference to territorial governments. They have given that up; they have abandoned that idea; and when hard pressed, they now say that Congress, under the power to admit new States, may make a State. That is reversing all the rules of construction. It is making the incident a much greater power than the express grant. The argument is that the power to admit a State implies that you may make it; but it must be a State before you can admit it, so that there is nothing in that argument.

When we get back to the original meaning of the Constitution, properly speaking Congress has no right to legislate in the Territories, beyond making laws for the disposition of the public lands; but precedent and custom have gone on from time to time, until we have worn into it, and come to regard it as a part of the Constitution. My colleague, with others in taking their stand against the Kansas-Nebraska bill, did so against that great principle which lies at the foundation of this Government, that the people are the true source of power, that the people have the right and ought to determine the nature and character of their institutions in the formation of their constitution. Suppose an honest emigrant goes from the State of North Carolina, or Tennessee, or any of the older States, to Kansas, or any other Territory; he was a source of power in the State from which he emigrated, and the State derived all its legitimate functions from him as an item or part of the aggregation. I should like to know, when he goes into a Territory, if he does not carry sovereignty with him? Sovereignty is inherent in man. Man carries sovereignty into the Territories with him. Congress may give its assent that a certain number of individuals may erect a government upon its soil—the fee being here, the power existing on the part of the Federal Government to expel or eject intruders and trespassers. That is all the assent they need have from Congress. Man carries sovereignty with him; and sovereignty is the essential necessary to constitute a State. When the people in a Territory come to form their organic law, it is for them to combine their will in the shape of a constitution; and when they get there, I might say each is a part of one entire whole—the people's will the sovereign and soul.

Government emanates from them. They are the source of power. A government might be itinerant; yet it would be with the people though it might have no abiding place. All that is necessary is the assent of Congress, the fee being here and Congress having the power and the right to eject and expel intruders from its public domain; but that which is essential and necessary to constitute a government and make a State. Such a State as should be admitted into this Confederacy, must emanate from the people—not from enabling acts, not from laws curing defects. Sovereignty is inherent in man. He carries it with him as an item or part of the aggregate community that forms an organic law.

"What constitutes a State?"

Not high-raised battlement or labor'd mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-arm'd ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starry'd and spangled courts,
Where low-brow'd baseness waits perfume to pride.
No!—men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued,
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men, who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain,
Prevent the long aim'd blow,
And crush the tyrant, while they rend the chain:—
These constitute a State."

Not your enabling acts, not your acts curing defects, not authority from Congress, but authority from the people; and the voice of the people, when it comes up here, even to the Senate, this august, dignified, and intelligent body, far removed from the people as it is, through their Legislatures, should be potential, and should be observed and obeyed.

Where does resistance to the Kansas-Nebraska act and to the principles laid down in it carry us? Let me address Democrats from the South on this question; we may as well come up to it like men. Some of us are a little timid and afraid when the sentiments of our hearts are known and understood, to trust the people on this great question of slavery. If we concede on the one hand that sovereignty is here, and that Congress has absolute control over the Territories, where is the South? Have not your opponents got the power both as to States and numbers of Representatives, and if you concede that sovereign power is lodged here to control, and that sovereignty emanates from the Federal Government, have you any hope? None. But according to the principle laid down in the Kansas-Nebraska act, the principle established in 1850, of leaving the people perfectly free to determine the nature and character of their own institutions, let us take our chances as to this institution of slavery as the people may determine. Here it is against us; there is some chance for us if we leave the question to the people. If they say "no slavery," exclude it from every Territory in the Union; but if they say "slavery," in the organic law which they may form, and come here for admission, let it remain; it is no business of Congress. It is for the people, and not the Congress of the United States, to decide. Where, I ask, does opposition to this principle lead? Where are those of you that deny this power and say it shall be exercised by Congress instead of the people in the formation of their constitutions, going? I find a resolution, adopted in Philadelphia, in June, 1856, which declares—

"That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government, and that in the exercise of this power it is both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism—polygamy and slavery.”

I ask our southern friends as well as our northern friends, where does this principle carry us? I know those in hot pursuit of the slavery question are willing to assume, and have assumed, because they have the power, that Congress is sovereign, and therefore has jurisdiction of the question of slavery in the Territories; but the time will come when negroes get out of the way, when a large portion of that party will abandon that principle, and deny that any such power is conferred on the Congress of the United States as sovereignty over the Territories. Every man who denies the exercise of power by the people, and claims it on the part of the Federal Government, is led naturally to the platform of the Black Republicans adopted in 1856, in the nomination of Mr. Fremont. Where else does it carry you? It carries you back to that position which was maintained and exercised by the Parliament and Crown of Great Britain in reference to the colonies. We might as well get right in reference to first principles. The time will come when a large portion of the Republican party, when negroes get out of the way, when the question of slavery is removed, and they begin to analyze the great principles of free government, will repudiate the doctrine that Congress is sovereign in the Territories. I deny it wholly. It comes in conflict with the first principles of free government. I care not whether it is exercised or claimed by the Black Republicans of the North, or any other description of party, North or South, East or West.

I have said more than I intended, Mr. President, but I have been induced to speak at this length because we have before us the subject of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and the doctrine of instructions, which together embrace the first principles of this Government. I did not hear my honorable colleague state what would be his position as to the last resolution. He will not understand me as improperly asking the question, what is his position in regard to it?

Mr. BELL. I will answer my colleague with precision. After stating the grounds on which I thought the doctrine of instruction was not solidly founded, I said that it would be perceived that I did not acknowledge the instructions of the Legislature of my State as imposing on me the obligation of obedience; but, nevertheless, I would defer greatly to the sentiment of my Legislature on any subject in regard to which I believed their views to be founded on a knowledge of the subject in all its bearings and consequences; and in such a case as that, unless there was some constitutional difficulty in the way, I would defer to their sentiments. My colleague, I hope, is now thoroughly informed of my true position on this subject. I say the sentiments of the Legislature should be treated with respect in all cases where they appear to have been founded on a full knowledge of the subject on which they instruct their Senators, in all its bearings and consequences; and I would be disposed to conform my course according to them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not wish to travel out of the way to interrogate my colleague; for, if I know myself, it is my intention to cultivate those relations which should always subsist between men who occupy places on this floor; but I confess that I do not know whether I understand my honorable colleague now or not. It may be my fault, though, and not his. It may be my misfortune, and not his fault.

Mr. BELL. I ask my colleague to state any difficulty, and I will answer him with frankness.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Throwing in a good many contingencies, he says that if there were no constitutional difficulties in the way, he would be inclined to defer to the will of the Legislature; but there are so many conditions—“ifs,” and “ands,” and “buts”—that I am at a loss to understand his true meaning.

Mr. BELL. But I will take all conditions away, except the question of constitutional right. Now understand me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then do I understand my colleague as saying there is any constitutional difficulty in the way of the present question of the admission of Kansas?

Mr. BELL. Not at all. My colleague now understands me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am very much gratified at that.

Mr. BELL. I do not go into details. There might be questions which I should suppose the Legislature did not understand. I have predicated the course which I should adopt under instructions, upon the idea that their instructions should appear to be in pursuance of convictions founded upon a thorough understanding of the subject on which they undertake to instruct, in all its bearings and consequences. Now I hope my colleague understands me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Not quite.

Mr. BELL. I will explain further. I do not mean anything equivocal at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. As we have got into this colloquy on this question, and as it is going on pleasantly, and nothing unkind is meant or intended, I wish to know whether my colleague will vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution in consequence of the instructions, or will vote for it without regard to them. I want to get at the precise point of the extent to which the instructions bear on his course.

Mr. BELL. I will gratify my colleague in any reasonable wish or desire he can have. I will answer that I would not, in consequence of any instruction of the Legislature of my State, act as the Legislature desired, unless I should be convinced or believed that those instructions were founded on a full understanding of the subject in all its bearings and consequences. Now, I hope my colleague understands me. If he does not, and will state his difficulty, I will answer it or explain it. I say this with a perfectly friendly feeling.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The position of my honorable colleague, if I understand it, is this: in the first place, to the instructions as to the will of the people, expressed in 1854, and repeated in 1855, and again in 1856, and in 1857, he does not acknowledge obedience.

Mr. BELL. Will my colleague allow me to explain that?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. He understands that I say I would not defer to any opinion of the Legislature expressed in 1854, while that bill was pending before the Senate. Do I understand him to say that he wants to know that?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. I assuredly would not, upon the ground that I considered then, as I consider now, that they had no such knowledge, or reflection, or understanding, of the tendencies of that measure, as could authorize them to instruct me under such circumstances as to make me feel morally bound to defer to their opinion, independent of any question as to the right of instruction. I would respect the resolutions of my Legislature, when not only passed by my friends, but even by my opponents. I should not wish to treat them with disrespect; but when I came to act on the subject I should treat them with reference to the foundations on which I supposed their opinions to have been expressed and their instructions given. I should inquire whether they understood the subject properly or not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understood my colleague then to state, that the instructions in reference to his course in 1854 have no influence upon him whatever.

Mr. BELL. I do not say so, and I do not authorize my colleague to say so.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understood my colleague to say he would disregard them.

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I do not mean to say that I shall disregard them. Whatever I have uttered on this subject, and whatever I propose to utter, I do not mean shall be misrepresented in this body. I have said that there is a certain respect due to the expression of the opinions of a Legislature in all cases and under all circumstances. I have expressed that opinion heretofore, and I do not mean to take any ground inconsistent with it. I do not think my colleague can misunderstand me, if he is disposed to understand me. I do not say this with any unfriendly feeling, but I have stated distinctly the ground on which I act in this case. When the Legislature of Tennessee express their views, or wishes, or instructions, or recommendations, to me as the representative of the State which they represent, I feel bound to treat them with a certain degree of respect in all cases; and when I perceive that those instructions have proceeded from convictions founded on a full examination of the subject in all its bearings and consequences, I ought to defer to them, and I suppose that I ought not to set my individual opinions against them.

But the case is different as to opinions such as those hastily formed when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was under consideration in the Senate; and although every friend I had in that Legislature voted in favor of such a measure as that, under the circumstances under which I presume they must have voted, without reflection, from sudden impulse, on the question being proposed to them suddenly, and never having been mooted or considered by the people before the moment when it was introduced into this body; though I should respect my friends in the Legislature, and my political opponents, and should not speak harshly of them, I should say that these were not expressions of opinion founded on such examination and investigation of the question, in all its bearings and consequences, as ought to induce me to defer to it. I acknowledge a moral obligation to act reasonably on all questions of this kind—not to act merely on my opinions, which may be formed upon prejudice. I ought not to be bigoted and obstinate in setting up my own judgment against the deliberately formed opinion of a whole community, or of all my political friends, as would seem to be the case in the instance referred to by my honorable colleague, in regard to the amendment offered by Mr. McKnight. I feel great kindness and respect for their views in all things; but I should utterly disregard them in the formation of my opinion as to the course to be pursued in reference to the great interests which I should know they wanted to advance and protect as well as myself. Without treating them with the least disrespect, I would not be governed by their opinions, formed under such circumstances, particularly in relation to the question of slavery in a community.

I have already expressed my thanks to those friends who stood by me in the very breach, and said, “We will leave our Senators to decide as in their judgment they shall think best, with confidence: those Senators are as much interested in protecting the great rights of the South on the question of slavery as we are.” My colleague probably knows that a great many men in the South are more deeply interested than I am in the protection of that peculiar slave interest; but I presume he knows that I am largely interested myself. If he does not, I now inform him so; and I inform him further, that I have suffered in my property by the continued and eternal agitation of the question; by the very course pursued by the party to which he belongs, in consequence of the declarations and the declamation and the announcement of the leaders of his own party in the election of 1856. The result of their course then was, that the prospect of freedom was discussed in every kitchen and every slave cabin in the State of Tennessee, and, I presume, in most of the other slave States of the Union.

I stand here unimpeachable on that ground. What I contend for, as the great interest of the owners of slave property in the South, is peace. The hinge on which my course will turn as to the question of which my colleague has inquired of me, is whether or not the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution will give peace and quiet on the subject of slavery? I am deeply interested in the question.

My colleague has spoken about the principle of popular sovereignty, and I congratulate the gentlemen from the South who have listened to him with so much attention. I think he has made the strongest argument against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, that I have heard in this body; but that is not the point which I make now. I say that the pivot on which my whole policy turns, is to have peace on this question. If I can be made to believe that the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, will give peace, I am for it. My great object is to have peace and quiet on the subject of slavery, between the North and the South. I know very well that I take a totally different view from some of my southern friends in reference to the objects to be secured in this matter. I choose to call them friends, for there has been no breach in our social intercourse, though with some there may have been a tendency to it. If they can satisfy me on any ground that the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution will give peace, I shall go with them most cordially; but, if its tendencies and consequences are not to give peace, I am against it now, firmly, and forever. I want this question settled. I am not sure that the proposition before the Senate and the country will give peace; and indeed, so far as the information I have derived extends, I am inclined to think that it does not tend to give peace.

I think peace can be given on this question, and no intelligent man can doubt it. Peace can be given and insured; but passion, resentment, pride of consistency, may, perhaps, prevent the adoption of a course which will secure it.

I am much obliged to my colleague for allowing this interpolation of my views. I think he has made the most powerful argument on principle, that I have ever heard on the floor of the Senate against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; but perhaps he can explain it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am very much obliged to my colleague for the courteous and lucid manner in which he has some two or three times defined his position; and I must conclude that there is nothing wanting on his part, but it is obtuseness on the part of myself that I cannot comprehend clearly and distinctly all his positions.

Mr. BELL. I am sorry for it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is an unfortunate condition to be in. In the first place I understand my competitor—

Mr. BELL. I am no competitor of my colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I accept the correction, and respect the motive which prompts it. I understand him, first, to say he disregards the instructions given in the first resolution in reference to his former course on the Kansas question.

Mr. BELL. I beg to correct my colleague again. I pray that he will do me justice. I said that I begged to differ in opinion with the Legislature on that subject, in the most courteous language that I was capable of using—not to disregard them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Without being egotistical or vain, I sometimes believe that I know when I have an issue, and when I know that I have one which will hold. Now, to save the multiplication of words, or any further explanation on this subject, I will try to make myself understood. The resolutions of the Legislature declare:

"Be it further resolved, That, in our opinion, the voice of Mr. BELL's countrymen of Tennessee, in the recent elections, has declared against his course on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, a question of vital importance to the South."

Here are two resolutions about which there can be no mistake; but the point of my honorable colleague is, that in reference to these two resolutions there has not been sufficient time to mature public opinion. Let us look at this point in a proper spirit, and see whether we cannot come to a full understanding of the matter. In 1854, the Legislature, in both branches, expressed an opinion on the course he took at that time. He seems to think they then did not understand the question. Well, sir, in 1855, an election came off in the State, which was canvassed from one extreme to the other. This identical question was discussed, and a majority of the people, by their vote, decided against him.

Mr. BELL. May I ask my colleague to say whether any resolution was passed by the Legislature in relation to the subject, while the Kansas-Nebraska bill was pending?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. One resolution passed the Senate, giving instructions on the question. Another resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, for which a majority of all your own party voted, in lieu of Mr. Lamb's resolution, approving of that part of the Kansas-Nebraska act which repealed the Missouri compromise.

Mr. BELL. My own party voted for Lamb's resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. They are a portion of the people of Tennessee.

Mr. BELL. Undoubtedly; but I want to understand my colleague. Does he mean to say that my friends in the Legislature voted for Lamb's amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is understood of course that the Democrats were all for it; but we only wanted to make the moral power of the thing still more forcible. A large majority of both parties voted for it.

Mr. BELL. Will my colleague state what was the result of all that?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It resulted that there was no joint resolution passed.

Mr. BELL. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. But a majority of both bodies expressed their opinion emphatically and unequivocally. This was the Legislature of 1854. Then, in 1856, in the presidential election, the State was carried upon this identical issue by a majority of seven thousand votes. One of the electors, General Harris, who discussed this identical Kansas-Nebraska question as an elector for the State at large, succeeded by a majority of seven thousand five hundred, and in 1857 he was elected Governor by ten thousand majority. In 1856 the majority was seven thousand five hundred, and in 1857 it was ten thousand; but still the honorable gentleman cannot understand that the views of the people of Tennessee on this subject have been matured. I do not wish to be unkind or personal, for if I know myself I have the kindest feelings for my colleague. The Legislature have merely recited his own language, which he used in the Senate Chamber. He declared in the speech which they quote, that if any respectable portion of the people of Tennessee disagreed with him he would not be seen in the Senate a day longer. That is the substance of what he said. In the name of common sense, what process could be adopted to ascertain the popular sentiment of Tennessee on this great and important question if it has not already been ascertained? The Legislature, in 1858, has passed these resolutions. There have been four years for deliberation and consideration, and at the end of that time they come to the honorable Senator in his own language. He considers it as gratuitous, and as having originated with plotters. There may be plotters there; I know not; I know it is the voice of the people of Tennessee, and they have spoken on this subject in language not to be misunderstood; yet the honorable Senator says to that portion of it he acknowledges no obligation of obedience.

But, then, in the colloquy that has taken place here, he gives us to understand that the last resolution, instructing him to vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, he will obey; but I wish to test whether he feels the moral force and power of instructions emanating from the people, through their State Legislature. I think I understand him. He tells the Senate and the country, after repudiating the doctrine of instruction, and refusing to acknowledge obedience to it, that if left to himself he would vote against it; but as the same Legislature instructed him on this point which instructed him on the other, he will obey. If an honorable gentleman were disposed—I will not insinuate it—to play a bold game for the Presidency, I think he would want to play a bolder game than that. "I am going to vote for Lecompton; but I give you to understand the reason why I do it. It is because my Legislature has instructed me; I am against it; I am with you North; but the Legislature is at the South."

We find a very similar course to this on the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and what is that? When the very gist of the bill, the point that is agitating the whole country, was in 1854 incorporated into the Nebraska bill, he stands his vote to retain it. "That will do in the South for my Whig friends in the Legislature who are for the amendment of Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky. I voted to put in that; and when the bill came to its passage I voted against it. Hence I can say to the South, I stood for the repeal of the Missouri compromise; I can say to the North, I resisted the passage of that act which has been so mischievous in its consequences to the country!" That looks a little like going North and a little like going South. I allude to it in no disparaging spirit—and only for the sake of illustrating my idea—but it is a good deal like the language we used to hear when I was a boy; and I suppose most of us heard it:

"He wires in and wires out,
Leaving the people all in doubt
Whether the snake that made the track,
Is going North or coming back."

We can understand that. To one set of resolutions passed by the Legislature, he acknowledges no obedience; repudiates and denies the right, the great doctrine of instruction; and in the next place says, "I will vote to let Lecompton in; yet I will tell the North I am against it"—in the one instance disregarding instructions, in the next instance acknowledging and obeying them. The reason why this great doctrine of instruction is to be disregarded is, that his own language has been couched in the resolutions and presented to him. Here I must disclaim, on the part of the members of the Legislature who passed the resolutions, any intention to insult the honorable Senator, or wound his feelings by using his own declaration, which is strong language, that if his course here should fail to meet the approbation of the people of Tennessee, he would not be seen here one day longer. I do not refer to this in the spirit of boasting or demagogism. I know that with some it is considered to be the great error of my life that I stand forth the advocate of popular sovereignty, and of the lodgment of power being with the people. If I err in this, I shall err where I have always been, and wish always to be. I have become too old, I have gone too far in the advocacy of this great doctrine of free government, and man being the source of power and capable of governing himself, now to retrace my steps. Whenever that great principle is attacked, if it comes within my sphere, or involves my duty in the slightest degree, humble and poor as my ability may be, the people shall have the benefit of this great principle to the extent of my power.

We see, in this instance, and there may be others, honorable Senators and members of Legislatures setting themselves up, and bidding defiance to popular sentiment. Would to God the voice of the people could be heard and felt more than it is throughout the land. If it could, we should be relieved from a great deal of improper, improvident, and extravagant legislation; and a large portion of it is fixed upon them in violation of their will. I know there are many who are brought up, raised in a sphere far removed from the mass of the people—men who have no confidence in the great mass. I think I know their prejudices; I think I know their points of honor; I think I know the leading principles that control the great mass of the people; and they are far higher, far more honorable, than those that actuate the leaders and rulers. I do not say it out of disparagement or disrespect; I speak of it as a fact. It is the interest of the mass of the people to do right in all governmental affairs; and they are more to be relied upon than those whose interest it is to violate great principles. This being so, they can be trusted and relied upon. Hence, as far as I am concerned, I always feel anxious to see popular sentiments, when fairly and fully expressed, obeyed and complied with.

But my honorable colleague, some how or other—I was going to say in covering a retreat on this subject, and apologizing or excusing his position—lugs in the idea of slavery, and makes the remark (I will not infer that he intends anything by it) that he has a great and deep interest in slaves, and intimates that he may be relied upon more than one who has not quite such a deep interest in slaves. I can only speak for myself, Mr. President. I will not say that his insinuation or his allusion was to me. I have not got many slaves; I have got a few; but I made them by the industry of these hands. Can the Senator say as much? What I own cost me more labor and toil than some who own thousands, and got them because they were the sons of moneyed people. Upon the question of slavery, I should like to compare notes to discover who is the soundest in principle and in votes on this great question? Who is it that has cooperated with the North in the inroads and advances they have made on this institution which is so vital to the South? Who is it that has been constantly throwing out, as it were, tubs to the whale, lures to the North? holding on to the South with one hand and throwing out inducements to the North with the other? Have I ever done that? Have I ever given any vote or made any speech in the Congress of the United States that indicates any such thing?

Pardon me if I am inclined to be egotistical. Though I may not own quite so many slaves as some others, though I may not have quite so deep an interest in the subject as some others when you measure interest by dollars and cents, yet I claim to understand the philosophy and the basis of the institution of slavery as well as, and I do not know that it would be very vain in me to say better than some who own their hundreds. My position is more defensible, if it required defense. I think it is the most unfortunate thing that ever befel Senators here that they become candidates for the Presidency. Whenever a Senator fixes his eyes upon the presidential mansion as the acme of his ambition, nineteen times out of twenty he falls by the way side. It has been so with the most distinguished men that have ever gone before us, who have participated in the most trying scenes and struggles of the country—bidding for northern and southern votes. I avow my sentiments here; I have avowed them in the other end of the Capitol; I have avowed them at home in reference to the great question of slavery; and I will say, as my honorable colleague has lugged it in, or thrown it in, that I think I understand the basis on which the institution of slavery rests. We may make our speeches to please the North, or please the South, as may suit us best, and subserve our interests most; but just so long as men are organized as they are, physically and mentally, one having more brains and more intellectual power than another, there will be different classes in society. Take the physical man alone, without reference to the intellectual, and force him in contact with the principles of production, and you will see that, under certain circumstances, one is enabled to produce more than another. This results from our organic structure.

Let me illustrate my meaning by an example: Here are two men, one of whom has double the physical strength of the other. Let us talk about things plainly and homely. I know this may be considered in bad taste by some; but sometimes the simplest similes best explain a subject. Take these two men, the one having twice the physical strength of the other, and put them to making rails. I know that is not a senatorial term, but it is a common thing in this country. The man of double physical strength will make twice as many rails in the course of a day as the other. Is not that a difference between men? The man of double the physical strength will increase in wealth, in anything to which you apply his labor, twice as rapidly as the other man. So it is with the exercise of his brain. This grows out of the organic structure of mankind. When you form a community out of individuals, they commence the work of production, intellectual and physical; and, as society moves on through time, we find some occupying the lower places and some occupying the higher places. I do not care whether you call it slavery or servitude; the man who has menial offices to perform is the slave or the servant, I care not whether he is white or black. Servitude or slavery grows out of the organic structure of man. All the talk which we hear in deprecation of the existence of slavery is idle, and a great portion of it mere twaddle. Slavery exists; it is an ingredient of society, growing out of man's mental and physical organization; and the only question for us to discuss is, what kind of slavery we shall have; not the existence of slavery, for it is in society; it is an element, an ingredient that you cannot get rid of so long as man's organic structure is what it is. Will you have white or black slavery? Shall it be voluntary or involuntary? These are the only questions. As to the great thing itself, about which there seems to be so much difficulty, it exists beyond the reach and the control of man, unless he can reconstruct society, and, after he has done that, reorganize the material of which society is composed.

I know where I stand on this question. I know what I could have done if I had been disposed to pander and appeal to the fanaticism that exists on this question, even in my own State. Shall it be given out here to the country that, because I do not own quite so many slaves, because my interest in the institution is not quite so deep as that of some others, my position is not as sound on the question as that of any other member of the Senate? Where has my honorable colleague been on the question of slavery? He assaults the Democratic party and charges it with being the cause of the agitation that has occurred on this subject. Who has been looking in that direction; the Democratic party or my honorable colleague? Go back to his course in reference to abolition petitions, and where does he stand? Looking North. Who that lives at the South has ever gone further North than my honorable colleague on this subject? I should like to know the man who has ever bid higher? I want the North to know what a good candidate they would have had if they had been disposed to select my honorable colleague. On all questions connected with slavery, beginning with the abolition petitions, his leaning has been to the North; and in 1850, when the compromise measures were before the country, I ask my friend from Alabama to read a few paragraphs of what he then said.

Mr. CLAY read the following extracts from a speech made by Mr. BELL on the 14th of September, 1850:

"With regard to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, I would say that the only doubt I have of the existence of the power either to suppress the slave trade or to abolish slavery in this District, is inspired by the respect I have for the opinions of so many distinguished and eminent men, both in and out of Congress, who hold that Congress has no such power. Reading the Constitution for myself, I believe that Congress has all the power over the subject in this District which the States have within their respective jurisdictions."

"But, however great my respect may be for the opinions of others on the question of power, there are some considerations of such high account as, in my judgment, to make it desirable that, unless by common consent the project of abolition shall be wholly given up and disbanded, the remnant of slavery existing in the District should be abolished at once; at the present moment, however, the excited state of public sentiment in the South, growing out of territorial questions, seems to forbid such a course. For myself, if the sentiment of the adjacent States and of the South generally were less inflamed, I would prefer that course to keeping it an open question. Slavery in the District of Columbia is now the only remaining ground of contention, the only remaining point of objection and assault, on the part of the anti-slavery North. I do not include the fanatics. They will be satisfied with nothing short of the extinction of slavery in the States; but all others at the North disclaim any intention, or design, or any constitutional power, to interfere with slavery anywhere but in the District of Columbia. I would be glad to see all cause of disturbance and contention in the District wholly removed; but let me say that this can never be done by the abolition of slavery, unless it be accompanied by some adequate provision for the removal or the effective control of the slaves after they shall have been emancipated. With this qualification, and in order to test the determination of the North in regard to any further and continued aggression upon southern feelings and the security of southern property, I would be content to see slavery in the District abolished to-day. In one aspect of the subject, I am not sure that it would not be a great conservative measure, both as regards the Union and the interests of the South: this District once relieved of all sources of dissension, we should be speedily enlightened upon the question whether the North would stop there, or raise new and more dangerous issues?"

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Connecting that speech, which was made on the bill before the Senate to abolish the slave trade in this District, with his uniform course on the reception of petitions on the subject of slavery, we find that my colleague makes greater concessions than I know of any other southern man ever having made. After throwing in a good many conditions and provisos, and ifs and ands, he concludes that he would be willing to see the institution of slavery abolished in the District of Columbia to-day. First, he would concede the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and second, he was willing to see that power exercised, and then he could test how far the North would go in reference to southern institutions. You concede the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia for the sake of making a test how far the North will go; you will concede the constitutional power for the sake of seeing how far they will go! If he concedes it here, would it not be reasonable to infer that he would favor the abolition of slavery in the Territories? Most clearly.

Who then has been compromising with the North? Who has been holding out inducements to the North to encroach upon the South? Is it the Democratic party? Have they been doing it? Have not southern men been catering for northern strength until the whole northern wing of their own party has been abolitionized? I have no unkind things to say towards the Abolitionists. I am speaking of them as a party. Who has held out inducements? Who has invited them to encroach? My honorable colleague. Then he talks about the deep interest, the great interest that men feel in slaves. Who has been throwing his banner to the North to get northern votes and northern strength, and then talks about the Democratic party producing all this agitation? The bill to abolish the slave trade in this District was one of the compromise measures of 1850. I voted for most of those compromise measures; but I want it understood now, as it was then, that I did not vote for them because they were compromise measures. Those for which I voted (for I voted for each measure by itself) I voted for because they were right in themselves; those I voted against I voted against because I believed they were wrong in themselves. Compromise! Ah, yes; compromise with the North, and abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and exercise the constitutional power in the Territories, and all for what? In the language of my honorable colleague—to see how far the North will go!

I was no compromise man then. I was for each of those measures which I sustained because I believed it to be right. I think it is time for the North and the South to abandon the idea of compromise. You have a Constitution which guarantees certain rights to all the States composing this Confederacy. Stand by the Constitution. Make no compromise by which the North will concede its rights to the South, or the South concede its rights to the North, but maintain the Constitution as it is, and thereby secure to each and all the States of this Confederacy their constitutional rights. Was there ever a compromise made in which some one was not wronged, in which some one of the parties did not lose? There is a great principle of right somewhere; let us ascertain where the right is and let the North and the South maintain it, neither making concessions.

What has been the history of compromises in this Government? In 1820 we had a compromise. The nation was agitated; dissolution was threatened before the compromise was made; and after the compromise was made, it became a fixed, permanent subject of contention and agitation and discussion, until it was repealed. You get up a great agitation, and settle it by a compromise; and then you keep up an agitation as to what the compromise means, or what is the extent of its obligation. I think it is time to quit compromising. In 1850 several measures were passed as compromise measures. They produced a great agitation. A dissolution of the Union was threatened; and in 1851 some great pacificators came forward—men who were willing to be sacrificed upon the altar of their country on another compromise. That compromise has since been a continual and unceasing source of agitation. Is it not time for the North and the South to quit compromising? There is a great principle of right somewhere. Let us find out what is the right, and abide by it.

Whenever there is a difficulty between vice and virtue, vice can get up an agitation, an issue with virtue, and of course vice is always ready to compromise; but whenever virtue compromises with vice, vice obtains the ascendancy. Whenever there is a contest between truth and falsehood, and it is settled by a compromise, truth gives way and falsehood triumphs. Is it not time to stop compromising? I think we have compromised enough, and I will say here in my place to-day, that I believe the agitation which has taken place, first, in getting up compromises, and then upon the compromises after they are made, has done more to make the institution of slavery permanent than all the other action of the Federal Government. The constant outside pressure, the agitation of the question in the free States, has done more to give the institution of slavery strength and solidity in the southern States than anything else that has taken place in the country. Among southern men the philosophy, the nature, the character of the institution of slavery are better understood than formerly. The southern mind, to-day, is more reconciled to the institution of slavery, and better satisfied with it, than it ever has been since the institution has existed. This is the fact, and it is not worth while to disguise it.

Then let us agree, North and South, to abide by the Constitution of the country, and have no more compromises. We have been compromised and conserved until there is hardly any Constitution left. We first compromise and settle a question wrong, and then we must all turn conservatives and stand by the wrong that has been accomplished by the compromise. Compromise! I almost wish the term was stricken out of the English language. Conservatism! It is the argument of despots and tyrants, one that entails an existing institution in its present form, whether it be right or wrong. We must compromise, and inflict great wrong on the country; and then all are to turn conservatives, and stand by the wrong that has been inflicted on the country. So we see where this compromising spirit has carried us. We see the lure that has been thrown out by my honorable colleague and others, to induce northern men to encroach on the South. Notwithstanding his allusions to his deep interest in slavery, and all that, we see where he stands.

The Legislature of Tennessee have manifested no disrespect in these resolutions. They have exercised the privilege and power that has been exercised by most of the States of this Confederacy.

But, my honorable colleague would seem, in his concluding remarks, to have a desire to draw me off from his pursuit by throwing out a compliment, with the remark that I had made one of the most powerful arguments against the Lecompton constitution he had heard. I am at fault here again. It is my misfortune, I presume, not his fault. I did not understand myself that way, and how he can make such an application of my argument is a matter of profound astonishment to me. What was it, I said, that could convey, in the slightest degree, the idea that I was against the Lecompton constitution; or what position did I take that would demonstrate that I was against the Lecompton constitution? It would require a man with magnifying glasses, it would take a microscope that would multiply millions of times, to discover anything in the remarks I have made to-day which would seem to indicate opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. No, sir; and in continuation of what I was saying on that point—I will occupy the Senate but a few moments longer, for I have spoken three times as long as I intended—I shall vote to let Lecompton in; not because my Legislature has instructed me to do so, but because I believe it is right, and the most effectual means to settle and put down the agitation that is now pervading the whole country.

What is it that I have said which would come in conflict with my going for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State? Because I argued that power was with the people? Does that make an issue with the admission of Kansas? Not in the slightest degree. The only question for Congress to determine when Kansas applies for admission is, is it a State? Whether it has got to be a State by a regular process or by irregular process, so the end is reached that it is a State and has a republican form of government, it is entirely competent for Congress to admit her without reference to her irregularities or informalities. Many States have been admitted into the Union in this way, and the chances are that others will be.

What is there that I have said as to sovereignty abiding with man that comes in conflict with the admission of Kansas now? Go to the organic law and you find that the power is conferred on the people of Kansas to legislate. Was the passing of a law under the territorial government in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which provided for the calling of a convention? Go back to the bill reported to the Senate during the last Congress, omitting the provision that the constitution should be submitted to the people. Who reported that bill? The honorable Senator from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Territories. He reported a bill to the Senate authorizing the adoption of a constitution without being submitted to the people. That bill when it first went to the committee had in it a clause providing that the constitution should be submitted, and it was reported back without that clause. Was it not intended by this enabling act, or whatever name you may properly call it, that the people may meet in convention, and when in convention may form a constitution, and may or may not, as circumstances may require, submit it to a popular vote at the polls, or adopt it as a constitution, without submission? That is what the committee must have intended. We find the Minnesota enabling act requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people. That bill came from the same committee. The committee must have understood the subject. They reported one bill requiring it to go to the people; the other bill came back from the committee with that clause out of it. The bill was lost in the other House, and then Kansas proceeded, through her Legislature, to pass a law authorizing the convention to be called, and the people elected delegates. I know the question is to come up here, and when it does, I will show gentlemen who make these insinuations, whether there is any conflict with my position.

Whence does the convention derive its power? Some say from the Legislature, and some trace it to one source, and some to another. I say the Legislature took the regular steps, in an orderly, peaceable manner, for the election of delegates to the convention. The people elected delegates. The delegates being elected, met in convention, deriving their power from the people that elected them, and not from the Territorial Legislature. The convention was the representative of the sovereignty of the people; it was, in fact, the people assembled in their highest political attitude, acting in convention to prescribe the nature and character of their institutions. That convention being the people assembled in their highest political attitude, had the power to submit a constitution back to the people for ratification, or the power to adopt it at once, or to submit part of it. This was discretionary with them. If I had been a member of that convention, I am free to say I should have been in favor of the submission of the whole constitution to the popular vote; but the people were present in convention, and they determined this point for themselves. In that constitution they have made an express reservation of the right to alter or amend. In my judgment, without that reservation, they would have, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, the power to alter, amend, or abolish, their form of government at any time, in such manner as they may prescribe. But to make the point clear, the constitution of Kansas, in the bill of rights, expressly reserves to the people the right of alteration.

Then I should like to know how anything I have said conflicts in the slightest degree with the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State? I contend that the only question for Congress to determine is, whether a State has been formed, and whether it has a republican form of government. That being settled, Congress is either to admit it or keep it out. If Congress can assume as cause for sending the constitution back to the people, that the proceedings have been irregular and informal, Congress may assume as a cause that this provision, or that provision, or the other provision, is not right, and send it back to the people; and the result is, that Congress makes the constitution; Congress, not the people, exercises the power. When the State is admitted, the subject of her local policy belongs to her people. There may perhaps now be a majority of the actual persons in Kansas against some of the provisions of the constitution; but, if so, they have power, at any time they may think proper, to change that constitution, and change the institutions established by it. Here I desire to inquire what will be gained by keeping Kansas out of the Union? Do you thereby expedite the proceedings of the people there in reforming or altering the constitution? Can they not proceed as readily and as speedily after they are admitted into the Union to change the constitution if it is wrong, as they can proceed before its admission? The idea of Congress forcing a constitution on the people of a State is an absurdity. Congress does not force it on them at all; Congress does not make it; Congress takes the constitution as an evidence that a State has been formed, and says to her, "Walk in with your constitution, and afterwards change it in your own way, and at such time as you may select and prescribe."

What can be the objection to the admission of Kansas? This question is more clear as to a State than as to a Territory. No one has right to interfere with the people of a State in regard to their institutions; but now the idea is suggested that when the people of a Territory have taken the necessary steps towards becoming a State, the constitution they may make is to be regarded as a petition, and that they do not become a State until Congress gives its assent. What does this imply? If it is not a State until Congress gives its assent, is not this an admission that sovereignty is here? If it cannot be a State until assent is given by Congress, Congress has the sovereignty, and must impart it to the State. I say it does not reside here; I say Congress cannot make a State; Congress cannot impart sovereignty, for it does not possess it. A State must emanate from the people; and whether they act regularly or irregularly, all that is necessary for us to do is to ascertain that a State has been formed, and has a republican constitution, and then to admit it into the Union, or keep it out.

I am as unfortunate in understanding gentlemen's notions in this respect as I was in not understanding precisely the definition which my honorable colleague gave of his position; but I think I understand myself. There is a principle in this matter; and if you will pursue principle, you will arrive at a proper conclusion.

Mr. President, I have said all that I intended to say upon the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, and a great deal more on other matters. I did not intend to take the range which I have taken; but I have been led off into saying thus much without great order or method. I think I understand the principle which lies at the bottom of this controversy. I wish to act on that great principle. I desire to admit Kansas and allay agitation and strife. I want the North and the South alike to stand upon the Constitution. Let us make no compromises; but let us stand by the Constitution as it is. Though we may differ in reference to a local institution here and another there, let us act as lovers of the Constitution, in the North and in the South, neither conceding its rights, but both standing by the great principles of free government. Let us admit States into the Union, recognizing the great source of power by which States are made. Let us admit Kansas and Minnesota, whether they come hand in hand or separately, I care not. I stand ready to receive them both. I shall vote for the admission of Minnesota because I believe it is right in principle, because I believe it is for the interest of the Confederacy. I shall vote for the admission of Kansas because I believe it is right to do so. As other States may be formed in the progress of this Government, I shall vote for their admission when I am satisfied that States have been formed, and that their constitutions are republican. I hope that I have succeeded in making myself understood by my competitor.

Mr. BELL. No competitor in any respect or in any way.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. My colleague says he is not my competitor in any respect. When we are in the habit of particular kinds of discussion we are accustomed to use certain remarks; and by a slip of the tongue we sometimes use them inadvertently. Having had a good many competitors to contend with, the term has become familiar to me in speaking in opposition to another; and when one gets in the habit of using such terms, they are repeated sometimes unconsciously.

Mr. BELL. I excuse it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. My colleague says he is not my competitor in any respect.

Mr. BELL. I do not mean it in any offensive sense.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. When the Democratic State convention met in our State the gauntlet was thrown out, and we could have had a fuller demonstration, if one was needed or could be had, of the opinion of the people of Tennessee on these questions. My honorable colleague, with all his power, with all his information, and all his tact as a debater in Congress and out of it, was invited to participate in that struggle; and if public opinion was wrong, the opportunity was tendered to him to go before the people and make public opinion right. Here, as it occurs to me, I will remark that when the convention nominating the opposition candidate for Governor sat, it was given out that he had made a speech in that convention, in which he declared that he was going forth, trident in hand; that he was going to put down everything that came in contact with him—yes, that the Hon. JOHN BELL was to be in the field, and the smaller aspirants had better get out of the way.

He was to be in the field with his armor on; and it was given out in a boasting and taunting manner that it made no odds whom he met, whether it was Richard or Saladin, whether it was Saxon or Saracen; if he came in contact with the Hon. JOHN BELL, his casque was sure to be crushed. These things were all given out; public opinion was to be set right. The gauntlet was taken up; contests were solicited and sought, and, in fact, the Democracy tried to provoke their opponent so as to get him into a fight. How many Democrats did he meet before the people of Tennessee in that canvass to set public opinion right? We have not many Richards and Saladins, or Saxons, or Saracens there. We have some few who try, and I think most of them do understand most of the questions that are discussed generally, and can take care of themselves. Who was crushed? I know some that were anxious to meet the honorable Senator on the stump in regular set-tos, if necessary, though they would have been crushed in the first tilt, but they were never afforded that opportunity. I have had competitors again and again, and many of them not inferior in ability and reputation even to the honorable Senator's own conception of himself. I will not refer to the result of the issues that took place between those competitors and myself. I leave that for the history of the country to tell. I have had competitors who were foemen worthy of my steel, and they have met their fate like honorable men, and recognized me as such. A gentleman and well-bred man will respect me, and all others I will make do it:

"Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,

Is he beyond the reach of popular sentiment? In rather a taunting and sneering manner he says he is not my competitor in any sense. If you have never been my competitor, you equals have; and in the conclusion of their contest they adjusted their robes and prepared themselves for their fate; and, I repeat again, fell like honorable men. I stand here to-day not as the competitor of any Senator; but I stand here, in a senatorial sense, the compeer of any Senator. I know my rights, and I intend to try to learn the proprieties of the Senate; and in compliance with those proprieties, my rights, and the rights of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, shall be maintained (to use terms very familiar with us) at all hazards and to the last extremity. So much for "competitors."

In the first place, we have gone over these instructions; in the next place, we have gone over the proper lodgment of sovereign power; and in the third place, we have gone over the idea thrown out about "competitors." I must say, in conclusion of these desultory remarks, that I have been forced before the Senate more and oftener than I intended to have been, under any reasonable circumstances, for the first twelve months or two years of my service here. My intention was to come here and pass through that probation which older and more experienced men and Senators more talented than myself should assign and prescribe for me. I have, however, been forced thus often before the Senate. It has been contrary to my inclination; but I believe that duty to myself, duty to my State, duty to principle, required me to do so; and acting under this impression I have ventured to trespass on the patience and time of the Senate. I have come here to vote and act, and shall try to do so. I thank the Senate for the attention they have paid me.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President—

Mr. PEARCE. Will the Senator allow me to move an adjournment?

Mr. BELL. I cannot yield the floor now. It must be obvious to the whole Senate that I could not have expected this course of remark from my honorable colleague from Tennessee. I am taken wholly by surprise, but I ask for no time. I feel fully prepared and competent now to answer all that he has said, so far as I can remember it; and if he has said anything which I do not now remember I am willing that any gentleman shall suggest it to me.

I must be permitted to say, that the course of my colleague has been wholly inconsistent with the sentiments and feelings he has professed towards me since I have met him in the Senate. I confess, sir, that I have formed a very different opinion of him. He said to me, in express terms: "If I could have understood you, and you could have understood me, there never was any occasion for any unfriendly feelings between us." He will not deny that. I dare him to deny it. I further said, that whatever differences there might be between him and me—and I said it in mild and courteous terms—though they might be radical differences, yet, as colleagues, as Senators from the same State, we should not exhibit those scenes which have sometimes been exhibited between colleagues from the same States. I have the utmost abhorrence for this species of collisions between Senators representing the same sovereignty, the same State. I have always regarded it as a principle that I would endeavor to conciliate, and act with Senators opposed to me in this body in a courteous and friendly spirit. I have always thought that we should never exhibit our States in an unfriendly attitude, although we maintain firmly our own opposite sentiments. I had trusted never to witness this sort of collision and contention, which, I beg my colleague's pardon for saying, I think degrading alike to both. I thought, from my conversations with my colleague since he has been here, that he concurred with me, that if there was anything on earth that ought to be avoided, it was the collisions and contentions that have taken place, sometimes perhaps necessarily, between Senators from the same State. I have the utmost abhorrence for violent—I will not say vulgar—collisions and passages between Senators from the same State, on the floor of the Senate of the United States; but I must express to you now, sir, and to the Senate, my deep mortification to see that I have been misled.

I believe there were no two men between whom there could be a more determined opposition of opinions and sentiments in regard to the principles by which this Government is regulated and controlled, than Mr. Turney, my late colleague in the Senate, and myself. He was a self-educated man, a man of naturally great powers of intellect. He had no academical education, no education at all except that which he derived from his intercourse with society, his observation of men, and his own reading. When he came into the Senate, there are some here now who will bear witness that, although he was one of the most decided men in opposition to my course and views on this sectional question that I have ever met with, although he united with the extreme ultraists of the South in their protest against the compromise measures of 1850, yet there was never one word from him to disturb the courteous relations which ought to exist between Senators from the same State in this body, in my opinion. Other gentlemen may have different views on this point, but I cannot alter mine.

I must further say that it is apparent, from the course and tenor of my colleague's argument and the time which he occupied, fully three hours, in answer to what I supposed was a very temperate, moderate, inoffensive exposition of my course and a review of the action of the Legislature in relation to me, that he was carrying out a preconceived purpose. I studied what I should say in presenting the resolutions; although I could not speak in the language my own mind would have dictated, because I was anxious to do nothing inappropriate to the subject or inconsistent with the feelings and principles I have felt, and was particularly desirous of not going beyond such declarations of opinion as I thought my colleague would not feel himself bound to reply to. But, sir, notwithstanding my conservative feelings, and, as I thought, courteous tone, (and I beg to say again, with a disposition not to conflict in any way or trespass on the feelings of my colleague in the slightest degree,) in expressing my sentiments in relation to the preamble and resolutions which have been presented to-day, he has most unexpectedly made one of the bitterest, one of the most insulting, and most personal replies in every respect, that malice, premeditated malice, and determination could invent. My colleague has replied to me to-day with books all marked down, with their ear-marks accompanying them.

As he continued in a three hours' speech, occasionally throwing in the most insulting personal allusions, the assignment of motives, that any man could possibly conceive; no one who heard his enunciations on this floor in regard to me could doubt the feeling which prompted them. Wholly unexpected are they to me. I regret it, deeply, sincerely, not only with reference to my own self-respect and the respect which is due to this body, but on every other ground I regret it deeply. Some of the gentlemen around me have said: "Defer this until to-morrow; think of it, and see what you will do." Sir, I am ready now to go on. I ask no time to consider the replies which are due to such assaults as have been made on me by my colleague or any other member of the Senate who chooses to support him and back him. Now or at any other time, I am ready to meet him. It requires no reflection.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator will allow me—

Mr. BELL. No sir; if you please, allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. Briggs.] The Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BELL. I am ready now, and I will proceed, if it is the wish of the Senate that I shall.

Mr. SEWARD arose.

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I will have no intervention in regard to the course of my colleague on this subject.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to move an adjournment.

Mr. BELL. I am bound to vindicate my honor.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will, on a moment's reflection, yield to the general desire of the Senate to adjourn, and stop this discussion for to-day right here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield the floor?

Mr. PUGH. With the permission of my friend from Tennessee, as he can speak to more advantage to-morrow, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BELL. I will yield, on condition that I have the floor for to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Of course.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for half a minute, with the same understanding, to permit me to make a motion which I think will meet the unanimous consent of the Senate?

Mr. PUGH. With the understanding that the Senator from Tennessee shall have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN. That is the understanding. I wish merely, before we go into executive session, to make a motion, by unanimous consent, to take up the bill for the admission of Kansas, and make it the special order for Thursday next, at one o'clock. It is important to get that question out of the way. We talk on the question, whether it is before us or not; and it is best, therefore, to discuss the subject explicitly and directly. I make that motion.

Mr. GWIN. Does that precede the other special orders on the Calendar?

Mr. STUART and Mr. GREEN. It leaves them under the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot now be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. GREEN. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question before the Senate is on printing the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, from the State of Tennessee, and upon that the Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope not. At this hour of the day it is hardly proper to go into executive session for the purpose of doing business. ["Adjourn!"] I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 23, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.
The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communications; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

A communication from the War Department, transmitting the official Army Register for the year ending the 30th of June, 1857; and

A communication from the same Department, transmitting a statement of the expenditures during the year 1857, from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the military establishment.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to introduce a bill to pay for the printing, binding, paper, lithographing, and engraving, which is due to the various persons who have furnished materials or done the work under contracts which have been made with their various departments. The House will remember that a bill for this purpose was introduced some three weeks ago, and that it was defeated by the House. I have in my hand the memorials of the various parties to whom this money is due, asking that Congress will pay the amount now owing to them by the Government. I ask that the bill may be read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the bill is reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, or is it introduced by the gentleman himself?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection being made, the bill appropriating money to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for paper, printing, binding, and engraving ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which has been executed, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask, in this connection, to offer a resolution, not from the Committee of Ways and Means, but from myself, individually.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the following resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOARD] on Friday last:

Whereas, a statement has been made by a member of this House, importing that the Hon. Mr. BRUNS, of Ohio, had stated to him, in a conversation on the subject of his vote on the resolution of Hon. Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, to commit to a select committee the President's message on the Kansas investigation, that he was to have certain official patronage, or appointments to office, at his disposal; and whereas, the Hon. Mr. BRUNS had previously been free in his avowal of sentiments, with which his vote on that subject was in conflict, thus furnishing ground to suspect that some improper influence had been exerted to bias the said member's official action as a member of this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made, directly or indirectly, by any persons connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any other person, with their advice or consent, to influence the action of any member of this House upon any question or measure upon which the House has acted, or which it has under consideration, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

And the pending question is, "Shall the resolution be received and entertained on the ground that it is a question of privilege?"

Mr. PHELPS. The pending question is one which may involve a question of privilege, or not, according to the decision of the House on the resolution. Now the House is not full to-day, and if we proceed to the consideration of this question we cannot have a proper expression of the sense of the House upon it; and if we proceed to the call of committees for reports, the committees will not exhaust themselves in making reports, by reason of the absence of a large number of the members of the House; and, therefore, I submit to the House whether it would not be better to allow the question to go over until to-morrow? Being of that opinion, I submit a motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of proceeding with the discussion on the Indian appropriation bill.

I understand, in connection with that matter, there was a resolution submitted by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] whom I do not now see in his place, to terminate debate on this bill, and that he called the previous question upon it; but I have the impression that the House did not order it. I have no power to withdraw that demand at this time, and I do not purpose to press that resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will move to close debate to-morrow.

Mr. McKIBBIN. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. PHELPS. I would yield to my friend, but the regular order of business has been called for, and I presume it will be insisted on if I yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine called for the regular order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the motion to go into Committee of the Whole be withdrawn, I will move to postpone the pending business a day or two.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that such a motion would be in order.

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw my motion, then.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now move that the pending question, arising on the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD,] be postponed until the day after to-morrow. By that time, I presume, absent members will have returned.

The motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business is a motion to lay upon the table the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to terminate debate on the Indian appropriation bill at two o'clock to-morrow; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. I submit to the gentleman who made the motion to lay the resolution on the table, that he withdraw it, and move to amend the resolution, so as to close debate on Thursday at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The motion was made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman from Maine is not present. If that motion is voted down, then an amendment can be offered.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By general consent the yeas and nays can be withdrawn, and then we can vote down the motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no objection to allowing the call for the yeas and nays to be withdrawn, if it is the understanding of the gentleman who made the proposition that he will move to extend the time for debate upon the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman who submitted the resolution is not in the House, and I have no control over it; but I hope the House will vote down the motion to lay the resolution on the table; that they will not sustain the call for the previous question; and that then they will amend the resolution, so as to close debate at two o'clock on Thursday. I trust that will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no objection to make, if that is done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it is entirely competent for him to renew the motion to lay upon the table, if his views are not carried out, and upon that motion he could demand the yeas and nays.

No objection being made, the demand for the yeas and nays was withdrawn.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was then disagreed to.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. I now move to amend the resolution, by striking out "Tuesday at two o'clock," and inserting "Thursday at two o'clock;" and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman to modify it still further, for I think it probable that a privileged question will intervene between this time and the time indicated for the close of debate, which will occupy a day, or a part of a day. I refer to a case of a contested election. I should therefore prefer that the gentleman would modify his amendment, so as to give at least another day for debate on this bill; and if Friday is to be occupied with private business, I should prefer having still another day.

Mr. PHELPS. The objection to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, is that Friday next is private bill day, and objection day, and I think that the House ought to proceed to the consideration of private business. To continue this debate until next week would be encroaching too far on the time of the House; and it is not necessary to do so, for the purpose of debate, because this bill will be followed by other appropriation bills, on which debate can be continued. Besides, as has been remarked by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, this bill contains nothing but the appropriations necessary to carry out existing treaties, and necessary for the administration of the Indian department.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. My object is to have the bill submitted to a little more scrutiny than such bills have been accustomed to receive in this House. For this purpose alone I desire to have time for investigation. I have given notice to the gentleman, [Mr. PHELPS,] that the House and himself might be apprized of business which will probably intervene within the time to be allowed for this debate. The fact that Friday next is private bill day is not a reason why we should not have proper time for the examination of this bill. I hope the House will give such proper time. I am not going to enter into the discussion of this question, but I think the House is aware of the importance of this bill.

Mr. PHELPS. If it be any accommodation to the House to fix Friday, I am willing to say Friday at two o'clock. I offer that as an amendment to the resolution, and call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, as amended, was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I now submit the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to; there being, on a division, yeas 88, noes 42.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, on which Mr. BURROUGHS was entitled to the floor.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. BURROUGHS. It is with a good deal of diffidence and embarrassment, Mr. Chairman, that I rise now to address the committee, because I have seen a number of gentlemen on my side of the House attempting in vain, within the last twenty-five or thirty days, to obtain the floor—gentlemen who would have discussed the question, which I propose to consider, with much more ability than I can hope to bring to the subject.

Sir, I have felt myself exceedingly mortified, from time to time, in this House, at the remarks that have been made on the left side of the Hall, to the effect that the Republican party was a sectional party. We have not unfrequently been charged with the grossest selfishness. We have not unfrequently been charged with having attempted to carry measures that were calculated to break the lastties which bind together the States of this Union.

Sir, from my earliest days I have learned to love this Union. I have learned that it was my first duty as an American and as a citizen, if need be, to lay down my life for the Union which was purchased at the cost of so much blood and treasure, and I had hoped that the ties which bound us together, and which taught us the great doctrine of brotherly love and fraternity, would not so soon have been forgotten by Americans. Now, it is part of my purpose this morning to introduce some few reasons here to satisfy those gentlemen that they ought to take back these unjust charges. Well, sir, what are they? In the first place, sir, the great doctrine which lies at the foundation of our Republic, I understand to be this, that we are all of us as Americans, in all our acts and in everything that we do, to consult the greatest good of the greatest possible number. That is Democratic doctrine. Yes, sir, it is Democratic doctrine as our fathers taught it. It is the doctrine for which our fathers fought, and it is the doctrine by which I hope the Republic of America will ever stand.

Now, sir, let us look into this subject. We have at the North a population of something over thirteen million, most of them white men; you have at the South, gentlemen, but a little over six million white men. I do not take slaves into account, because they have been denominated property. You have, in the fifteen slave States, eight hundred and thirty-eight thousand square miles of land; we have, in fifteen States, four hundred and forty-seven thousand nine hundred and ninety square miles of land. We have got more than double your population, but we have got only less than half the amount of land that you have. I tell gentlemen that this is not a sectional question. It is simply a question whether we shall have homes for our children; and I propose to address myself to that view of it. You have in the South, or had in 1850, a population of six million four hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and five; we have in the North, or had in 1850, a population of thirteen million three hundred and forty-two thousand and eighty-nine. I say nothing about the slaves. You, gentlemen, have your negroes, who till and cultivate your soil; but we have our cattle on a thousand hills, and an industrious yeomanry who cultivate our soil. I propose now to ask who paid for the land we have, and how we came by it, and what would be a fair, honest, and equitable division of it? Why, sir, I recollect that that little strip of land upon your southern coast, Florida, was bought at an expense of something over three million dollars, if not over five million. You recollect, also, sir, that we purchased Louisiana at a cost of $15,000,000, besides what we have paid for the extinction of Indian titles. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] who spoke the other day, and who is one of those who made this charge of sectionalism and injustice, lives in a State upon which we have expended untold millions—yes, sir, and northern blood, too—in her Indian wars. I hope the gentleman will be magnanimous enough, when he looks into the facts, to take back the charge of sectionalism and bad faith. We profess to be friends of the Union, and friends of every human being in the Union, black as well as white; and we do not like to be charged with bad faith and illiberality.

But again, we got into a war about Texas. Do gentlemen know how we got into that difficulty? We admitted Texas into the Union, and took upon ourselves the war with Mexico, and in carrying on that war we expended nearly two hundred million dollars, to say nothing of the precious blood which men of the North and men of the South shed upon the battle-fields of Mexico. All the wars in which this country has been engaged for the last twenty-five years have been mainly with the Indians on our southern border, though, to be sure, the Black Hawk war was not a southern war. If gentlemen will take the pains to examine into the subject, they will find that since the purchase of Florida we have expended on the purchase of lands from foreign Governments, from Indians by treaty, and in various other modes of expense, over eight hundred million dollars—a sum which would purchase some of the States of this Union, with all the property within them, real and personal. Now, sir, I propose, in a spirit of all kindness, to ask gentlemen who make this charge of sectionalism against us, to tell us where this money—this eight hundred millions—came from? Where did the money come from? I have facts and figures here to satisfy any gentleman where it came from. Look to the importing and tax-paying States of this Confederacy. In the State of New York we have a population of over three million, nearly half as much as the population of the whole southern States.

Now, sir, I have not time to-day to present the careful calculations by which I arrive at the fact that the northern fifteen States of this Confederacy have paid three fourths of the entire amount expended for the purchase of these lands. Six hundred million dollars have been paid in the form of indirect taxes for that purpose. I make this now simply as a general statement; and I tell gentlemen that if they doubt the correctness of the statement, I will, at a future time, present the facts and estimates in careful detail.

Well, sir, I now come here with the complaint that the northern States have not quite half the territory you of the southern States have; and I say further that our land is not as good as yours. I know it, for I have been upon your southern soil; I have been over most of the States of this Union, and gathered the means of forming a correct opinion, and believe that, with the exception of the mountain ranges of the South, you have much better land than we possess.

And now I see over the way a gentleman who made some remarks the other day, to which my attention is called by seeing him in his seat. I do not propose, however, to talk about Kansas, except as it is connected with the point to which I have just adverted. We do not claim Kansas solely upon the ground that we are entitled to it as a matter of equity, and upon the ground that we paid for it, but we want it also upon the ground that we do not like your kind of civilization. The gentleman [Mr. LAMAR] said the other day:

"If I could do so consistently with the honor of my country, I would plant American liberty, with southern institutions, upon every inch of American soil. I believe that they give to us the highest type of civilization known to modern times."

Well, sir, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] a few days afterwards addressed the committee, and not satisfied with resting the question upon its mere ground of civilization, went into the consideration of patriarchal usage. He said that the time had gone by for making apologies for slavery; that the time had come for defending it upon high grounds. I listened to his remarks with pleasure, and I have ever since felt to appreciate the ability, the skill, and the genius with which he managed the subject. I was pleased with his speech for its frank and manly tone; he went back to earlier times to find arguments and a foundation for the peculiar institution which exists in the South—he might have found examples, also, of another institution, which exists in Utah Territory. But we live in an age when we have in some portion of the country been led to cultivate a different degree of civilization. I do not propose, in running a parallel between northern and southern civilization, to offend the most sensitive feelings of any man. I introduce it simply for the purpose of illustration, and in order that gentlemen looking over the subject candidly may see whether our views deserve their consideration; whether we are right or wrong. Not intending to go over the whole field, I find myself with a mass of figures, which I shall not be able to present to-day. I shall bring only a few of them to the notice of the House. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] addressed the House about the patriarchal institution, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] in reference to those existing at the South, as presenting the highest form of civilization known to modern terms, I felt called upon, as a student of civilization, to look into the facts and ascertain the basis upon which they rest that high claim.

I took the census report of 1850, and I beg the attention of the gentleman while I introduce a few facts, and ask gentlemen themselves to draw the contrast.

I desire to call the attention of the House first to public schools. The district represented by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] has one hundred and eighty-eight public schools, one hundred and eighty-nine teachers, and five thousand five hundred pupils. In the counties which compose my district we have three hundred and six public schools, three hundred and seventy-five teachers, and nineteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight pupils. This, in my poor judgment, is some evidence of the comparative civilization of our respective districts.

Now let us turn our attention to the district of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] In that district there are one hundred and forty-four public schools, one hundred and forty-seven teachers, and two thousand nine hundred and sixty-six pupils. I have already told you how many of each my district contained—I refer, of course, to the public schools as classified in the census report.

I next turned my attention to another item—school libraries, not libraries in academies and colleges, but school libraries, accessible to all the people. In my district there are two hundred and eighty-five school libraries, containing thirty-six thousand three hundred and twenty volumes. In the district of the gentleman from Georgia there is one school library, only containing five hundred volumes. In the Mississippi district referred to, not one library of this class.

Again: I, in the next place, looked a little to the value of church property in the respective districts. The total value of church property in the district of the gentleman from Mississippi, is $118,285; in that of the gentleman from Georgia, $127,520; and in my own district, $276,850. In one county of Mississippi, constituting a part of the gentleman's district, I found but one single church, which church was worth one hundred dollars. This county, Tunica, has a population of three hundred and ninety-six whites, and nine hundred and seventeen slaves.

Running this parallel a little further, I propose to call the attention of gentlemen to some other facts.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman from New York state what district in Mississippi he refers to?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I do not know the number of the district. It is that represented by the learned and eloquent gentleman on my left, [Mr. LAMAR,] who addressed the committee a few days ago.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I will state, for the correction of the statistics, that in our section of the country we act individually; and I will venture to say, that if the gentleman and myself occupy seats on this floor at the next session of Congress, I can show him then that there are more books in the libraries of private individuals, in my district, than there are in those of private individuals in his district.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I cannot extend any more of my time to the gentleman, though no one respects him more than I do. I wish, sir, that the gentleman could point me to libraries for the use of the people.

I have already given the number of the white population of the fifteen southern States. The slave population is three million two hundred thousand. The number of public schools in the fifteen southern States I find to be nineteen thousand four hundred and eighty-eight. In my own State alone the number is ten thousand eight hundred and two. The number of persons—native white population—in the fifteen slave States who cannot read and write is five hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and forty-eight. The number of native population in the fifteen free States who cannot read and write is two hundred and seventy-eight thousand three hundred and seventy-five.

Now, passing these figures, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a moment to some other facts; and in passing, I wish to make a reference to the State of Texas. I hold in my hand a paper characterized certainly by very great simplicity of language, and no doubt entitled to receive the consideration of every member of the House. Here is a State which came into the Union in 1844.

Mr. REAGAN. In 1846.

Mr. BURROUGHS. In 1846. I had 1844 in my mind, because I recollect very well that I labored on the stump for "Polk and Texas" that year. I expected, when Texas came into this Union, that she would have had the kindness to bear with our section of the Union a little. Twelve years ago, when Texas was young, and needed our help, we bought her lands and fought her battles; but now she has grown to be a Hercules, and says that, unless we admit slavery into Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, she will not live with us any longer. That would be a nice job for her, to get us to expend $200,000,000 on her account, and then to back out—

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I would be glad to oblige the gentleman, but I cannot yield. I have no time to spare. Texas, I was going on to say, has passed resolutions; I will not say they are defiant, I will not say they are threatening, I will not say that Texas will not come down on us with an avalanche of some sort, if we do not admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Texas will do—I know not what. Certainly, she has adopted resolutions, and is going to be represented in the southern convention, (if held.) What that southern convention is to do, I do not know.

I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to have made a long speech to-day. I intended to present some few facts on which to base the justice of our cause. I intended to present these few facts, and to claim for them magnanimous consideration. We have got twice the amount of population that you have, and have got but half the quantity of land. This land was bought by the common treasure, North and South; and it should be fairly divided. I might rather say that the earth belongs to the people on it; and that no one section has a right to monopolize and keep it to the exclusion of every other class. You have in the single State of Texas territory equal to six times that of the State of New York. On that territory you can support no less than fifteen million human beings. You have got there territory large enough for four States, on which there are comparatively no white settlements; and yet you now stand in your place in the halls of your Legislature and say that you cannot live in the Union with the North unless we consent to let Kansas come in as a slave State.

I cannot make any comment on this. It does not tally with my notions of justice and propriety, and I believe that when you come back to the sober second thought you will agree with us in our opinion, and you will say that we are entitled to these lands.

Proceedings of the Democratic State Convention.

AUSTIN, TEXAS, January 8, 1853.

"On motion of Colonel L. T. Wigfall, the following platform was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Democratic party of the State of Texas heartily concur in, and unanimously reaffirm, the principles of the Democratic party of the Union and the Constitution, as embodied in the platform of the national Democratic convention, held in Cincinnati, in June, 1856, and the State convention of Texas, at Waco, on the 4th of May, 1857, as a true expression of their political faith and opinion, believing them to embrace the only doctrines which can preserve the integrity of the Union and the equal rights of the States.

"Resolved, That recent events in the United States Senate create in our minds a serious apprehension that the great doctrine of non-intervention, as set forth in that platform, is in danger of being repudiated by Congress through the instrumentality of members of the national Democratic party, distinguished alike for their political influence over the public sentiment of the North, and their past declarations in favor of said doctrine; and that we now consider it our duty to set forth to the country the course that we shall be compelled to take in that serious and deplorable emergency.

"Resolved, That we request the representatives of the people of Texas, in Legislature assembled, to provide, at the present session, for the Executive of the State appointing suitable delegates to a convention of the southern States, which may be hereafter assembled for the purpose of consultation and advice for the general welfare of the institutions of the South.

"Mr. Brown offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the chairman appoint one member from each judicial district as members of the State Democratic committee.

"Pending which the convention, on motion of Mr. Britton, adjourned to Monday, three o'clock, p. m."

MONDAY, three o'clock, p. m.

"Convention met—roll called—quorum present.

"The Chair announced that the question before the convention was the motion of Mr. Brown appointing the State Democratic committee.

"Mr. Rainey moved to amend by adding, 'the chairman of which shall reside in the city of Austin.' Adopted.

"Mr. ——— moved that each judicial district meet and designate the name of the party they wish to act for their respective districts; which motion, it was moved, should lie on the table; but the president, informing the convention that he wished that course pursued, it was adopted.

"General T. J. Chambers offered the following resolutions:

"Be it resolved by the Democratic Convention of Texas, now assembled in the Capitol of the State, That whereas, the integral parts of the Federal Government of the United States of America, are free, independent, and sovereign States, which, for special purposes, have delegated to that Government a portion of their sovereignty, reserving to themselves, or to the people, all rights and powers not specially delegated; and whereas, one of their reserved rights is that of resuming the power delegated to that Government whenever they may be perverted to the injury or oppression of any of the States, or whenever any of the States may consider that their happiness, their prosperity, or their safety may require it; and whereas, that Government, in the admission of new States, has no power to interfere in any manner with the domestic institutions or internal organization of such States, except to guaranty to them a republican form of government; and whereas, the people of Kansas have formed and adopted a State constitution, securing to themselves and to their posterity the blessings of a republican form of government, with the domestic institution of slavery; therefore this convention solemnly declares that any action upon the part of the Congress of the United States tending to embarrass, delay, and defeat the admission of that new State as a member of the American Union, under any pretext whatever, referable to the question of slavery, would be a usurpation of power, and a violation of the compact of the Union; and in such event, our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, are requested to give notice of our intention to take the necessary steps to prepare the free, independent, and sovereign State of Texas to resume the powers delegated by it to the General Government, and to withdraw from the Union, as being no longer productive of the great objects for which it was established; and we invite our sister States, attached to the benign domestic institution of slavery, to join with us in this important measure, so that we may present to the enemies of our institutions an unbroken and defiant front, and thus secure our safety, our liberties, and our independence, by prompt and united action.

"Be it further resolved, That the president and secretary of this convention be instructed to communicate these resolutions to the legislative and executive departments of each of the States of the American Union, and to the President and Congress of the United States.

"On motion, the convention adjourned until eight o'clock, p. m."

I have similar resolutions from the States of Florida and Alabama, but have not time to read them. If I had time I would say something about Kansas as a justification for myself and for every northern man who votes against and opposes the admission of Kansas into the Union as a slave State.

A gentleman now in my eye has several times asked members on my side of the House whether they would vote to admit Kansas as a slave State if it was well ascertained that a majority of her people were in favor of slave institutions. I can answer that question without any difficulty. I would not vote to admit Kansas as a slave State under any possible circumstances, and I place my justification on the ground that that country belongs to the North. Slavery has got all the genial climate of the United States, and by what right? There is hardly a non-slaveholding State where we can settle and find a genial climate. Will you allow us no spot for our invalids, for our consumptives? Perhaps you will point us to Cuba for relief; but if it were ours you would insist upon establishing your "institution" there also.

Now, I want to say here to gentlemen from Missouri—and I want them to recollect it, and carry the fact home to their constituents—that, if the people of that State would give away every negro they have got to-day, and adopt a free constitution, they would enhance the value of their lands thirty per cent. within two years. If you are successful in making Kansas a slave State, we shall look upon it as depriving us of the only country which has a genial climate suitable for northern labor.

Now, I need not tell you that northern men do not like your sensitive property. They are seriously prejudiced against it, and cannot help it. We cannot settle in a country where this "sensitive property" is allowed to exist. And here let me, in this rambling way, ask the gentleman from South Carolina to remember that some of our people would like to settle in his State; but not in that part where you may travel five, ten, and fifteen miles, among the sand-hillars, and not find a man or a woman who can read and write. Northern men do not like institutions productive of such civilization.

Mr. McQUEEN. If the gentleman will allow me I will say to him that I would rather have the lowest of them than the Mormons and many others educated, probably, in the public schools of which he boasts so much in his own State.

Mr. BURROUGHS. The gentleman must excuse me; but I cannot give him any portion of my time. I have no doubt the gentleman has his preference, but he must pay some respect to his twin sister—that "twin relic."

But, sir, besides these grounds of justice and equity upon which I put this question, the manner in which this Kansas affair has been managed from the start must be taken into consideration. I think I might well claim and insist that, from the beginning to the end of this whole Kansas matter, there has been committed a series of frauds and violence such as have never been seen in any civilized country upon the globe. This is a broad assertion, sir; but I make the charge. I charge it because I believe it. I charge that Franklin Pierce, from the commencement of his administration, in connection with this Kansas matter, acted upon a system of fraud and villainy, and I believe that James Buchanan is following up the same track, and has "out-Heroded Herod."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I consider such language unworthy the place that the gentleman occupies. To denounce a coördinate branch of this Government I hold to be out of order. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and laughter.]

Mr. BURROUGHS. I hope I shall not be interrupted in this way. The gentleman and I differ in opinion no doubt upon some subjects. Sir, it would be a source of the highest pride and greatest gratification to me if I could stand here in my place to-day and say that I honored the President as the President of the Union. I should be glad if I could stand here to-day and say that I approved his acts. I should be glad if I could say, as I could at the close of the eight years of General Jackson's administration, that I honored and approved everything that he had done. I feel humiliated before God and my country that I am obliged on the floor of Congress to denounce the President.

Now, sir, I do not intend to-day to enter into the facts which go to prove the statement which I have made. They will be presented in a few days, I doubt not, by the committee appointed to investigate the subject. But I desire to call the attention of northern Democrats back to 1820. I would remind them of the sacrifice which northern Representatives in this Hall were then called upon to make. I might point them to men throughout the North, from Maine to Ohio, who occupied seats in Congress then, and voted to admit Missouri into the Union as a slave State, and who went back to their constituents to stay away from Congress forever, because they had disregarded the interests and will of those they represented.

Now, sir, what is the true representative principle? Suppose that a gentleman from the North is elected by a constituency that is nearly equally divided, and takes his seat here by virtue of the Governor's certificate: what is his position here? Is he at liberty to disregard the will of his constituents, and vote against their interests, because he has been sent here by some accidental majority? No, sir; I deny it. I maintain—and I put it to the consciences of gentlemen representing northern constituencies—I maintain and insist that it is their duty, when they record their votes here, to consult the interests, the rights, and the future well-being of every man, woman, and child in their districts; and the man who falls short of this fails to discharge his duty to the country.

I see upon the other side of the House a neighbor of mine, [Mr. HATCH,] whose vote, I know, was counted upon in favor of freedom, and permit me to address to him a few observations just here. A few days ago, in this Hall, the gentleman boasted that he had a larger foreign constituency than perhaps any man in Congress. What are your constituents doing? You will tell me, perhaps, that they are digging your wells and cellars, carrying your hods, and building your stores. What will their children do, twenty-five or fifty years from now? That is a pertinent question. There will not be room and employment for them and their children in your city. Where will they go to find homes? If the gentleman permits slavery to spread itself over the whole of the northern Territories, they will find no homes there. I can point the gentleman to hundreds in his district to-day, who, perhaps, thirty years hence will be walking over the fields of Kansas, to see there probably the richest soil in the world, but to find, perhaps, that country occupied by an institution which crowds out

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 52.

northern free labor. I can point the gentleman to hundreds in his district who, fifty years hence, in walking over those beautiful fields, will say, "If my father had not voted for a Democratic Representative from Buffalo, and given him a seat in Congress, these fields would perhaps have been mine; but here is no home for freemen; no home for my countrymen."

Now, I ask of no man here anything which is not entirely in keeping with justice, and in accordance with high equity. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] the other day, said that we placed upon them, in 1820, the burning mark of inferiority. That is not so. The position of the South is every way equal in advantages with us. Our northern men will not settle in a country where slavery exists. I need not make an argument to prove this. On the other hand, gentlemen cannot prove to us that southern men will not go into free territory. I remember facts which I may safely address to you. Go to the State of Illinois, and you will find not less than thirty-five thousand of her inhabitants were originally from either Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, South Carolina, or far off Georgia. They will go to free territory and settle there, if you will permit them. As representatives of the South, if you would consult the interests of a large portion of your country, you will help to make Kansas a free State, and thereby promote the greatest possible good of the citizens of the South who would gladly find homes there.

I regret to have said anything in the course of my remarks which should wound the sensibilities of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH;] but I could not refrain from expressing the true sentiments I entertained in regard to the course of the President of the United States. I know there was a time when it was unlawful to say anything against the King; I know there was a time in England when penalties and chains were visited upon the man who dared to speak against the King—the Tower of London has contained many such. I know there was a time in America when a law was proposed, making it an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment to speak disrespectfully of the President. Now, sir, if such a law was in force at the present day, half our freemen would be in prison or exile. I should be obliged to find some refuge, some secure spot in Canada, or in the southern islands, because of the language I have used in regard to the President, or become the tenant of a Democratic jail. I am a peaceable man, and would treat with proper respect everybody; yet, when I am asked to call the President of the United States an honest man, I must falter. When I am asked to say that he has conducted himself before the people, with respect to this Kansas matter, as a prudent and candid man, I must decline.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What I said when I rose to a question of order was, I trust, founded in proper sentiment of feeling. It is the policy of the Government for all of its branches to indulge in language of courtesy and respect towards each other, and the rules of this House prescribe it in reference to one branch. When I heard the gentleman from New York—a traveled gentleman, as he tells us—get up and denounce a coordinate branch of the Government, I did feel a degree of indignation for the moment which I could not repress. I may regret that I expressed myself so strongly, but I more regret that the gentleman should have used such bitter language towards the President of the United States.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I have no doubt that I should receive instructions in matters relating to politeness from the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not demand a corresponding respect from other branches of the Government towards this body, which they demand from us?

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, the Kansas bill contains three distinct features. First, it denies to Congress the power to legislate slavery into a Territory, or exclude it therefrom; and, without lifting the unconstitutional Missouri restriction to the dignity of a formal repeal, simply declares it "inoperative and void." Second. It transfers the powers of Congress to the Territorial Legislature, and vests in it full jurisdiction over all rightful subjects of legislation, leaving the people perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Third. It guarantees to the people of the Territory admission as a State into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of such admission.

The passage of such a bill was an era in political science, and a monument marking its advancement. Founded on the principle of local self-government, keeping a strict separation between "local and Federal interests," it avoided sectional collisions, limited northern supremacy, and protected a distant people against the fluctuating and oppressive legislation of a geographical majority, plethoric with power, intent on its purposes, ignorant of local wants, and incapable, because acting out of the sphere of intelligence and observation, of promoting domestic happiness and security. Prior to its adoption, Congress had arrogated a despotic, because unlimited, power over the Territories, fixing their normal condition, regulating their institutions, prescribing their civilization, and controlling their destiny. The Kansas bill reversed this practice, confined the Federal Legislature within the scope of its limited jurisdiction, and withdrew the vexed question of slavery from congressional consideration, and transferred it to the arbitration of those interested, and who were most intimately affected by the existence or non-existence of slave labor. It acknowledged the inability of Congress to legislate for the local and domestic interests of a remote people; refused to subject them to Federal dominion, and threw them upon their own resources, to develop their own system of culture, and contend for all the prizes of life. The measure was intended to stop the flowing of the bitter waters of Marah; to stop agitation in Congress, to stop discord and strife and fraternal hate, and accomplish a permanent settlement, in principle and in substance. It was not a mere temporary adjustment, contingent on popular caprice, or controlled by paltry considerations of policy or expediency, but a final, conclusive, and irrevocable settlement, for all time to come, and for every territorial organization. As such, it was accepted by the people of the United States; and as such, a common patriotism of all sections rejoiced in its consummation. It violated no principle of justice, conflicted with no constitutional prohibition; but in it truth and justice met together, freedom and the Constitution embraced each other. It antagonized centralization, and was a happy illustration of local self-government.

Under the practical application of the law, in October, 1856, "the sense" of the people of Kansas has been taken "upon the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution." An affirmative vote being given, the Territorial Legislature passed a law for the election of delegates to the convention by popular suffrage. The delegates were legally chosen at a fair and public election. The convention, thus rightfully summoned by a popular vote, and the Legislature, assembled and framed a republican constitution, and submitted so much of the instrument as related to slavery, to a direct popular vote on the 21st of December last; and now, all the initiatory steps having been taken, in accordance with, and subordinate to, the territorial authorities, which have been recognized by the executives and judiciary of Kansas, the President and people of the United States, she knocks at the door for the privilege of admission into this Confederacy, and to be recognized as a peer. From beginning to end, ab ovo usque ad malum, the forms of law have been observed; and while occasional excesses have been committed, the constitution and the convention have been the work of conservatives and the law abiding, in opposition to those who have been guilty of faction and disorder; and, in the language of Governor Walker, a rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences as has never before disgraced any age or country.

Compared with California and Michigan, the action of Kansas has been sober, methodical, and blameless; and but for its action on slavery, but for the fact that, in her high discretion she has cast her lot with the South, scarce a word of other than simulated dissent would have been heard from any quarter. Attracting the attention of all sections; being the arena of a fierce and uninterrupted contest; subject to unnatural and stimulated immigration, Kansas has slowly and regularly and publicly and voluntarily taken every step, the successive processes of which have led her from the wilderness, through the intermediate organizations, up to her present attitude of a sovereign State, desiring admission into the great sisterhood of sovereign States. She is met with cold rebuffs and refusals, and to sustain the project of remanding her back to territorial pupillage, the most singular pretexts are alleged, the most monstrous doctrines are avowed, the most glaring injustice is proposed to be done, the most reckless inconsistency is practiced.

Several positions have been assumed in both branches of Congress by those who were classed heretofore as friends and advocates of the Kansas bill to justify their present hostility to her admission, and their failure to allow her the guaranteed privilege of coming into the Union, with or without slavery, as the constitution may prescribe. The most prominent objection, most earnestly urged, and most confidently insisted upon, is, that the convention did not submit the whole constitution to popular ratification or rejection. I fear, Mr. Chairman, this is an after-thought, trumped up for the occasion. What was, a short while ago, the curse of the age, the foul blot upon our national escutcheon, the aggregation of all ills, has suddenly become the most insignificant and unimportant part of the constitution. I will not use harsh terms in characterizing such conduct, but to me it is singularly unaccountable. What was the bone of contention in the Kansas bill? Slavery. What was the obnoxiousness of the Missouri restriction? The localizing and proscription of slavery. What was the burden of Abolition accusation? The extension of slavery. What was the theme of song, and lecture, and sermon, and speech, and petition, and clerical protest, but slavery? Every intelligent man must feel and know that if the constitution of Kansas had been, in the language of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] "an emanation from the pit," and had excluded slavery, it would have been tolerated and defended by the greater portion of those who are now so rampant and hostile; while, on the contrary, if it had been perfect as inspiration, and, like inspiration, recognized the existence of slavery, it would have been assailed and condemned. The whole controversy and agitation, for four years, on the Kansas bill, have grown out of slavery.

The President, in his recent admirable message, says:

"This was the question which had convulsed the Union and shaken it to its very center. This was the question which had lighted up the flames of civil war in Kansas, and had produced dangerous sectional parties throughout the Confederacy. It was of a character so paramount in respect to the condition of Kansas as to rivet the anxious attention of the people of the whole country upon it, and it alone. No person thought of any other question."

And the submission, separately of the slavery clause of the constitution, was the fairest and most equitable way of ascertaining the public sentiment and of allowing "the people to regulate their own domestic institutions." I go further, Mr. Chairman, and assert that such was the public declaration of its prominent advocates and of him for whom is claimed the paternity of the measure. In a speech on the 3d of March, 1854, Mr. DOUGLAS said that the doctrine of the report, explanatory of the bill, was: "First, that the whole question of slavery should be withdrawn from the halls of Congress and the political arena, and committed to the arbitrament of those who are immediately interested in, and alone responsible for, its existence. Second, the applying this principle to the Territories and the new States to be formed therefrom. All questions pertaining to slavery were to be referred to the people residing therein."

The same sentiment, that the people were to decide the question of slavery for themselves, that it was to be determined according to their wishes, is repeated, over and over again, in the same masterly speech, and in other speeches on the same side, by men who "were in the country at the time," and active participants in "the controversy and discussion" growing out of the measure; and some of whom could truthfully say, quorum magna pars fui. Secretary Stanton, in his inaugural address "to the people of the Territory of Kansas," while conceding the fairness and fullness of the expression of the will of the people, through the delegates to the constitutional convention, expresses the conviction, and advises—

"That, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great, disturbing question regarding their social institutions, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual, bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence."

In accordance with these declarations of the intent of the measure and the advice and suggestion of the Secretary, "the question of difference," the "great disturbing question regarding their social institutions," has been submitted to a fair vote of the people, and been decided by them. But now, forsooth, the constitution is void and unrepublishable, because, as a whole, it has not been submitted to the people. It appears perfectly plain to my mind, that a people can select agents or representatives, and invest them with authority to make a fundamental law which will be obligatory upon them. The constitution, in my opinion, is perfectly valid, and is an authoritative and conclusive expression of the will of the people of Kansas, without such submission. The convention had plenary power over the matter. It had been invested with it by the people of Kansas. In the act summoning the convention, no restrictions were imposed, no limitations required. The convention had the perfect right—being the highest embodiment of the will and political power of the people—to submit the constitution or not, in whole or in part. It rested exclusively in its discretion; and in exercise of that discretion it submitted the vexed, agitated, and paramount question of difference to a popular vote. It exhibits sublime impudence in the advocates of the Topeka constitution to be objecting to the Lecompton constitution for want of submission, when, a little more than a year ago, they essayed to force that thing, called a constitution, through Congress, which was adopted by an illegal mob, without authority of the General Government; "without the assent of the Territorial Legislature; without a vote of the people authorizing the convention;" and accompanied by a memorial, which was not the same document when presented to Congress, that it was when it came from the hands of that motley and rebellious assemblage of fanatics convened at Topeka. Besides, by participating in the elections held under the Lecompton constitution, as was done on the 4th of January, the Topekaites have abandoned their opposition to it, "recognized its existence in the most solemn and authentic manner," practically and truthfully declared that their past conduct was indefensible and rebellious, and morally bound themselves to obedience and allegiance. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, and many northern Democrats, are estopped from objecting, because they insisted upon the power and right and duty of a Territorial Legislature even, to introduce or exclude slavery. On the 3d of June, 1850, Mr. DOUGLAS declared, in the Senate, his opposition to any provision in the bill organizing a territorial government in California which prohibited the people of that proposed Territory from legislating in respect to African slavery. He announced his belief that this was one of the rights conceded to the Territories the moment they have governments and Legislatures established for them. Here is a high sovereign power—the right to establish or abolish slavery; to determine what shall and what shall not be property; to mold domestic institutions; to fix social polity—which inheres in a Territorial Legislature, and can be exercised without subversion to the people, and in contravention of the popular will. But a convention, the highest sovereign authority, the impersonation of delegated power, is hampered in its action, and compelled to submit its ordinances—"the organic institutes of sovereignty," as Mr. Dallas calls them—to a popular vote. I was aware that Noah Webster and kindred Federalists held to the doctrine that a legislative body was a standing convention, invested with the whole power of their constituents; but it has been reserved for the discussion of this Kansas question to develop the fact that there are persons of distinction and ability, claiming, too, to be State-rights Democrats, who, to accomplish a purpose, would sink and degrade a convention below the dignity of a Legislature of squatters.

To give plausibility to the singular course pursued by some gentlemen, and to relieve the case of all its complications and embarrassments, the action of the Territorial Legislature convened by Stanton, and the vote on the 4th of January, as ordered by that Legislature, are relied upon. This interposes no real obstacle to those who do not entertain erroneous views in reference to a convention. A convention, possessing the attributes of political sovereignty, can do all that the people en masse can do. Regularly clothed by them with authority and power, it represents the whole people; its acts become their acts, and bind their obedience. In the case of Kansas, the question of "convention," or "no convention," was submitted to a popular vote, and a convention was authorized. Being assembled, it becomes the supreme authority, and between it and the Legislature there is a difference, not merely in name and form, but in function and power. The one enacts laws with the assent of the executive; the other ordains constitutions, which import something beyond and above ordinary legislative power. A convention in a Territory must necessarily, so far as its power to make a constitution is conceded, be as independent, as powerful, as unimpeded, as a convention in a State; and this results, ex necessitate rei, from the nature of the duties to be performed, and from the equality which must exist between the new and the old States of the Confederacy. No other power can make a constitution or ordain a fundamental and organic law. A Legislature cannot do it; Congress cannot; nor authorize it by any immediate or subordinate agency. The action of the convention is the declaration of sovereign will, the authoritative "pronunciation of sovereign pleasure." The Territory becomes a State through and by virtue of its constitution, which must be the action of the sovereign. As Secretary Stanton says—

"It is true that a Territory cannot become a State of the Union without the assent of Congress. But this discretion on the part of Congress does not imply the power to dictate institutions to the people of the Territory, or in any way to restrain or limit or force their sovereignty in the exercise of its high function of framing its own State government."

The convention in Kansas elected to submit the slavery clause of the constitution to the people on the 21st of December. This it had the perfect right to do. That was its way and manner, and its action is final; and it is absurd that an ordinary Legislature can interfere with the proceedings of its superior, alter its action, change the mode of submission, fix a different day for a vote, or make a new constituency. An act of the Legislature could not repeal the constitution, or a single article or word of it—could not affect its validity, or change the distribution of power, or authorize a new submission. Its action in requiring a vote on the constitution is nugatory—no more obligatory than the resolution of a party meeting; and the vote, therefore, which was given on the 4th of January, is nothing more than the voluntary, unauthorized act of a promiscuous congregation of men. Nor does it present any logical difficulty in the determination of this question that the result of the vote on the 4th of January, as ordered by the Legislature, was different from the result in December, and that a larger number voted on the latter day than on the former. One is regular, legitimate, authoritative; the other is factious, anarchical, Dorrish. It is a universally recognized law of our elections, indispensable to order and right, that those who remain away from the polls, even though a majority of the legal voters, consent to be bound by the action of those who do vote. That some, that a majority, voluntarily and "with malice aforethought," absented themselves from the polls, does not invalidate the election, or militate against the authority of the convention or the obligatoriness of the constitution. The votes given, if legal and proper, are just as controlling, just as constitutionally conclusive of the will of the people, as if all had participated and voted in the election. To hold otherwise would be to produce discord and confusion, to unsettle existing things, to encourage Dorrism, and allow a mob to become the ruling power under our free institutions.

If the right of a Legislature, Territorial or State, subsequent and in antagonism to a convention, be admitted to submit a constitution, in whole or in part, on the same or a different day, changing or reversing what had been ordained by the convention, it follows inevitably that a Legislature may, from any sudden whim or caprice, submit an objectionable clause of a constitution to a popular vote, and make that vote the determining power. Forms of amendment, tedious and dilatory, adopted by those who deprecated sudden and facile changes in the organic law, or the slow process of a convention, will be dispensed with as too cumbersome for this progressive age. All prescribed forms would soon become intolerable restraints upon popular impatience and zeal, and "the will of a numerical majority"—the physical force of numbers, would take the place of constitution and laws, and become the "sole and absolute power." Sir, those are dangerous tendencies, elevating the individual above the sovereign, lowering the constitution-making power, and removing restraints, without which freedom is but a name and democracy a despotism. Intoxicated with this new possession of power, the legislation would be overawed, as in France, by a frenzied multitude, and representatives would be but vassals in a reign of misrule and terror.

A plan has been proposed to free us from the disagreeableness of admitting Kansas as a slave State, which some of its friends facetiously term a compromise; (I hate the word, Mr. Chairman, it has been so often used for the betrayal of the South;) which is, for Congress to order a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, to ascertain the will of the majority. While this is a violation of the organic act, it is also a proposition for direct intervention in the affairs of Kansas, and to coerce a submission to congressional dictation. In the teeth of the constitution, the Kansas bill, and every principle of justice and State equality, a compulsory requisition is to be made. It is the old, exploded doctrine of congressional supremacy; a revival of the unlimited power to control the Territories; because, if Congress can change the action of the convention, can prescribe a different mode of submission, interfere in her internal affairs, reverse what the convention has done, it can abolish or establish slavery, or do anything else that the most latitudinous constructionist can claim. Congress is concluded by what has been done in Kansas. The constitution being republican, and framed by the people, "in their own way," under the forms of law, there is no option. At all events, the action of the convention cannot be referred back, by Congress, to the people for ratification. The supposed necessity and indispensableness of submission is a fallacy—an off-shoot of Red Republicanism, worse than Black Republicanism, proposed to be ingrafted on the vigorous stem of American republicanism. If the will of the people can only be ascertained by a direct appeal to them, then every clause in the constitution must be wrested from its context and submitted to a separate vote. The Constitution of the United States is the full, just, and perfect voice of the people, the highest expression of popular will in this country; and it has never been submitted either to the aggregate vote of the whole people, (if such a solecism be allowed, for there is really no such people as the people of the whole United States,) or to the separate vote of the people of each State; and who will pretend that it is not as republican, as paramount and supreme a law, as authoritative an exposition of the popular sentiment, as any of the modern constitutions? I utterly deny that the majority has the inherent and unalienable power of governing, without limitation and without restraint. I deny that there are no other means of ascertaining the will of the people in relation to a constitution than by submitting to a direct popular vote. The distinguishing principle and excellence of our American system of government, as contradistinguished from other systems, is what Webster called "the marvelous felicity of its representative system." The regular action of the people is not per capita, or by the aggregated mass, but through representatives. So jealous are the people of a dominant majority that they have tied their own hands, controlled their action, and limited their power. While the people are the source of all political power, yet that power must be manifested by authority of law, through prescribed forms, in obedience to previous direction. Elections are to be held at particular times and places; suffrage is controlled and limited; and the persons to be elected agents or representatives must possess certain qualifications and requisites. The whole history of our Government shows that the greatest wisdom and caution and prudence were to be exercised in altering the constitutions, and ample securities were provided against the rashness and uncertainty of bare majorities.

To illustrate the difference between a regular convention and the action of the people en masse, in their primary capacity, outside of constituted authority, let us suppose a bare majority of the people to meet in the aggregate and adopt a constitution: would that be the organic law of the body-politic—of the entire community as a unit? No; it would be a government forced by one half of the community upon the other half, less the difference in numbers; and is but little, if any, more authoritative and obligatory than if it had been adopted by the lesser half and imposed upon the greater. Government, on such principles, would be a mere resort to physical force. On the other hand, a convention, like that in Kansas, is called in obedience to laws, both territorial and Federal, to which every man in the community, except rebels, has given his assent, and the constitution is the resultant of the wills of many local organizations.

If the convention had the right to form and ordain a constitution, as I have proved, then the action of the Territorial Legislature was irregular, inoperative, and void, and Congress has no right to prescribe a different mode of adopting the constitution, or send it back to find out the opinion of a majority of the voters of the State. This would be concentrating alarming power in Congress, giving it ample authority over the constitutions of the States, and allowing it to make decisions as to the extent of the elective franchise; for, if it can look behind a republican constitution, regularly framed and presented, to find out whether a majority voted for it, it can decide who shall constitute that majority and who should vote in the election. The States, inchoate and complete, will become mere provincial dependencies upon a central satrap, and this Confederacy be converted into a national dictator. This is the creed of Federalism, of the New England school of politics, making individuals and States subservient to the General Government; finding freedom and power and development through artificial organizations and in unreserved obedience to them; accustoming men and States to look to Government for strength and direction; drawing aliment and stimulation from it, and therefore confiding to it the care of their consciences and expecting a resort to all its means to enforce their convictions and remedy their supposed ills. There is no surer way of converting Congress into a huge instrument of centralization and despotism than by enlarging its powers and inculcating the doctrine of looking to Government for support and subsistence and guidance.

Mr. Chairman, if the history of our country were read by the light of the Constitution alone, these constant slavery agitations and discussions in Congress, the hot and eager haste manifested to introduce non-slaveholding States into the Union, and the embarrassments and delays and obstacles thrown in the way of the admission of slaveholding States, would be absolutely incomprehensible. To dedicate California to hiring labor, to swell the political preponderance of the North, the most gigantic and unparalleled fraud and robbery are unblushingly committed, and the Constitution and the rights of the South are ruthlessly trampled under foot. To destroy forever the equilibrium in the Senate, and deprive us of that necessary protection and safeguard, new States are carved out of the Territories, and acquisitions of land, contiguous to the South, and adapted to slave labor, are persistently opposed and prevented. And now, when Kansas, under a solemn stipulation, and in spite of the mischievous opposition of her Governors, forms her domestic institutions in her own way, to defeat her admission, there are to be found prominent men, who violate their antecedents, disown and disinherit their own offspring, break up cherished political associations, form unholy alliances, and sit "cheek by jowl" and become as loving as Damon and Pythias with those, for whom, but a few moons since, the English language was found inadequate to furnish sufficient invectives and reproaches. The statesman and philosopher and patriot may well pause to inquire into the cause of this singular spectacle. Other causes may be assigned; timid but well-meaning men may search after pretexts in the apparent irregularities in Kansas; but to the mind of the South, to the public conviction of that people, there is but one satisfactory solution of the problem, and that is the recognition of slavery in the constitution, the difference of social relations, the implacable and inveterate hostility of her enemies. I do not refer, in this classification of opponents, to those who denounce slavery as the sum of all villainies and abominations, and, following out their depraved instincts and sentiments, would pursue a phantom of speculative liberty and equality, and reconstruct government, not in submission to the word of God, but in defiance of His decrees and prophecies and providence, and in contemptuous disregard of those first and everlasting principles which are necessary to preserve freedom from licentiousness, and self-government from anarchy; but I allude to that class, not given over to judicial blindness and atheism, who profess a reverence for God, who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will, and a love for the Constitution, with all its grants, guarantees, and prohibitions. And what has been done to merit or justify this exclusion from common territory, and this denial of constitutional equality? In the past, whenever perils have environed us, and a common foe invaded our land, interrupted our commerce, or injured our citizens, the South has been lavish of her money and her treasure. In the tented field, in the councils of the Republic, at home and abroad, everywhere, her sons have reflected luster on the American name, and furnished materials for immortal history. Infringing the rights of no section, sharing none of the bounties of the Government, bearing, through Federal legislation, an undue proportion of its burdens, she has never asked anything but severe constitutional justice, and she only asks that now. To-day, although in a minority, she is recognized and admitted, by all right-thinking men, as the conservative portion of the Union, and the only effectual breakwater against social, moral, and political innovations. Are false interpretations of the Scriptures, and corruptions of religion, as manifested in Millerism, Mormonism, and spirit-rappings, prevalent in the northern States? and do laws, higher than the Bible and the Constitution, regulate conscience and prostitute morals? At the South, a pure Christianity, as developed in its fruits, and simple as the teachings of its Divine Author, is more generally recognized and practiced. Do socialism and agrarianism and Fanny-Wrightism find foothold at the North and threaten destruction of private property and endanger vested rights? At the South, every man is secure from mobocratic misrule and plunder. Are there northern laborers who, grinding under the oppression of power, eke out a miserable existence, or, suffering from the terrible pecuniary crisis upon us, gaze at the gorgeous palaces and splendid equipages and costly apparel around them, and with hungry mouths cry out, with startling and terrific emphasis, "Bread or blood!" The southern laborers, in contentment and plenty, are scarcely aware of any financial pressure, because labor and capital are there harmonized, and there is no conflict between them.

Mr. Chairman, I tire of these contrasts, and I assert that the present issue is one of fearful import to the South. The rejection of Kansas, with the Lecompton constitution, speaks the dissolution of, or sectionalizes, the Democratic party, which is the strongest ligament that binds this Union together. It will be the unmistakable annunciation that no more slave States are to be admitted into this Union; that the South is to be degraded and reduced to inferiority; that there is to be no extension of her limits, no enlargement of her boundaries; that slavery shall be restricted within constantly narrowing confines; that for her, within this Union, there is to be no future but bleak, gloomy, hopeless despair. And why is this hostility to be evinced on every occasion? And what will the North gain by abolishing Kansas, by preventing the expansion of slave institutions, by paralyzing slave labor? Is northern prosperity to be favorably affected or enhanced by it? Quite the reverse. Her industry and well-being depend in an eminent degree on southern productions, which, beside the domestic consumption, constitute three fifths of our whole exports. A writer in the Democratic Review for 1850 estimates the annual earnings of the North from the South at $250,000,000. Strike the products of her labor from the trade of the Union, and what would fill the streams of commerce, give employment to northern artisans, furnish freight for vessels, propel the wheels of machinery, and fill the coffers of the Treasury? No wonder the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] declared it to be the settled conviction of the North that no foot of this broad domain should pass out of their possession. To use his own characteristic language, "the profit of the thing" will not justify them in giving up the South.

But is it not "passing strange," when there is such dependence of the North on the South, when our great staples are the aliment of commerce, when our peculiar civilization is the conservative element of the Republic, that such persistent efforts should be made to limit our growth and productions, to destroy our property, and annihilate our people? When the prospective results of emancipation in St. Domingo were exhibited in the French Assembly, Moreau de St. Méry exclaimed: "Perish the colonies, rather than that one principle be sacrificed;" and Robespierre scoldingly chimed in, "Perish the colonies rather than let them, by their menaces, compel us to do what is most loudly called for by their interests." With a like spirit, in total disregard of human suffering, John Quincy Adams, with all the fervor of hate and fanaticism, on the floor of the House, in 1844, gave utterance to the sentiment: "Let the abolition of slavery come; by whatever means—by blood or otherwise—let it come." If it did come, commerce would languish, factories would stop, banks would suspend, credit would expire, and universal woe would brood over this land. The fearful panic now upon us has impaired confidence, produced ruin and distress, bankrupted individuals and corporations, diminished trade, and inflicted losses from which twenty years will not recover us; and yet these consequences are trivial and insignificant compared with the sudden destruction of two thousand millions of property, the uprooting of social institutions, and the perishing of a nation. The sirocco's blast, the tornado's sweep, the earthquake's heavings, the ravages of the pestilence, faintly foreshadow the appalling desolation which would ensue upon such a catastrophe.

Mr. Chairman, we are unfortunately not left to conjecture as to what would be the lamentable results of abolition in the South. In 1791, slavery was abolished by France in St. Domingo. It was hailed with bonfires and illuminations, and the amis de noirs were jubilant with ecstasy on account of their triumph. But mark the rapid and disastrous change! "From being," says Alison, "the greatest sugar plantation in the world, the island has been reduced to the necessity of importing that valuable produce." The blacks, profligate, idle, disorderly, vicious, have declined in number and happiness; the flourishing aspect of the island has disappeared; its agricultural wealth has ceased; and the inhabitants have relapsed into the indolence and inactivity of savage life. From the same author, I derive the following table, showing the ruinous effects of emancipation on the population and trade of St. Domingo:

Population.....	600,000	280,000
Sugar exported, (pounds).....	672,000,000	None.
Coffee exported, do.....	86,769,000	32,000
Ships employed.....	1,680	1
Exports to France.....	£6,720,000	None.
Imports from France.....	9,850,000	None.

And this is the country, part of which Massachusetts advises to be received into the great family of nations, as a free and independent republic!

In 1834, Great Britain abolished slavery in her West India possessions, and paid near one hundred million dollars to indemnify the owners of the emancipated slaves. The result has been a sad disappointment, a disastrous failure; so much so, that Mr. Calhoun, in his celebrated letter to Mr. King, our Minister to France, asserted that the fixed capital of Great Britain, vested in tropical productions, estimated at the value of nearly five hundred million dollars, is said to stand on the brink of ruin. The produce of Jamaica, in three years after the emancipation, decreased one third; and in ten years, that of the whole British West Indies had fallen off one half. The exports of coffee from the West Indies ran down from 27,466,000 pounds in 1830, to 9,927,000 in 1841. The exports of British West Indies were—

	Sugar, cwt.	Coffee, tons.	Shipping, tons.
1841.....	2,131,217	9,927,689	174,975

While this diminution of trade with the emancipated colonies had been going on, there was, in consequence of the enhanced demand for their products, a proportionate increase with those colonies, which, as Mr. Calhoun said, had had the good sense to shun the bad example. A tabular statement of the exports from Great Britain to the British West Indies, (non-slaveholding,) and to Cuba and Brazil, (holding slaves,) will make this fact very manifest:

	British West Indies.	Cuba and other West Indies.	Brazil.
1849.....	1,821,146	1,036,153	2,444,715

The produce of sugar in Cuba, in 1831, was eighty-two thousand tons, and in 1851, two hundred and thirty-five thousand tons. To leave no "loop to hang a doubt upon," I have prepared, from the report on commerce and navigation for 1857, a table showing the value of imports and exports between the United States and Hayti, San Domingo, British West Indies, and French West Indies, where slavery has been abolished, and Cuba and Brazil, which retain African slavery:

Year.	Country.	Value of Imports.	Value of Exports.
1831.....	Hayti.....	1,580,578	1,215,375*
1857.....	Hayti.....	2,290,242	2,535,644
1831.....	San Domingo.....	109,874	44,349
1857.....	San Domingo.....	1,303,301	1,441,353
1831.....	British West Indies.....	2,285,248	4,484,652
1857.....	British West Indies.....	671,842	717,877
1831.....	French West Indies.....	56,133	475,144
1857.....	French West Indies.....	8,371,797	4,893,842
1831.....	Cuba.....	45,243,101	14,923,443
1857.....	Cuba.....	2,375,829	2,076,095
1831.....	Brazil.....	21,469,733	5,545,207
1857.....	Brazil.....

The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] when interrupting the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARRELL,] the other day, committed a grave error in setting down the export commerce of the United States to Hayti as $350,000 greater than the entire trade with Mexico. It is only $4,935,276 less.

Deplorable as these results are, they are, says Alison, from whom I have obtained most of these facts and much of this language, nothing to the heart-rending results of the change on the African. While real estate, in some instances, has depreciated five hundred per cent., the character of the blacks for industry, sobriety, and honesty, has depreciated to a like extent.

A recent correspondent of the New York Herald quotes from a Kingston paper the observations of a resident of over twenty years:

"What do we see? Idleness, drunkenness, concubinage, adultery. And need we wonder at all this, when we find senators, magistrates, planters, merchants, clerks, attorneys, overseers, book-keepers, government officials, and even clergymen, practicing and encouraging these vices?"

The history of emancipation in the northern States, which was not a sudden and revolutionary change, but the gradual sloughing off of the institution, as "the profit of the thing" failed, corresponds, in a modified degree, with the ill effects produced upon the negroes in the West Indies. The number of blind and deformed and idiotic and criminal and pauper negroes in the North is proof of this, and the stringent prohibitions against their residence and immigration are confirmatory evidence of the want of "profit" in supporting a free negro population.

Emancipation in the West Indies has increased the slave trade; and so great is the demand for African labor in the tropical regions, that England and France, under the guise of their coolie and apprentice and emigrant systems, are endeavoring to repair the fatal mistake committed heretofore under false pretenses of philanthropy, and to break down the cotton and sugar interests of the United States.

The London Times acknowledges the mishap and failure of the emancipation movement, ridicules the tenderness of those who shed tears over the Tomitides of literature, and boldly declares that the colonies are perishing for want of sufficient labor. The hopes excited by Brougham and Wilberforce have been disappointed, predictions have been falsified, and the advocates of negro equality and emancipation have lost the prestige of success. Says the Thunderer:

"Negroes are necessary to raise the cotton, sugar, coffee, and tobacco, which the world wants. The white man cannot work under a tropical sun; and unless the African be used as a laborer, the fairest regions of the New World must remain a desert. In time, negroes must be had at any cost; and no nation has a right to impose its own scrupulosity on other free communities. If England has ruined her own colonies, that is no reason why she should check the progress of the whole American continent."

True, the Times puts this reasoning in the mouth of others, but does it with complacency, and without censure. It insists that the colonies must have additional labor, and proves it by reference to a "Report of the Council on Immigration for Trinidad," which shows how a British colony may decay, while all around it is flourishing. "If Trinidad had remained under Spanish sway," that is, a slave colony, "it might, in spite of tyranny and misrule, be the wealthy island which its position and fertility would naturally make it. But although the island contains one million two hundred and fifty thousand acres, yet the extent of all the land now under cultivation is only about fifty-two thousand eight hundred and seven acres, and of this area the sugar plantations cover only thirty-four thousand and fifty-nine acres. The entire number of agricultural laborers working for wages, in the cultivation of sugar and cocoa, is only fourteen thousand, of whom nearly eight thousand are immigrants from India and China, introduced at the public expense."

The Paris Constitutionnel, of 29th December, in vindicating the recent policy of France, holds this language:

"Our colonies have suffered from lack of hands as well as the English colonies, and it cannot be any longer endured. If our neighbors choose to submit to the consequences of their abolition theories, the rest of the world is not obliged to adopt them as its rule of conduct. Their code of philanthropy is not a law for us. Thus, our Government having recognized emigration as at once useful and moral, has authorized traders to engage laborers in Asia and Africa for the French colonies."

These facts betray the impoverishment inseparable from abolition in the tropics, and I leave it to an Exeter Hall casuist, or a strong-minded female novelist, to discover the difference between African, and Chinese, and Indian laborers.

If "absolute necessity" induced the original transportation of the Africans to this continent, and a like imperious necessity requires African compulsory labor to produce tropical productions in the islands; and the cotton, tobacco, sugar, and rice of the southern States be dependent upon slave labor, I press the irresistible conclusion, that we need an extension of slave territory and the Americanization of Central America, by the establishment of our peculiar institutions. Clayton-Bulwer and such like treaties are alike to be rejected, and all assumptions of power, afloat or ashore, interfering with the great law of our manifest destiny, putting swathes on the limbs of our progress, should meet with prompt and successful resistance.

Mr. Chairman, the South is not alone to suffer from abolition, and from confining her institutions within present limits. The act itself would bring untold ruin on the North, while the causes of the act will be but fruitifying seeds of ever-recurring evil. It is idle, however, for me to forewarn gentlemen of the North of the Iliad of woes to be unloosed upon them by the prevalence of this abolition, agrarian, and Red Republican spirit. In the streets of your cities already have been heard the terrible cries of vengeance. Secret watchwords pass readily from mouth to mouth; organized bands wait but for an occasion to despoil and divide; burglaries and garroting and assassination fill the columns of the newspapers. When the slaves of want and hunger, with destitute homes and starving families, pass along your streets, and cursing the Providence and the society which doomed them to poverty and inequality, shall, with franticness of superadded hunger and revenge, seize and appropriate that which is spread out so enticingly before them, it will be too late to parley with them, and argue that the natural, absolute, inalienable, and indefeasible right of a majority to govern, meant in conformity with established law, and that a denial of right of property in man did not mean that all property was a crime, and that men were entitled to receive out of the profits of capital in proportion to their wants. As Macaulay forcibly said: "Men are not apt to stop to reason when they have had no breakfast and know not where they shall get their dinner."

Calmly and distinctly I have endeavored to express my conviction of the importance of this question, and the magnitude of the interests involved. In this I have but echoed the sentiment of my State, as authoritatively expressed through the resolutions of her General Assembly. The utterance has not been the uncertain sound of hostile parties or distracted counsels, but the clear, intelligible, and unmistakable announcement of the solemn conviction of an undivided people. If the contingency provided for in her resolutions, which are but the re-adoption of what had been the previous action of Georgia and Mississippi, shall occur; if the issue shall come, I will not anticipate her course; but, recognizing to its fullest extent the right of secession, and owing to her my allegiance and fealty, when she calls I will respond; where she goes I will go; her people shall be my people; and her destiny my destiny.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it was not originally my intention to have said anything on the question of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. I was aware that other gentlemen on this floor were ready and anxious to occupy the field of debate; and I had made up my mind to perform my duty by giving a silent vote. But representing, as I do in part, a State that has always kept her Democratic banner flying, and never supported any other than Democratic candidates for President and Vice President, it is perhaps incumbent on me, as the humblest of her Representatives—certainly not amiss—that I should give utterance to her voice in common with my colleagues. I have, sir, heard it said by members of Congress favorable to receiving Kansas under the constitution which has been presented, that Illinois led off in opposition to it; and if it had not been for her, they would have had no trouble in consummating their wishes. If this statement is true, it is certainly a compliment to that gallant State of which she may well feel proud. That her unfettered and fearless Democratic press, numbering some fifty-four, moved forward simultaneously and in solid column in hostility to it, before the meeting of Congress, and as soon as they were aware the monster was born, is undeniably true; that her people, with scarcely an exception, and her delegation in Congress, are fixed and unalterably opposed to it, is no matter of doubt; but, sir, they only claim they are contributing equally with others in defeating a measure which proposes to subvert a fundamental principle of self-government; and they ask no more credit for themselves than they are willing to extend to those who stand shoulder to shoulder with them.

It is not to be denied, sir, that Illinois has a Senator who has an intellectual capacity equal to any emergency, and a patriotism coextensive with the Republic; and when a great wrong was proposed to be perpetrated on Kansas, he met it at the threshold, and held it up to the withering scorn and rebuke of the people. For this performance of duty he has been denounced by the extremists of the South, who only seem to calculate present advantages without any reference to future consequences, and the miserable swarm of sycophants and dependants who crowd around power for the crumbs which may fall from the public table. "He has gone over to the Black Republicans," says one. "He is a traitor," adds another. "He is a Burr, or an Arnold," chimes in a third. "He has abandoned his principles," echoes a fourth. And these groundless accusations seem to be rolled as sweet morsels under the tongues of our southern friends. What, sir, call

*From 1831 to 1850 a decrease.

Stephen A. Douglas a traitor! Compare him to a Burr, or an Arnold! Read him out of the Democratic party because he stands by the Kansas-Nebraska act, and refuses to sanction your Lecompton swindle! Away with such folly—away with it! Why, you might as well undertake to make the people believe that General Jackson was an enemy to his country; that Paul was not of the Apostles, as that he has abandoned his political faith. And let me say that that faith has known, and now knows, no sectionalism; and that it will be a long time before the South will have a better friend in Congress from the North than he has shown himself to be. Not that he has done any more than his duty, but he has had the moral courage and manliness to do that, when the most fearful storms of fanaticism were beating about him, and pouring the full volume of their fury upon his head. Regardless of this, you forget the past, and propose to blot out his record; to obliterate from memory his devotion to the Constitution and the Union, and to cast him off because he will not sanction fraud, and consent that a minority in Kansas shall rule! And who, pray, are these new northern allies you now so cordially embrace? Some of the more prominent of them are men who, in the darkest hour of your need, forsook you—men who opposed the compromise measures of 1850, voted against the fugitive slave law, and are scarcely out of their abolition swaddling clothes. Like all new converts, these gentlemen are now loud in their devotion to your "peculiar institution;" and for fear you will suspect their fidelity, in imitation of Peter when he denied his Savior, they have "to curse and to swear." The Illinois Senator, however, maintains a calm, conservative position, conscious of the rectitude of his intentions and the justice of his cause; and looking only to the right, relies upon that, and that alone, to sustain him. When this excitement shall pass away, and the "sober second thought" do its office, when peace shall again settle upon the country, the people will say "Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, and we will make you ruler over many." Though political aspirants who thread their way through the dark labyrinths of intrigue, and only hope to rise on the ruin of others, and not their own merit, desire it otherwise, it will never be said of him—

"A falcon, towering in her pride of place, Was by a mousing owl hawk'd at, and kill'd."

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not only proposed, by some gentlemen here, who set themselves up as judges in Israel, to read out of the Democratic party all who refuse to support the Lecompton swindle—and they are nearly the entire people of the North—but to dissolve the Union if Kansas is not admitted under it. If the declarations of gentlemen are to be accredited, the Union has been dissolved at least twenty times a day during the present Congress; and yet, when we look out upon it, it seems still moored to its firm foundations, its grand proportions rising up before the world, challenging its admiration, and its strong arm of protection still stretched over us. This talk, sir, about its dissolution, has lost its terror. It has not power longer to frighten old women or boys. You cannot dissolve this Union on a mere abstraction. It is anchored in the hopes and hearts of millions of freemen, and they will take care of it. If you turn your backs upon it and leave this Hall, they will send other men here in your place. He who shall raise his paria hand to sever the ligaments which bind it together, will be hung higher than Haman before he can strike the fatal blow. Talk about dissolving the Union! Why, it is worth more to you, Mr. Chairman, and to your southern friends, and your posterity, than all the negroes you ever owned; and you know it better than I do. Break it up to-day, and you would have an internal enemy in your own borders that would be all you could manage—an enemy which it would be our pride and duty to help you suppress in case of an insurrection. It is worth more to the South than to the North, but is a priceless gem to us all. Away, then, with this useless talk about its dissolution! It falls as harmless as the gust upon the mountain. To tell us that you will break up the Union, if we refuse to assist in covering up and sanctifying the most barefaced and shameless frauds and outrages; to tell us that you will destroy it because we object to dragging into it, in violation of the popular will, a State whose pretended constitution is repudiated by an overwhelming majority of its citizens, is to insult our judgment, and cause us to smile at your folly. If we differ upon the Kansas, or any other question, let us reason together as men; as members of the same great republican household, living under a common Constitution, and having a common destiny; and settle it as patriots, and not keep eternally talking about dissolving the Union. This Hall is not the place where threats should be made, reason dethroned, and the furious passions of the human heart turned loose. We have a high and holy mission intrusted to us; and if we fail to discharge it, we left an honest constituency at home who will discharge us.

While, Mr. Chairman, the utmost caution and prudence should be observed, and the proprieties of debate strictly adhered to, the occasion demands that the words of boldness and truth should be spoken. I do not stand here as the Representative of an enlightened and independent people to approach the subject of Kansas with a fearful and trembling step. They would despise me if I did.

The Constitution provides that "Congress may admit new States into the Union;" not the President, not his Cabinet, but Congress; yet the strange anomaly is presented, for the first time in the history of our Government, of the executive department using its influence, its patronage, and its power, to force the legislative department into submission to its will. Cabinet meeting after Cabinet meeting is held to effect the object. Cabinet officers write letters to public assemblies on the subject; and not satisfied with this, some of them come into this Hall during the hours of our session to subdue free and independent thought here, and this conduct is afterwards imitated by Senators and Public Printers, who appear among us at a moment when an important vote is being taken, to induce members to violate their oaths, and vote contrary to their duty, to their conscience, their country, and their God. Sir, for one, I repel such unwarrantable interference; and this House owes it to its own dignity and character to do it. I honor and respect these gentlemen in their places; but when they attempt to usurp mine, I will resist them.

Almost the first political lesson I ever learned from the writings of Mr. Madison, and the wise and good men who were cotemporaneous with him, was that the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government should be kept as separate and distinct from each other as the nature of the case will admit, or as is consistent with that chain of connection which binds the whole fabric of the Constitution together in the bond of amity. Never was there wiser or sounder political doctrine taught. It is the business of Congress to pass laws, and of the President to see they are "faithfully executed." The executive department must not be allowed to virtually unite with the power of executing the power of passing laws. The moment it has that power over Congress, that moment the purse and the sword are united, and the legislative department sinks into disgrace, inefficiency, and abasement. That the most strenuous efforts are being made to force Kansas into the Union at this session by the Administration is not to be disguised. Not the least toleration is extended to those who differ from its policy on that question. Southern gentlemen may differ with the President on almost every recommendation in his message. They may differ from him on the neutrality question, on the Pacific railroad, on the bankrupt law, on his Army policy, on everything, every great measure, but Kansas, and it is all right. They seem to have a dispensation, authorizing a difference of opinion; but if any one dares to think for himself, in opposition to the Lecompton constitution, that difference is regarded as radical and vital, and he must be proscribed for it. Let others do as they may, I will never bow the knee to power to bask in the sunshine of its favor, at the sacrifice of principle; and if proscription must come of it, let it come. I repeat it, let it come.

Sir, the President has had bad advisers. He has been made to believe that it was necessary to lay Kansas upon the altar as a bleeding sacrifice to appease the wrath of the South. No man has told him the truth. The southern extremist whispers in his ear, "courage, all is well;" and the northern sycophant, who follows in the wake of trouble, as the shark the vessel, to lash it to pieces if not satisfied, tells him the North will submit. These creatures, who have sloughed off from the moral face of society, are now congregating in this city to seize upon the "loaves and fishes," pretending to be the President's best friends, when, in reality, they are his worst enemies; for power never had a worse enemy than the miserable courtier who pours the words of flattery and delusion in its ear. Sir, the President has no better friends than those Democrats who differ with him on the Kansas question; but it is their duty to speak to him the truth. If they loved the smiles of power better than their country, they would nestle under the shadow of the throne. He is wrong; and the sooner he finds it out the better. Let his Kansas policy be adopted, and his Administration will be in a hopeless minority in the next Congress. The northern Democracy have gone as far as they can go and live, because they have gone as far as is right. I doubt whether there is a single northern Democrat on this floor who is sustaining the Lecompton outrage, that does not feel he is stepping into his political grave, and that a fearful retribution awaits him at home. Certain it is, that not one of them has yet opened his mouth upon the subject, except the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] whom our southern friends placed at the outermost sentinel-post to be shot down. Relieve the question to-day of the pressure of the Administration, which has marked upon it the imprint of its power and its favors as plainly as the sun is marked upon the heavens in a cloudless day, and I have no idea that three Democrats from the North could be found willing to admit Kansas under the circumstances. If the South has lashed itself into a rage, there is a cool, unyielding determination in the North not to submit to the wrong. We seek no controversy with the South; but it does seem they have suffered themselves to be swept away by delusion and folly, and are acting on the principle that "whom the gods intend to destroy, they first make mad."

How far will they have us to go? Is there no stopping-place to their demands? The history of the past ought to convince them that the Democracy of the North, which constitutes the conservative element of the Government, and upon whose sense of justice they can alone rely for the protection of their rights, cannot yield to their demand now without utter ruin to themselves. Admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and you get a serpent, instead of a fish, that will hiss its long, forked tongue at you, and coil itself about your interests; while the northern Democracy would be met with the declaration that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was designed as a swindle from the first; that it was never intended to be kept in good faith; that the people of Kansas were for a free State, but the moral traitor, Calhoun, and his confederates, backed up by a Democratic Administration, had crushed out their hopes, or, if successful in making it a free State, they were not indebted to the Democracy for it. They would tell us more; they would tell us we did all in our power to crush out the popular will; that we had violated all our promises; that we had sacrificed to the demands of slavery the great principle of self-government, and that we could not be trusted. Sir, we cannot give our consent to the measure; and we ought not to do so; nor should the South demand it of us. It is unreasonable and unfair.

The Democracy of the North were overthrown after the passage of the Kansas bill; but that measure being eminently just and wise, they rallied again; and now, just as they have fairly gotten upon their feet, you propose to force them into the support of a measure that both their conscience and sense of duty condemn. But you tell us that the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution does not violate the principles of its organic act. Deceive not yourselves in supposing you are deceiving the people. They discriminate closely, and understand this matter as well as you do; and it will be well for you if you do not underrate their intelligence. Persistence in preaching one doctrine and practicing another will very soon convince them that—

"Principles in Roderick's mind
Were baseless, vague, and undefined;
His soul, like bark with rudder lost,
On passion's changeful tide was tossed;
Nor vice nor virtue had the power
Beyond the impression of the hour.
And oh! when passion rules, how rare
The hours that fall to virtue's share!"

Mr. Chairman, I have never, with slate and pencil, figured up the political indebtedness of the South to the North, or the North to the South. I have never struck a balance-sheet between them of favors given and favors received. But I imagine, if that was done, the South would be found indebted to the Democracy of the North. They assisted you to reduce the tariffs of 1828 and 1842 to what was believed to be a revenue standard; they opposed equally with yourselves the Wilmot proviso, as being unfair and unjust in its operation; they stood by the fugitive slave law of 1850; voted for and sustained provisions in the Utah and New Mexico organic acts, giving the people of those Territories the right to determine for themselves whether they would or would not have slavery. In 1853, when Washington was taken off the north part of Oregon and erected into a separate Territory, they relieved it from the operation of the Wilmot proviso, which had in 1848 been inserted in the Oregon bill. In 1854, when the time had arrived to erect territorial governments in Kansas and Nebraska, you insisted that the Missouri compromise line was an unjust and oppressive restriction, and ought to be removed. The northern Democracy thought so too, and stood by you breast to breast, when you had nothing to fear, public sentiment being all one way in the South, and they had everything to fear in the North, as there was a powerful counter-current there. You have always received a vastly greater proportion of Government patronage than you were entitled to on the basis of your population. Your men swarm these Halls and the Departments here; they tread the decks of our vessels; they officer our armies, and fill posts of profit almost everywhere.

Notwithstanding your population is much less than that of the North, you have all the Departments of the Government under your control, except, perhaps, there may be a little doubt of your success in this House. Up to within a short time you were in a very decided minority here; and if you now have the majority, as you claim, but which I cannot believe, how did you get it? The country would like to be informed on this point. They would like light upon it. I know you have the President of the Senate and the Speaker of this House. You have the committees. Not a Democrat opposed to the Lecompton swindle was placed on the Committee on Territories—four of them being from slave and one from a free State, Mr. HUGHES, of Indiana, who is zealous for Lecomptonism. Seeing the cast of that committee, the members of this House opposed to crushing out the will of the people in Kansas and sanctioning frauds, voted for and passed a resolution introduced by my distinguished colleague, raising a select committee of fifteen to inquire into those frauds; and strange to say, when that committee was announced by the Speaker, a majority was found on it, in contravention of parliamentary law, opposed to the object of the resolution. Yet, after all this, you do not appear to be satisfied, but propose to drive northern Democrats still closer to the wall. You now tell us if you can get Kansas you will be perfectly happy. Are you right sure of it? How long would it be, if we should surrender Kansas as a sacrifice, before the doctrine boldly avowed by your organ, the Washington Union, that slavery, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, may be carried into all the States, would be avowed on this floor?

There must, gentlemen, be an end to your unjust exactions. There must be a little more toleration of sentiment on your part. In almost all the other controversies you have been right; but in this one you are clearly wrong, and are going too far. Let me beseech you to pause before it is too late. You are rousing the whole North, and striking a more fatal blow at your interest than you have ever before struck, because you are settling, deep and immovable, a conviction in the northern mind that you seek to perpetuate your power at the sacrifice of every principle of right. If you push that monstrous measure of injustice, the Lecompton constitution, through Congress it will be a fatal move to you, and one that the North will not soon forget. With what grace could you thereafter charge that the North was sectional? First cast the beam out of thine own eye. Every member on this floor from the South, with one or two exceptions, are for the Lecompton constitution, and if they were not swept along by sectional feeling, nobody doubts but there would be some more division of sentiment among them; a few, at least, who would see something to condemn on the part of Calhoun and his confederates; something wrong in not submitting an organic act to a vote of the people. But not so. Kansas must be dragged into the Union, vi et armis, contrary to the entreaties and expostulations of its citizens against it. No means are to be left untried to effect it. In the Senate it is virtually announced that illegal votes are to be retained to consummate the object. All efforts to inquire into frauds are voted down there. Here the friends of the Lecompton constitution struggled with its opponents to prevent an investigation of these frauds, from four o'clock in the afternoon until seven o'clock next morning, making all kinds of dilatory motions, and, when finally overcome, and a committee is ordered to be raised, the victory is a barren one—the majority of the committee are against the investigation.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the Lecompton constitution is here. It seems no man could be found to bear it to the capital of the nation but a Government office holder. Stringfellow and Whitfield, and other violent pro-slavery men, have abandoned it as base born, and only Mr. Calhoun follows in its train, to graciously tell us:

"I leave you here a little book,
For you to look upon;
That you may see its father's face,
When he is dead and gone."

To one who knows Mr. Calhoun well, his conduct in Kansas is no matter of surprise. Since his arrival in this city, the fraud of the Delaware Crossing poll-book, the original of which was dug up under a wood pile near his office, has alarmed him, and he has proclaimed he will give the certificates of election to the free-State men from Leavenworth. He may do it, but I doubt it. According to a late publication, he is hesitating what he will do. Somebody is bound to be cheated. Who will it be? He is holding back and refusing to declare the result until the Kansas question is disposed of in Congress. If Kansas is admitted, he is in the market to the highest bidder. Going! Going! How much, gentlemen, will you give? Was there ever before such a humiliating spectacle as a public officer of the General Government neglecting his official duties, and hanging around the Capitol with the poll-books of a distant Territory in his breeches pocket, ready to be knocked down to the best bidder? Going! Going! How much, gentlemen, will you give? Going! Gone! Who is the buyer? Ah! there's the rub. I throw the veil of charity over the balance of his life.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with no ordinary interest to the discussions in this House on the Kansas question. The South has put forth her ablest champions; but their speeches are more a defense of slavery in the abstract than of the Lecompton constitution. They tell us of its civilizing and refining effects; of its tendency to rub off the rugged and vulgar points of human character; and to create a daring and manly chivalry; of its Divine origin, and socializing effects upon society. Sir, I do not stand here to debate these points with them. They have nothing to do with the subject, in reality. The question is, shall Kansas be admitted: not as a slave State, not as a free State, but under a fundamental law that a majority of her people utterly repudiate, spawned into existence by corruption and fraud? That is the question we are called on to decide, and you may disguise the matter as you will, the people will so understand it.

What reason is offered why this thing should be done? The President tells us it will "localize" the difficulty. I cannot agree with him in that opinion. The people are already too much exercised on the subject to lose all their interest in it by the bare act of admission. Indeed that act, under the circumstances, would only increase the excitement. You cannot, in this country, oppress one portion of the people without the hearts of millions sympathizing with them. This is a characteristic of our nature which it is fatal to an American statesman not to understand. When Great Britain oppressed one of our colonies the shock was equally felt and resisted by all. And it is idle to talk about a fraud being palmed off on Kansas without the whole country feeling the indignity and outrage, deeply, intensely. He has studied human nature to little advantage who supposes that those upon whom an organic act is attempted to be imposed will not resist it to the last. Men may be coerced but they cannot be driven. The iron-heel of power may crush them for the time being, but they will rise Phoenix-like from the ashes. Truth may be subdued, but it will never be conquered. Pass your Lecompton constitution, and a standing army in Kansas will not be sufficient to enforce it or put the local government in operation under it. The people there (and they have given unmistakable evidence of their determination) will never recognize its binding force or validity. To talk, then, about localizing the excitement on Kansas affairs, until the people are allowed fair play and the will of the majority prevails, is idle. By suppressing that will and yielding to the demand of the minority you only add fuel to the smouldering embers, and kindle a fire that will burn with an intenser heat—a fire that will blaze on every hill top and in every valley from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The very fact, sir, that the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress may admit new States into the Union, presupposes that that admission is to be made on the application of the people of such proposed State, and the additional fact that Congress is required to guaranty to each State "a republican form of government," which means a government founded on the will of the governed, is conclusive, in my judgment, against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. For no man in this House, or out of it, has yet had the hardihood to assert that a majority of the citizens of that Territory were for it. Its friends steadily ignore this point, and sweep along with a general shout, and hope to cover up in the dust and smoke of battle the great issue upon which it is fought. To talk, under these circumstances, of localizing a controversy involving the republican vitality of the Constitution and the right of self-government, will not satisfy the public mind. "Let justice be done though the heavens should fall." But some gentlemen tell us in way of palliation that if the people of Kansas are opposed to the Lecompton constitution, they can change it at any time, and therefore she should be admitted under it. The point is this, that she should be imprisoned that she may be allowed the privilege of suing out a writ of habeas corpus, to be discharged under it; that you will place shackles upon her limbs that she may knock them off; that you will do an unjust and unlawful thing, that justice may come out of it. Paul said "God forbid that I should do evil that good may come of it;" and this doctrine is sound whether applied to moral, legislative, or religious duties.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that your Kansas Legislature was a legally constituted body; suppose they had an undoubted right to call a convention to frame a constitution; suppose that convention had a legal right to refuse to submit that constitution when formed to a vote of the people, would you, when it was presented for your action, and you were invested with a discretionary power to receive or reject it, receive it if it was ascertained beyond all doubt or cavil that it did not embody the will of the people? Sir, this is precisely the Kansas case, if your view of the law is correct. I believe that the constitution of one of the States (Florida) was pending before Congress several years before she was admitted into the Union. Who doubts but the people who framed it could have met at any time before the final act of admission, formed another and different constitution embodying their last will, and sent it here as a substitute for the first, and been taken into the Union under it? This is virtually the case with Kansas. Everybody knows that her Legislature passed an act to enable the people to determine, in March next, whether they will call another convention and frame another constitution; and you propose to pay no regard to their action. It is true, the law, according to late dispatches, has been temporarily defeated by the Governor; but that does not destroy the evidence of its being the legitimate offspring of the popular will, or its moral force. All at once gentlemen become great sticklers for legal forms. They grasp eagerly at the shadow, and not at the substance. They stick in the bark. Sir, the honest, free-thinking, independent people of this Republic will sweep your technical objections and arguments to the winds, and look at the great question of right. They will tell you, if you had a legal advantage—which I do not admit—you should not have used it to the oppression of a distant people. It will be idle to say that other constitutions were not submitted to a popular vote admitting its truth where there was no controversy or difference of opinion in regard to them. They will tell you it is right when a difference does exist, and, I may add, in all cases, and that neither a constitutional convention or Congress should violate this sacred right, which is inborn and inbred in the people, and is the essence of popular government. The President tersely and eloquently remarks, in his annual message:

"I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State," may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded, as it is, on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

Here the President tells the country that his instructions in favor of submitting the constitution to the people "were expressed in unqualified terms," and no one, in reality, had any other expectation than it would be done in compliance with the Kansas bill and the Cincinnati platform; but it was not done. If the principle avowed is correct, why not make it of universal application? Why should Kansas be an exception to the general rule? To exclude that Territory from its benefit would be to adopt a system of partial legislation, and prescribe one rule for it and another for another Territory. Would this be carrying out the principle of equality among the States? No, sir; it would be a mockery of the very forms of justice. Admit that wrongs and outrages have been committed there—and I have no question but they have been by free-State and pro-slavery men—is that any excuse why we should lend our aid to strike down the popular will? Two wrongs never made a right; and such an argument is as unsound as its morality is rotten. If we are seeking to know the popular wish let us look at the facts. There is no question of our right to go behind what is claimed to be the record to ascertain them. Suppose, to reverse the Kansas case, that the free-State men had a majority, and that, by a species of fraud and ledgerdom, or by the pro-slavery men remaining from the polls, upon the supposition they would not have a fair chance, or from any other cause, the free-State men had got the Legislature, and the convention—made a free-State constitution and refused to submit it to a vote of the people. Suppose, further, that afterwards the pro-slavery men had rallied, carried the Legislature, called another convention to express their wishes, and protested, before Congress, that the constitution, presented by the free-State men, was not a fair embodiment of the public voice, and they asked us to delay action until another constitution, recognizing slavery, could be presented: what think you, Mr. Chairman, would be the tone and feeling of the South? If the North intimated a refusal, such notes of indignation and violence, such threats of dissolution of the Union and bloodshed never rang through these Halls as would ring then.

But now it is our bull that has gored their ox; and with them, the case being altered, alters the case. We know, sir, as a matter of public record, that, counting all the votes, legal and illegal, only 5,574 were given for the Lecompton constitution with slavery, and 569 for it without slavery, on the 21st of December last. We know further; we know that on the 4th of January following, according to the proclamation of Governor Denver, that 10,226 votes were cast against the constitution—138 for it with slavery, and 24 for it and against slavery; and yet, in the face of these startling facts, we are asked to receive and baptize it, to give it the high sanction of our approval, as the people can hereafter change it! If they have a right to do it hereafter, why not now? If they can hereafter act without legal forms, why have they not that right now? If the doctrine of popular sovereignty is recognized, why is it not supreme at all times; and why do you undertake to stifle or curb it? I imagine, sir, it will be hard to give any reason for it, if the view is correct that the people can change it. Sir, southern statesmen are not agreed on that point.

I have heard some of the ablest of them say they did not believe the constitution could be changed until after 1864, as one of its own provisions declares it shall not be; and in this they differ with the President, and should, I suppose, be read out of the Democratic party for it. The right of revolution may exist, but that is a severe and dangerous remedy, and has never, so far as my recollection now serves me, been resorted to in this country but in one instance—that of Rhode Island; and in that case it was put down. The declaration in the schedule, that the people have at all times a right to alter their constitution, will be construed as meaning they have a right to do it in conformity to its provisions. They will be told, as they are now by the Lecomptonites, that, having surrendered to a delegated body the right and power to speak for them, they have no right or power to speak for themselves except through their legally constituted agents, or except in the manner provided in the constitution. And how are they to speak? As members of the Council and House of Representatives, before they can act or enter upon their duties, they must take an oath to support the constitution. That constitution provides they shall not do anything to change or alter it until after 1864, and then only by a two-thirds vote of both branches of the Legislature; and, if they do it, they are perjured men. Is it, then, expedient or wise, when we can prevent it, to place a local or State government in a condition where a people have to resort to revolution to get rid of it? It does seem the question only need to be asked to be answered. Controversies in courts would grow out of the act that would not be settled in your day or mine; and they could not be localized; and the political contest would be fierce and bloody.

Mr. Chairman, another argument in favor of the admission of Kansas now, is that it is necessary to keep up a Senatorial equilibrium between the free and slave States. I had supposed that the faintest hope of such a thing had long since been abandoned. You might as well undertake to poise a beam upon a pivot with three million pounds on one end and nothing on the other. A few facts will illustrate this. At the conclusion of peace, in 1783, (I quote from a speech of a distinguished southern Senator,) there was only 164,081 square miles of territory north, and 647,202 square miles of territory south, of Mason and Dixon's line. Of course the South then had the great bulk of the population. Now there is 882,245 square miles of slave, and 1,903,204 square miles of free territory, showing that while slave territory has increased less than fifty per cent., free territory has increased nearly eleven hundred per cent. At the last census, the population of the free States was 13,434,788; of the slave States, 6,412,508; slaves, 3,200,412; Territories, 140,274; showing the fact that the population in the free States is more than double greater than the white population of the slave States. But this is not all. In 1811, the free States had 93 Representatives in Congress; in 1822, 123; in 1831, 141; in 1842, 135; and in 1852, 144. During the same periods, the slave States had a representation of 78, 79, 99, 87, and 90; difference in favor of the free States, 15, 35, 42, 48, and 54; and after the next census that difference will be more strongly marked. During the greater part of this time, the Government has been in the possession of, and controlled by, the slave States. At its organization, there was only one free, while there were twelve slave States; and we now have sixteen free and fifteen slave States. The slave States had all the advantages of a start, and why have they fallen so far behind, and are they destined to fall still further? It has not, sir, resulted from the action of Congress. No State has ever been kept out of the Union because her constitution recognized slavery; and no serious effort was ever made to keep one out, except Missouri. No restrictive line was ever run between freedom and slavery except the Missouri compromise line, and no one is silly enough to believe that that line made Iowa and Minnesota free territory.

We must, then, Mr. Chairman, find some other reason than the legislation of Congress for the free States so rapidly outstripping the slave States in prosperity and numerical strength. Where will it be found? The answer is in the operation of laws natural, moral, and physical; and until you can reverse their operation no different result will be produced. In reply to this argument of the South, in his great compromise speech of 1850, that man of matchless power and eloquence, Mr. Clay—whose voice has so often resounded through the old Halls of Congress, enchainning and delighting his auditory; and it is only necessary for me to quote his language to sustain fully the views I have expressed on this point—remarked:

"I know it has been said, that with regard to the Territories, and especially has it been said with regard to California, that non-legislation upon the part of Congress implies the same thing as the exclusion of slavery. That we cannot help; that Congress is not responsible for. If nature has pronounced the doom of slavery in these Territories; if she has declared by her immutable laws that slavery cannot and shall not be introduced there, who can you reproach but nature and nature's God? Congress, you cannot. Congress abstains; Congress is passive; Congress is non-acting; south and north of the line, or rather intending no line. It leaves the entire theater of the whole cession of these Territories untouched by legislative enactments, either to exclude or admit slavery."

These noble sentiments of the departed statesman should find a ready response in every beating pulse. He shows the folly of Congress undertaking to change the operation of the laws of nature, and at the same time lays the corner-stone of that policy which led to the adoption of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, transferring the question of slavery, as well as all others of a domestic character, from Congress to the people of the Territories, and allowing them and each of them to settle such questions for themselves—fairly and in good faith, without being swindled by unprincipled knaves, who might pledge before the election, as did Calhoun and his confederates, to submit the constitution to the people for ratification or rejection, and then, with shameless effrontery, violate their promises. And yet, when we speak of these things here, we are gravely told we have nothing to do with them; that that matter is between the delegates and their constituents. Sir, the Lecompton constitution is nothing but a petition, asking that Kansas should be admitted into the Union; and as honest men it is our duty (no one doubts our right) to inquire into all the circumstances connected with it, and if it is found fraudulent, reject it.

It is useless for gentlemen to tell us that we are opposing it because it recognizes slavery. I am satisfied that not one Democrat on this floor—I am sure it is so with myself—would hesitate a single moment to vote for the admission of Kansas as a slave State, if it was the will of a majority of her people to have it so; though I am free to confess, that if I were a citizen of Kansas, I would be in favor of making it a free State; as I am not, I recognize fully the right of the people there to do as they may think best about it. Those who say the question is, "Shall any more slave States be admitted into the Union?" seek to present a false issue. That is not the point of controversy. The real point is, will you admit Kansas under a constitution which every one knows does not reflect the popular will—a constitution against which an overwhelming majority of the people who are to be governed by it are protesting in the most earnest manner? This is what we are called on to decide, and not whether we will admit a slave or a free State; and it is idle—it is worse than idle, it is ridiculous—to endeavor to make the people believe anything else. You cannot throw dust in their eyes, and blind them. They will draw a line of separation, broad and distinct, between the great principle of self-government involved, and a mere shift, a mere evasion of the issue. There is no man, Mr. Chairman, in this House, who will go further than myself to protect the South in all her constitutional rights; but it is not one of those rights to trample in the dust the sovereign power—the people—of a Territory. If we yield this as a southern right, the North may be placed hereafter in a situation where she will exact similar submission; and if she should be, the South never would yield it.

The Lecompton constitution may pass; its friends tell us it will; but if it does, evil consequences will follow it. I know that just now the South has the power everywhere but in this Hall, and they claim it here; that just now they are the zenith and the North the nadir; but perpetrate the outrage of admitting Kansas under the Lecompton fraud, and at the next election the scepter will have departed from Judah never more to return.

The gentleman from Virginia who so eloquently addressed the House the other day on this subject, appealed with great emphasis to the North, especially to the Democracy of the North, to go over and help him. Help him do what, sir? Help him trample down the public will; help him cover up wrong; help him stifle justice; help him overturn the fundamental principle of self-government on which our free institutions are based; help him drag a State into the Union in violation of the Constitution, and against the most solemn protestations of its people; help him destroy the measure upon which Mr. Buchanan was elected; help him consummate an act which would stultify ourselves, brand with falsehood and shame the expressions of our public meetings, and disgrace us as the betrayers of our constituents? No, sir; we will never help him do that. Come what will, weal or woe, the northern Democracy will stand firm by their integrity and the Union; and if for this they are to fall under the executive guillotine, which is already reeking with the blood of some of its noblest sons, let it be so. The base creatures who succeed them only lick the dust from the foot of power, to betray it in turn when they are no longer fed at the public crib.

But we are told this is a pet measure with Mr. Buchanan; the only one on which he has staked the success of his Administration. I should regret to think this was so; I should regret to think that the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton fraud was to shed the only luster on the official life of the Executive. If he depends upon that—if the Lecomptonites depend upon that—to hand his name and fame down to posterity, they will find the blackness of darkness hanging over his memory. But, sir, I must believe that injustice has been done to the President in this; that the bravest of his knights who have entered the tournament for him on this point do not flourish their swords in the sunlight of his approbation.

I have not, Mr. Chairman, entered into an analytical examination of the election outrages and wrongs in Kansas. They are familiar to the whole country; and when the special committee we have appointed shall report, if they are ever allowed to, I may say something in regard to them. At present, I will only notice one point, and that is in reference to the disfranchised counties. Nineteen were not represented in the Lecompton convention for the want of the registry law and census being taken and executed in them, and without fault of their own. Governor Walker tells us so; Mr. Stanton tells us so. The Territorial Legislature, in their memorial presented to this House some days ago, tell us so; and these men would not venture such a statement when, if it were not true, they could be so easily discredited by the record. Two of the counties got up a registry of their own, and elected delegates to the convention; but they were refused seats in that body. Gentlemen, however, say that these nineteen counties were not disfranchised; and they have the word of one H. Clay Pate, the Kansas correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, for it. I would not believe his statement in opposition to those of Walker, Stanton, and the Legislature; nor will the country, though he seems to be a great pet just now with the Lecomptonites. But let us for a moment analyze that statement, which my friend from Missouri, upon my right, has appended to his speech, as though it was of great importance, and see what he does say. Here are his words; and I call the particular attention of the House to them:

"It is well to observe that, of the nineteen counties spoken of as not represented, the census was not taken in four for the reasons stated; the other fifteen were, for civil purposes, attached to organized counties, as follows:

- "Two, Richardson and Weller, to Shawnee;
- "Three, Madison, Butler, and Wise, to Breckinridge;
- "One, Coffee, to Anderson;
- "One, McGee, to Bourbon;
- "Six, Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, Woodson, and Gregory, to Allen;
- "One, Brown, to Doniphan;
- "One, Davis, to Riley.

"The counties of Brown, Washington, Clay, and Dickinson were organized at the last session of the Legislature; in the last named three there were no inhabitants.

"The registry law was executed, and voters were registered in the following counties: Johnson, Lykins, Lynn, Bourbon, Douglas, Shawnee, Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Calhoun, Marshall, and Riley."

Four counties, he admits, were not represented, but insists the other fifteen were attached to other counties for "civil" purposes. That word "civil"

is a strange one to use in connection with election purposes; but I will not cavil about that. Admit these fifteen counties were attached to others, as he asserts; and what does that amount to, or prove? Nothing. There was no census taken, or registry made, of the voters in these counties; and unless these prerequisites were complied with, they could not vote. While, therefore, they were attached to other counties, whose voters are claimed to have been registered, that attachment was a mere mockery of justice—they were merely dead bodies tied to living forms; thus showing that H. Clay Pate, while he is a good special pleader, has not the ability to overshadow truth. If the Lecomptonites desire to march under his banner, on which is inscribed the miserable insignia "Lecompton," they can do so. I prefer to train under the flag on which is floating the motto "anti-Lecompton;" and under that flag the people of this nation will form a funeral cortege and follow the Lecompton constitution to its grave. They never will, and never should, be satisfied until they bury the vile monster away from their sight. Then, and only then, will the foul breath it has breathed upon the land be swept away by the purifying winds of justice, and peace and good will restored.

But let us examine the statement of Mr. Pate a little more closely. I have before me a copy of the Kansas laws, in which is found the one calling the convention, and I propose to test the worth of his publication by that law. He says Richardson and Weller were attached to Shawnee. The law attaches Richardson and Davis (not Weller) to Shawnee. Shawnee is in the eleventh, and Weller in the fourteenth district. He says Madison, Butler, and Wise, were attached to Breckinridge. The law attaches Weller, Breckinridge, Wise, and Madison, together. Breckinridge is in the fourteenth, and Butler in the fifteenth district. He says Coffee was attached to Anderson. The law puts Coffee in the fifteenth, and Anderson in the seventeenth district. He says Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, Woodson, and Godfrey, (or Gregory, as he has it), were attached to Allen. The law attaches Bourbon, McGee, Dorn, and Wilson, together. Dorn is in the eighteenth district, and the other counties in the nineteenth. He says Brown was attached to Doniphan. The law constitutes Doniphan the first, and Brown and Nemaha the second districts. He says Davis was attached to Riley. Davis is in the eleventh, and Riley in the eighth district. This, however, is not all, though amply sufficient to show what credit should be given to his word.

He concedes that the registry law was only executed and voters registered in the counties of Johnson, Lykins, Lynn, Bourbon, Douglas, Shawnee, Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Calhoun, Marshall, and Riley; in all, fourteen—not half of those in the Territory. The first section of the act of the Legislature providing for taking the census and electing delegates to the convention, requires the census to be taken by the officers specified in each county, and a registry made of the bona fide citizens, and a corrected list be filed in the office of a probate judge in the county or election district. The eighth section provides that, "at such election" (that is, for delegates to the convention) "no person shall be permitted to vote unless his name shall appear upon said corrected list." I quote the precise language of the law. The eleventh section further provides that no person shall be entitled to vote unless he "shall have resided three months next before said election in the county in which he offers to vote;" and the fourteenth section provides that "every person not being a qualified voter, according to the provisions of the act," who shall vote at said election, shall be judged guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not less than $100 or more than $200, or imprisoned not less than three or more than six months. Now I would like to know, as the census was only taken and a registry of voters made in fourteen counties, according to Mr. Pate himself, how the citizens living in the balance of the counties could vote? They could not vote, sir, and it is idle to talk about it. They were disfranchised by the most corrupt and monstrous act of villainy which ever stained the annals of our country, and which ought to make the cheek of the most hardened blush for human nature.

I do not attach any importance to Mr. Pate's statement, but gentlemen here seem to, and I thought it best to expose its falsity and give the facts. Pate is evidently Calhoun the second, and in the event of his death would be entitled to the succession. I observe from a subsequent publication of his that he is manufacturing testimony to order for the use of his Lecompton friends here.

I have chosen, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the Kansas question in my own way; to present a general view of it and the points which have arisen in the debate, without dwelling too much in details which have been spread before the country, and everybody understands, and without entering into an argument touching the legality or power of the Lecompton convention, as that part of the subject has been already elucidated. In what I have said I have endeavored "nothing to extenuate, or set down aught in malice." Duty to the known will of my constituents forbids I should have said less. They are a justice-loving people, and desire fair play. They are conscious that this controversy, as presented, is an unfortunate one for the country, and especially for the Democratic party; but no considerations of expediency can induce them to trample on a sacred right. They are unalterably opposed to the Lecompton constitution.

What a contrast, sir, does this day present to the one, when millions of freemen went with cheerful hearts and joyful voices to the polls and voted for James Buchanan for President! Returning to their respective homes at night, they slept more soundly from a consciousness of having discharged a patriotic duty. They had unfurled their banner on the proud old Democratic ship, and manned her with officers who they supposed would keep her clear of breakers; but she is now driven upon them by a furious storm; her sails are rent and torn; her spars are bending; her ribs are cracking; her deck is washed by high waves; and it may be she will go down into the depths of the sea. God avert it! but if she should, I will cling to her topmast rigging, and "if I perish, I perish." Whatever the result, whether the triumph of power or right, Heaven give me the consolation of knowing, as my eyes shut upon the last glimmering sunlight of earth, that the Republic is safe; and may the last sound which salutes my ear, coming up from every where all over the land be, "all is well."

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, while difference and conflict of opinion prevails on most, if not on all other questions submitted to the consideration of Congress and the country, there is one sentiment in the President's message which will be very generally concurred in, but in a sense entirely different from that entertained by the President. He says, in regard to the agitation growing out of Kansas affairs: "They have for some years occupied too much of the public attention; it is high time that attention should be directed to other subjects." And in the recent message accompanying the Lecompton constitution, the President repeats that this agitation has continued "too long." In my judgment, this statement will not be disputed.

From the beginning of the agitation, four years ago, the whole country has been convulsed from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, in every hamlet and every family. Kansas has furnished the fire-side talk and the engrossing topic of discussion in public assemblies and political debates. No question since the war of 1812 has occupied the public attention so generally, or excited the public mind so deeply.

Within that Territory a struggle has been intense on the part of the settlers to secure a free vote on the question of forming their own organic law, the law under which they and their descendants are to live, and in which they and theirs are vitally interested. For this they had the solemn pledge of the Government, embodied in the very act of Congress which brought their Territory into being. The Kansas-Nebraska act guaranteed to them the right to form and establish their institutions by such a vote; and yet their very first election was carried against them by the incursion of lawless inhabitants of a neighboring State, who proposed to and did form their institutions for them, usurp their government, and elect a Legislature, whose laws and enactments were pronounced by partisans of those aggressors, upon this floor, to be "a disgrace to civilization." Citizens of Missouri did overawe, imprison, and murder those settlers, and enact upon their persons and property outrages unparalleled in the history of the country.

Those settlers were mainly the freeborn sons of New England; the men who build churches and school-houses; who scatter the blessings and benefits of civilization wherever they go. "They went out from their father's house to their own inheritance, to 'make the solitary place rejoice;'" to nurture the graces of moral life and beauty in the wilderness. They were murdered on their prairie hearth-stones, and their wives and children were compelled to fly to a deeper solitude for security against greater outrages. The arm of the Government, their natural protector, was withheld from their defense and protection. On the contrary, an armed force was kept in requisition to overawe, and withhold them from resistance to their invaders. The Government, bound to shield them, in point of fact aided in drowning the popular voice, by fraudulent votes and returns of elections, with the concurrence of its own sworn officers. I beg leave to annex an extract from a report of the Hon. J. COLLAMER, of the Senate, submitted at the last session of Congress, which presents, very graphically, the then existing state of affairs in Kansas:

"I state, from information which I regard as entirely reliable, and as facts which I believe capable of the most unquestionable proof, which can at any time be presented, that of the six thousand three hundred and thirty one votes cast in March, 1855, for the election of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas, four thousand nine hundred and twenty-one of them were cast by armed bands of the inhabitants of Missouri, who invaded Kansas for that purpose, on that occasion; that only one thousand four hundred and ten legal votes were cast, and a majority of those were for the free-State candidates, though most of the free-State voters were driven from the polls. This invasion extended to all the representative districts but one, and elected and controlled a large majority of both Houses. The people of the Territory have not been left free, but have been invaded and subjugated, and they are, and their institutions have been, controlled by the people of Missouri, through and by the tyrannical laws enacted by that Assembly, and more tyrannically enforced by the officers by them appointed. These laws, so made by usurpation, the Executive of this Government has aided to enforce, and in Congress no relief has been granted. The complaints and representations of this usurpation and perversion of the organic act have been represented here as complaints of a mere irregularity, and been treated by the Senate with apparent indifference and neglect, as no measure even of inquiry into their truth has been instituted.

"Abandoned to their oppressors, the free-State people of Kansas have been pursued by them in the same spirit which made the invasion. The acts of said Assembly have by their officers been made the cover for all forms of political persecution and oppression. Indictments for constructive treason and pretended nuisances deprive them of liberty and destroy their property. Under the form of sheriff's posse, armed bands of people from without the Territory prowl over it and take and destroy property and lives, and intimidate and drive off the free-State people. These people have thus, for several months past, been harassed and scattered, and any attempt at self-defense has been repressed by the Army of the United States, or been declared constructive treason, and treated accordingly. The settlers have thus in large numbers been driven from their settlements and from the Territory. This is but a brief and feeble statement of the facts. A full picture of the public atrocities and private violence which have been committed with impunity upon the free-State people of Kansas, would excite and arouse the deepest sentiment of indignation."

Well, sir, the agitation still continues; there is no abatement of it, here or elsewhere, in Kansas or out of Kansas. Recently, on the floor of this House, has its continued intensity been exhibited, by acts of personal collision and violence. Who, then, will gainsay or deny the President's assertion that this agitation has continued "too long?"

There is one other proposition deducible from the whole facts in the case, which is not referred to in the message, but upon which, nevertheless, the like unanimity of sentiment must prevail, namely: that there has been no moment of time during this four years of violence in Kansas and disorder out of it, when the President could not have terminated the difficulty and ended the agitation by a dash of his pen. The former President could have done so, as could his successor, now as then; and at any time can he give the country quiet in this matter, in the very easy manner in which the plighted faith of the Government was pledged to do from the first. There can, therefore, be no more difference of opinion in regard to the responsibility than of the "too long" continuance of this difficulty. The Government is responsible for the beginning and continuance of the agitation, and for all its consequences; and this must be patent to the country and mankind. Had protection been given to the people in their efforts for free government; had their right of suffrage been secured to them; had the arms of the United States been employed for them—as alone the Government has authority to employ them, "to suppress insurrection and repel invasion"—instead of against them, and in defiance of the Constitution, then there would have been no agitation in Kansas, but she would have been long ago a State of this Confederacy, under the quiet operation of her own lawful authority.

There has been no mystery in either the origin or continuance of this agitation; the same thing would happen whenever popular rights were invaded or abridged, under any Government but an extreme despotism; wherever the people were fit to govern themselves, or possessed "rights to be respected," they would be impelled to such a struggle by the patriotic consideration suggested by Mr. Jefferson in his first inaugural: "Jealousy of the right of election is the vital principle of Republics." Why, sir, no such instance of paternal desertion and barbarity in any Government stands of record, and a parallel with the struggling heroism and forbearance of the people of Kansas remains to be recorded.

The persistence in the determination to force slavery upon this Territory in the face of the evidence and remonstrance of the chosen officers of the Government, is most remarkable. It is seeking slavery under all the stern difficulties which men are usually willing to encounter only to secure freedom.

First, Mr. Reeder, an unwavering Democrat, was selected for Governor; he was compelled to protest against the invasion of Missourians to control the elections and subjugate the Territory, and he was displaced. Governor Shannon was alike unsuccessful in his mission, and went into retirement. Governor Geary returned also, with bitter protests against the course of procedure, and the insane policy of the Government. The protests of these successive functionaries were disregarded, and their advice as to the course which justice and fair dealing directed was rejected by the former Administration. The present one gained no lessons of wisdom, justice, or humanity, from the course and failure of the former; followed the same line of policy, with more settled purpose, and resolved to make an end of the controversy at once. For this object a man of tried political character and great experience in public affairs was selected, a chosen champion of southern interests, and one of the leading statesmen of the Union—Robert J. Walker; having associated with him, as Secretary, Mr. Stanton, scarcely less favorably known to the Democracy for his devotion. These gentlemen began the work in earnest; they proceeded immediately to Kansas and found the same denial of right; the same prostitution of the ballot, bold and shameless; "a light shone round about them," and their conversion was complete; they also expostulated with the Government, and finally protested against the action of the Lecompton convention, and for this met the fate of their predecessors.

The testimony of these chosen witnesses had no effect to change or modify the settled purpose of the Administration, but was wholly rejected; and a constitution thus denounced, neither authorized by Congress, nor elected by the people, nor having the essential basis of a legal census, and against the popular voice by over ten thousand majority in a voting population of about twelve thousand, comes here backed with the same executive determination for our ratification. Upon what ground of justice or propriety should it be ratified?

The honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] and from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] hold that the Kansas-Nebraska law was an enabling act, and that when the people voted under it, and adopted a constitution, they became, ipso facto, a State, in or out of the Union. Now, no Territory can become a State unless Congress admit it as such; its elections are merely provisional; it has Congressmen or not, and Senators or not, according as Congress shall determine; it remains a Territory until Congress admit it as a State. Besides, sir, if Congress enabled anybody by that law, it was the people of Kansas; and they refused to act under it, and did not act. It is not at all material whether the law was an enabling act or not; the people have the same right, with or without one, to organize a State provisionally, and to apply to Congress for admission. This was the fact in the cases cited by the gentlemen; but California and the others were no States until Congress admitted them as such; nor can any State be except by a successful rebellion.

The question here is, whether the people of Kansas did adopt this constitution, and desire to be admitted under it? They did no such thing. Their first proceeding under it was the election held to decide whether there should be a Lecompton convention or not, and the election itself was ordered by a Territorial Legislature in which the people never did acquiesce. The law was a fraud, and the people refused to attend the election of delegates to that convention, which was also fraudulent, because half the people were not registered as required by law; they therefore refused to vote or take any part in the election. When the territorial election came on, a Legislature and members of Congress were elected upon a distinct issue of repudiation of the convention which had formed the constitution, and refused to submit it to the people for the openly avowed reason that it would be voted down. When, on the 21st of December, the election was held under it, they refused to participate in it, because the question of its acceptance or rejection was not submitted; and at the same time State officers were elected under protest, in the name of the people of Kansas, which protest is now here before Congress. Do the gentlemen hold that Kansas can be forced into the Union "against the consent of the governed," because Congress had enabled them, when, even according to the showing of the President himself, the people of Kansas are, at this moment, in a state of armed rebellion against this very constitution? Therefore, and for these reasons, whether this law was an enabling act or not is of no sort of consequence.

But for the obstinate determination to force the Territory into the Union as a slave State, in the face of facts and evidence, she would have presented a constitution here long ago, of her own choice and adoption. I am bound to avow, however, sir, that I could not have voted for any constitution sanctioning property in man, by any of its provisions, framed at Lecompton or elsewhere, for that or any Territory. Such is my abhorrence of slavery and oppression, whether in Hungary, or Poland, or Ireland, or South Carolina, and in all lands or continents, and on all the islands in the limitless seas, that under no conceivable circumstances would I vote for the addition of one foot of slave territory to this Confederacy, though the application came here with the sanction of every vote in the proposed State; for, under the Constitution which I am sworn to support, as "I understand it," such could not be a "republican constitution." I should, on that question, exercise my reserved right to vote, as one of the people, if I need be, against any number, or all others; holding, as I do, that "republican" means the equality of all men.

Mr. Chairman, although the President could have terminated the Kansas agitation by the easy means already indicated, for which omission and dereliction he, like his predecessor, may be so unfortunate as to live long enough to follow as chief mourner at the funeral of his own reputation, nevertheless he could not have quieted what is called the slavery agitation—that he is not responsible for; it is beyond the jurisdiction of his high office; that will not down at his bidding, though you were to admit into the Union any number of slave States. When that shall appear ordered and settled upon compromises firm as was the Missouri; when everything on the surface of affairs is tranquil and serene, "calm as a summer sea," it will be found a deceitful calm, an unnatural tranquillity, for the depths are vexed, and every slight disturbing cause will create agitation afresh. In the midst of profound quiet, a cry will come from the very clouds, "there's a negro in the fence!" to startle and alarm, and the agitation will be at once renewed, freshened, and invigorated from its very rest, and this will be but the repetition of the thing until the last negro is out of the fence. The counter forces of freedom and slavery are at work, and they will ever be until one shall triumph; if the records of faithful history are reliable, if the parallels of the past are to be regarded, it is not difficult to augur the result of that controversy; it may be determined by peaceful means, or by forcible means—Heaven grant that it may prove a peaceful triumph, for it pains me to imagine such an event as masters availing themselves of the underground railroad to escape from the indignant and retributive pursuit of their own slaves; or that more fearful alternative of Providence, some Moses raised up to lead the bondmen through the Red sea. Ay, sir, the Red sea! No, I will not suffer myself to contemplate a triumph such as that, even for freedom.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia speaks plainly. I thank him for his free speech. That is what we hold to. He would be no doughface, were he of the North; his rebuke of that unfortunate class of persons must be keenly felt. The gentleman differs widely, however, from Mr. Jefferson, Madison, and all the great founders of the Republic. They regarded slavery as more than a misfortune, "an evil, and a crime."

"The principle is this, and will ever remain in force, that men, by nature, are free."—Continental Congress, 1779.

"It is conceded, on all hands, that the right to be free can never be alienated."—Continental Congress.

"It is among my first wishes to see some plan by which slavery in this country can be abolished by law."—Washington.

"Slavery is contrary to the law of nature and of nations."—William Wirt.

"Slavery is repugnant to the principles of Christianity; it prostrates every benevolent action of the human heart."—Patrick Henry.

"The way, I hope, is preparing, under the auspices of Heaven, for a total emancipation."—Jefferson.

And, as the honorable gentleman has opened this slavery question for discussion, I desire to look for a moment at his line of argument. In an unenlightened age slaves may have been honestly acquired, and an honest inheritance, according to the received opinion of the time—conquest gave title, and men were the spoils of the vanquished; capture of enemies in war was, however, the only ground of title then. In that darker age slavery was regarded against natural law; then, kidnapping and man-stealing could not give one man a title to the person or service of another man; the same disability must exist in this more enlightened age. A stream can rise no higher than its source. What was bad in its inception cannot be cured, though it obtain the indorsement of a multitude of responsible names. No succession of bargain and sale can give validity to a corrupt title; running out this legal principle to its proper conclusion and application, the propriety of the old maxim, touching "the partaker," will be apparent. Men held by right of conquest may, and always might, reconquer themselves, their persons and their rights whenever they can; it is always regarded the noblest ambition of men and of subjugated nations to rise with whatever power they may, and wrest themselves from their oppressors. The whole world sympathizes in every such struggle; and every heart of the most remote inhabitant of civilization is animated by a feeling of common interest with all who strike for freedom. The people of our country have often exhibited their sympathy with oppressed nations in such struggles, and have on several occasions rendered material aid to the efforts of nations striving to redress and free themselves.

But, sir, I hold that men are not property even by right of conquest, which is the only right ever contended for anywhere. I hold that no being possessing physical and moral faculties common to human beings, can, by any constitution or laws, be goods and chattels: the Constitution of the United States admits this fact by treating persons held in slavery as "persons not property,"—"persons held to labor," is the language; and this holding is incompatible with the idea of property. The declaration to which the Constitution is referable for explanation, declares that all men are created equal and are entitled to certain rights; the Constitution was never held to impair, by any construction, that declaration; the Constitution of the United States knows nobody under any other name or style than persons. Where is the right given in that instrument to a party as owner of a man as property? I know of none, and I should like any strict constructionist, here or elsewhere, to inform me.

The framers of the Constitution have used language having an opposite meaning, quite another and different signification, than owner, property, and the like; "persons;" they say persons legally held to labor; and certainly no chattel can be the subject of law. Every member of Congress, the honorable gentleman from Georgia included, is described in that instrument by the same term, and by no other term.

These arguments for slavery are gathered from that remote age when bondmen were the captives of "a man's sword and his bow"—a sanguinary period. Even then kidnapping and man-stealing met the death penalty by Divine command. The gentleman quoted the tenth commandment for our reflection; but the eighth comes before it, and carries equal sanctions. Let that be reverently considered also. I do not know, sir, that anybody at the North "covets or desires" to meddle with these "men servants or maid servants." Our southern friends have them all and entirely to themselves. Nor do I know that we have ever claimed the right to interfere with that domestic institution in the States—certainly not unless the Missouri compromise repeal might authorize the war to be carried into Africa. The gentleman claims for slavery a greater exemption from crime than prevails in a free community, and produces the police records of New York in proof. I am forced to admit that we have no exemption from crime in New York to boast of; yet let me say we have few crimes of greater enormity than selling wives and children at the auction block.

In regard to this argument drawn from antiquity, I reply that its fields have all been reaped, gleaned, and garnered. The accumulated wisdom of past ages is, at the present time, to be shone upon and sanctified by Christianity, which teaches the fulfillment "of all the law and the prophets" in the higher injunction of universal brotherhood. The world moves, and "the ignorance that was winked" at, "becomes monstrous in the light of that great Christian obligation.

The ingenious Doctor Franklin has anticipated all these arguments for slavery of the African, "a heathen race," as the gentleman terms them, in his account of a report of the Divan of Algiers, one hundred and seventy years ago, upon a petition to abolish the slavery of white Christian men in that State.

A petition was presented to the Divan of Algiers, praying for the abolition of piracy and slavery, as being unjust, and the report of a member of the Divan is as follows:

"Have these persons considered the consequences of granting their petition? If we cease our cruises against the Christians, how shall we be furnished with commodities so necessary for us? If we forbear to make slaves of their people, who in this hot climate are to cultivate our lands? Who are to perform the common labors in our families? Must we not, then, be our own slaves? Is there not more favor due to us than to these Christian dogs? We have about fifty thousand slaves; this number, if not kept up by fresh supplies, will gradually be annihilated; our lands will become of no value for want of cultivation; the rents of houses will sink one half: for what? To gratify the whims of a whimsical sect, who would have us forbear making more slaves not only, but even manumit those we have.

"But who is to indemnify their masters for this loss, and would they, to do what they think justice to the slaves, do greater injustice to their owners? And if we set our slaves at liberty, what is to be done with them? Few would return to their own country. Must we maintain them; for men accustomed to slavery will not work when not compelled; and what is there so pitiable in their present condition? Is their condition made worse by falling into our hands? No; for they have only exchanged one slavery for a better; they have the opportunity of saving their immortal souls. They are too ignorant to establish a good government. While serving us we take good care of them; provide them everything, and treat them with humanity. The laborers in their own country are worse fed, worse lodged and clothed; the condition of many of them is, therefore, already mended, and requires no further improvement. Here their lives are in safety. If some of these mad bigots who tease us with their petitions, have freed their slaves in their blind zeal, it was not humanity.

"How grossly are they mistaken who imagine that the Alcoran disallows slavery! are not the two precepts—to quote no more—'Masters, treat your slaves with kindness,' 'Slaves, serve your masters with cheerfulness and fidelity'—clear proofs to the contrary? Let us hear no more of this detestable proposition, the adoption of which would be depreciating our lands and depriving so many good citizens of their properties."

The Divan passed this resolution:

"The doctrine that plundering and enslaving Christians is unjust is at least problematical; but that it is the interest of the State to continue the practice is clear; therefore, let the petition be rejected."

Men's interests are operated on with surprising similarity in all countries and climates. These were white men slaves in Africa.

That gentleman and others threaten a dissolution of the Union if this so-called Lecompton constitution be not treated with favor here; that, let me say, is beating upon the same old parchment around this Hall, giving forth the same monotonous sounds, provoking only weariness. For my own part, sir, I am disgusted with that maimed, bloated, bandaged old form, that has hobbled on crutches and staves by day, and been set up with, watched and nursed on his miserable couch by night, so long; I desire to see the hale and stalwart personification of Union which the fathers sketched and left us, sound, reliable, cordial, and of hearty cheer; I desire to see no other representation or reality. If the gentleman's State is impatient of parental and wholesome restraint, rather than these threats, complaints, and heart-burnings, I would vote to-day to divide to her her share of the common inheritance, with an additional and liberal outfit to enable her to set up housekeeping on her own account, and let her go, and no more words about it; when she comes back suppliant for readmission, knocking at our door, as she must do in about ninety days, we will then consider the question of annexation; yes, sir, we will think of that.

I desire to tell the gentleman a story illustrative of the position of his State, and the consequence to follow the execution of these threats of dissolution. A son of the Emerald Isle, employed in digging a well, was let down about half way, some twenty feet, when the rope by which he was suspended became entangled in the machinery. He became impatient of his position, and, thoughtless of consequences, he cried out, "if you don't let me up, or let me down, I'll cut the rope." So would these gentlemen cut the rope. The Administration reason justly, no doubt, that as a question of party policy its reliance must be upon the southern Democracy, it has abundant reason, from the past, for confidence in northern compliance. The annexation of Texas and the repeal of the Missouri compromise had both the one object, the extension of slavery. The success of those measures involved the political ruin of northern adherents who voted for them, and threw the Democratic party at the North into a minority, but the North returned to its allegiance in due time. That result authorizes further exactions by the South, and confidence in further and future compliance on the part of the North. They have every reason to assume that they can treat their northern allies—

"As a huntsman his pack,

For when he pleases, he can whistle them back."

There may come a time when the northern wing of the party will perceive that the Government has become a great southern agency, with the President of the United States its chief clerk; and may be disposed to yield to interest or to patriotism what is now given to party. Has that time now come? The President deprecates the effect of the defeat of this measure, upon the fourteen slave States, and says a "keen sensibility will be felt by them at so untoward an event." His sympathy appears in no degree awakened to any violence to the sensibility of fifteen northern States. With an equal show of propriety might the President fear for their sensibility at the "untoward event" of any northern State having been permitted to flourish under free constitutions; and so far as that reason goes they might be exhorted to yield those to blunt the "keen" edge of southern sensibility. They will not yield themselves or Kansas to that appeal—it is quite too sectional.

The gentleman from New York, my honorable colleague, very frankly foreshadows the policy of the Government, with a view to the settlement of all these exciting questions. When he went for "wholesale appropriation" of foreign territory by the Government—acquisition by conquest, instead of by predatory incursions and petit occupation by individuals in arms; robbers on their own account—the gentleman indicated the humane view of that subject, one that will direct the public mind to serious reflection thereon; and at the same time he promulgated to this House and the country the policy of the Government quite distinctly; as by authority. The basis of that policy is to be the Ostend circular.

Walker, hitherto supposed to be a secret agent of the Government, is to be abandoned to his fate, as was his ancient prototype, Robert Kidd, in whose enterprises the British King is said also to have shared. The transit route is to be guarantied to the satisfaction of England and France; war is to be made, or threatened, upon Spain, on some pretense; Cuba is to be our indemnity for claims against her; and the consideration to the South for the loss of "FREE KANSAS" as well. That is the programme. The extreme of Cuba, sir, is nearer the coast of Guinea than is our southern main; and even though the slave trade may remain prohibited—as it will ever remain—it will be quite as easy for slavers to slip through the Gulf squadron as it was for Walker and his "cankers of a calm world and a long peace," especially if its future commander be less a matter-of-fact man than was Commodore Paulding—one who understands that words of instructions are intended to cover and conceal orders.

But, sir, such an argument, plausible as it may appear, will not settle these questions; the idea is delusive; it will protract the agitation rather. The field of action will be widened and extended; it will have more verge and scope; there will be more land for freedom to possess, and the tropics may become the theater of its highest achievements in the ascendancy of liberty and law.

For freedom throughout this Union, and over all this vast continent, is MANIFEST DESTINY.

Mr. CRAWFORD obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. PHELPS, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 5) making appropriations for the service of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved that the House adjourn.

KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, to enable me to introduce certain joint resolutions from the Legislature of Kentucky.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in relation to the soldiers of the Revolution, and of the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HOWELL.

Mr. READY, by unanimous consent, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the relief of William Howell, of the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ANDREW J. FLEMMING.

Mr. REILLY, by unanimous consent, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill for the relief of Andrew J. Flemming, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WASHINGTON RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution of the Territorial Assembly of Washington Territory, relative to the Territories of Washington and Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the joint resolution of the same body, relative to a geological survey by Dr. John Evans; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COURT-HOUSE, ETC., AT TYLER, TEXAS.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide for a building for the accommodation of the courts of the United States and post office at Tyler, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, (at four o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1858.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

* The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing what officers of the Army, belonging to the several regiments in service in the field, or at remote or frontier stations, are now absent from duty, and the cause of such absence; which was, on motion of Mr. Wilson, ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER presented the petition of Franklin Kelsey, praying that an appropriation may be made for building, equipping, and testing a steamboat on a scientific model invented by him; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the memorial of Alexander B. Hagner and Daniel R. Hagner, guardians of the infant children of the late Major J. R. Hagner, United States Army, praying that they may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Joseph E. Cole, praying the establishment of a line of mail steamers between Baltimore and St. Thomas, in the West Indies; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of Henry Cordier and others, citizens of the United States, praying that the public lands may cease to be regarded as a source of revenue to the Government, and that all entries thereof may be confined to actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KING presented a remonstrance of citizens of Buffalo, New York, against the granting of public lands to corporations, and praying that they may be retained for actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GREEN presented a memorial adopted at a meeting of citizens of Clark county, Missouri, remonstrating against the diversion of the lands granted by Congress for the improvement of the Des Moines river from that object, and the application of those lands by the State of Iowa to any other purpose than that for which those lands were granted; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented a petition of the city of New Orleans, praying that the title to certain lands bequeathed to that city and the city of Baltimore may be confirmed by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented a memorial of the city of New Orleans, praying Congress to relinquish to that city the interest of the United States in certain lands bequeathed to the cities of New Orleans and Philadelphia, by the late Stephen Girard; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. JONES presented the memorial of John Frink, praying for the remission of certain fines and forfeitures imposed under his contract for carrying the mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in relation to the Pacific railroad and in favor of a donation of land to the Territory of Nebraska for the construction of railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Prairie du Chien and Man-kota railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Lansing, Northern Iowa, and Southern Minnesota railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in behalf of James B. Thomas and his family, who were sufferers by Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of a weekly overland mail route from some point in Texas to San Diego, in California; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of the establishment of mail coaches from Tyler to Waco, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of adopting measures for having the Indians of Texas, west of the Pecos river, collected upon the reserve provided for them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas in favor of the establishment of a military post, at or near the junction of the larger Wichita and Red rivers, and the adoption of other measures for preventing Indian depredations on the frontier of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, in favor of the erection of buildings for post offices and the use of the United States courts in that State, and also the establishment of another judicial district therein; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Baldwin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate relating to the private land claim of B. E. Edwards, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. SIMMONS, it was Ordered, That Edward Harte have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, it was Ordered, That J. R. St. J. Gregory have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be authorized to cause to be printed, for the use of the Post Office Department, twelve hundred copies of the report of the Postmaster General with the appendix, and three hundred copies of the same report without the appendix.

WASHINGTON CITY POLICE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the establishment, under the authority and control of the Government of the United States, of an efficient police in the city of Washington.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. POLK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill in relation to conflicting land claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MALLORY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 165) authorizing the construction of a dry-dock for the naval service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of David Gordon, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Eleazer Williams, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 166) for the relief of Eleazer Williams. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 42) to provide for the construction of a custom-house, court-house, and post office in Trenton, in the State of New Jersey, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass; and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 49) to provide for the construction of a court-house, post office, and custom-house in Appalachicola, in the State of Florida, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass; and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

WHITEMARSH B. SEABROOK.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 81) to amend the "Act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and others," have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. I ask, if it be not inconsistent with the views of the Senate, that the bill be taken up and put on its passage immediately. I will make a brief explanation of it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. At the last Congress, a bill passed both Houses, appropriating a certain amount of money to Seabrook and others, who belonged to a military company in South Carolina, that was engaged in the late war with Great Britain. It gave them pay and emoluments according to their rank in the service; and it directed the money to be paid to the persons, if alive; and if dead, to their heirs-at-law. It has been found impracticable to execute the bill, because a great many of the heirs-at-law are scattered all over the country, and some of them are minors, and it is impossible to pay the money to them. It is now proposed that, instead of the money being paid to the heirs-at-law, it be paid to the executors and administrators of the parties. The House of Representatives has passed this bill: it is proper to have the matter adjudicated, for the money belonging to the parties is in the Treasury; and the bill ought to be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GONZAGA COLLEGE.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga college, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. I will make a brief explanation of it.

Mr. BELL. Will it consume time?

Mr. BROWN. I think not.

Mr. BELL. I do not know what my rights are on the question before the Senate. It may be that the Presiding Officer may feel it his duty to stop the debate on the question that was up yesterday, at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, that at the hour of one, if the Senator does not take the floor before, the Chair will call up his motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, which comes up as unfinished business at the head of the special orders. The Senator will be entitled to the floor at the hour of one o'clock on the question to print.

Mr. BELL. Then I have no objection.

The bill (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga college, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that there is no written report. It is a bill to incorporate a college, and it is drawn up in the usual form, with all the guards around it that are common to such measures. They have a common seal; they are prohibited from issuing notes or scrip as a currency, and the bill contains the individual liability clause.

Mr. HALE. I confess I am unwilling to see the bill pass. I do not know but I am superstitious about it; but I have a different idea of a college from some gentlemen. I recollect meeting a friend out West, and I was inquiring about a young man whom I used to know, who was engaged as a teacher. The friend said he had been doing very well; he had bought a farm with a college on it, and was carrying on the business. [Laughter.] We have but one college in New Hampshire, and that was incorporated before the Revolution, and is an institution of some considerable merit. I think this matter of making colleges has been carried to a very great and ridiculous extent. I have looked over the American Almanac, and I saw, I think, some forty or fifty colleges in the United States without a professor or a student; and I am opposed to increasing them. I wish the bill to lie over, if there is no objection.

Mr. BROWN. I will say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the object of incorporating this college in Washington by those who are at the head of the college in Georgetown, is this: that there are large numbers of boys here who would go from the houses of their parents to a college in Washington who cannot go so far as Georgetown college, and hence there is a necessity for boarding them. This the proprietors, owners, trustees, or faculty of that college think they can avoid by simply establishing a college here. They have the means of doing it. They ask for no assistance from the Government in any shape or form. They simply ask us to give them a corporate name, with the usual franchise belonging to colleges, and then they agree that you may alter, repeal, or amend their charter at pleasure. The bill makes every man connected with it liable for all its debts. It prohibits the issuance of any scrip, and throws around it all the guards that Congress has ever thought proper to impose in matters of this sort.

I disagree with my friend from New Hampshire as to the impropriety of multiplying the number of colleges. I wish, instead of thirty-eight or forty, as the Senator finds in the American Almanac, that we had five hundred and thirty-eight. If they have the name of colleges, and yet are nothing more than high schools, I do not, for the life of me, see that there is any harm in it. Suppose you call this Gonzaga college, and it does not rise above the dignity of an ordinary high school: certainly it is not going to do any harm. It grants degrees of Master of Arts and Bachelor of Arts; but, I take it, a man, when he gets out into the world, will be neither greater nor less on account of having graduated at this college. I hope the bill will be allowed to pass without any amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Secretary be good enough to read the clause limiting the amount of property that may be held by this corporation?

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

A bill to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the City of Washington and District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Burcard Viliager, Charles H. Stonestreet, Daniel Lynch, Edward X. Hand, and Charles Jenkins, and their successors, be, and they are hereby, made a body-politic and corporate forever, by the name of the President and Directors of Gonzaga College, for purposes of charity and education; and by that name may sue and be sued, prosecute and defend; may have and use a common seal, and the same alter and renew at pleasure; may adopt rules, regulations, and by-laws, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, for properly conducting the affairs of said corporation; may take, receive, purchase, and hold estate, real, personal, and mixed, not exceeding in value the sum of $500,000 at any one time, and may manage and dispose of the same at pleasure, and apply the same, or the proceeds of the sales thereof, to the uses and purposes of the said corporation, according to the rules and regulations which now are, or may hereafter be, established.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall have and enjoy the power and faculty to confer and confirm upon such pupils in the institution, or others, who, by their proficiency in learning or other meritorious distinctions they shall think entitled to them, such degrees in the liberal arts and sciences as are usually granted in colleges.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors of Georgetown College be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to convey to the said president and directors of Gonzaga College, and their successors forever, who are hereby authorized and empowered to receive the same, such lands and property, and such estate, real, personal, or mixed, as the said president and directors of Georgetown College may receive, or may have received, for the use or benefit of said president and directors of Gonzaga College.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize this said corporation to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt, to be used as a currency.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each of the corporations in said corporation shall be held liable, in his individual capacity, for all the debts and liabilities of said corporation, however contracted or incurred, to be recovered by suit, as other debts or liabilities, before any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal the foregoing act.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the word "college," and insert "academy."

Mr. BROWN. An academy could hardly confer degrees.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. My attention was turned to the same subject to which the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island was directed when he inquired in regard to the amount of property which might be held by the corporation. I notice that the amount they may receive at any one time is restricted to the sum of $500,000; but there is no restriction in regard to the amount which the corporation may finally hold. It strikes me that there had better be a restriction in regard to the amount which the corporation may lawfully hold. I see no particular necessity for restricting the amount which they may receive at any one time; but if there be any such a necessity, there certainly ought to be a restriction as to the gross amount.

Mr. BROWN. That I understand to be the restriction now; but if the Senator will suggest any amendment to make it more certain, I have no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I was about to inquire of the chairman of the committee if that was the meaning, when the Senator from Rhode Island asked for the reading of that clause.

Mr. ALLEN. I think there may be a doubt on that point, and the section ought to be amended so as to limit the amount which may be held.

Mr. BROWN. I think the bill in its present form accomplishes the object of Senators. If there be no suggestion of an amendment, I hope the bill will be passed at once.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, for the purpose of then moving to make it a special order.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time.

Mr. GREEN. I move that it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, if it meets general approbation. [Say Monday.] My object is, to get the question out of the way, for it impedes the progress of all other subjects. It will be discussed for some considerable time, and everybody will have a fair opportunity to discuss it before final action.

Mr. SEWARD. My vote on that motion will depend somewhat on what we can ascertain as to the probable course of debate. I beg leave to ask, if the Senator has no objection, whether he intends to take the floor, as I suppose is his right, at the time appointed, and whether there is any understanding that the members of the committee are to go on with the debate, or whether it will devolve on somebody else. I want to speak on this question on such a day as I can consistently with the rights of the members of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. GREEN. In reply to the Senator's question, I can inform him that, so far as I am concerned, I shall desire to do nothing but to make a little statement, reserving my right to answer whatever may be said against the principles of the report. I believe the majority of the committee have no desire to push themselves forward in the debate, hastily, at any time. Of course they reserve their right to be heard during the progress of the debate. What the minority may desire to do, I am not able to say. The friends of the measure generally are not disposed to prevent a fair hearing on all sides, so far as the Senate may desire, and will not undertake to crowd it through, unless a factious opposition be set up, which we do not apprehend.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to make a remark on another point. I have observed, in a very large number of newspapers, of various political complexions, that have come to me within the last few days, that during the ten days I was confined to my house in consequence of illness, reports went out from here in which it was stated that it was believed a caucus of Democratic Senators had formally read out of the party my friend from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] my friend from California, [Mr. BRODERICK,] and myself. I rise for the purpose of asking my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALLEN,] who was the president of that caucus, whether there is any truth in those statements?

Mr. ALLEN. I was the presiding officer of that caucus; but I heard nothing of reading out any member of the Democratic party from that caucus.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I supposed such was the case, and yet I thought it was proper to call on the chairman of the caucus to make this statement, as I was absent and had no means of knowing what was done, except on the informal inquiries I have made, to which I received the same answer. I will take occasion to remark, that during the fourteen years I have been here, no caucus has ever yet been held by which the right was claimed to make any measure a party measure. It was not done on the Nebraska bill; it never has been done on any other bill. I understand it has not been done on this Leecompton question. The friends of the Nebraska bill met—men of all parties; and the opponents of the Nebraska bill met—men of all parties. The friends of the Leecompton constitution may meet, and its opponents also; but no party caucus has ever yet taken jurisdiction of a measure to declare it a party measure, much less have they undertaken to read anybody out of a party for differing from them.

Mr. IVERSON. At the suggestion of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] I will take occasion to make a response to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois; and it is proper I should do so, inasmuch as the only action of that caucus was on a resolution which I offered.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will take the liberty with my colleague, which I do in the kindest manner possible, and probably I would not have done it to any other Senator; but I can take the liberty with my colleague on account of our relations, to object to these explanations in the Senate of what took place in caucus. I hope my colleague will let it drop. I say it in the kindest spirit. Those gentlemen who choose to bring it forward here may do so.

Mr. IVERSON. My only object was to disabuse the mind of the Senator from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must rule that these explanations are not in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust the Senator from Georgia may be permitted to make his statement. It is informal, but I trust there will be no objection to it. As he says he offered the resolution, I think it is proper he should now have an opportunity of explaining.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not arrest the remarks which have been made, though they were none of them strictly in order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall renew the objection. I do not think this is in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to push this question any further. It has gone far enough. I understand the resolution which was offered was to the effect that it was conceded on all hands that the caucus disclaimed such right, intention, or power.

Mr. GREEN. I wish, in further response to the interrogatory of the Senator from New York, to remark that, on consultation with one of the minority of the committee, I shall waive my right to make any opening remarks at all, but let the debate go on and take its fullest range.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that, by the ordinary usage of the Senate, the gentleman who presents the report of the committee has the privilege, and it is expected of him generally, that he should open the debate, that we may be possessed of the views he proposes to present, and the arguments which he calculates to rely upon in support of his position. It is also his privilege to close the debate. We understand that; but we understand generally in law, and certainly in propriety, that if a gentleman waives his opening, he waives his close. If that is understood, it is all very well.

Mr. GREEN. That is not understood.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then I understand the gentleman means to close, though he does not mean to make an opening. According to that view, the gentleman is distinctly to understand that I must close upon his closing; for it is the only time I shall have to answer. I take it, there can be no objection to that.

Mr. GREEN. Under ordinary circumstances it might be insisted on with a little more pertinacity that I should open the debate on this matter; but I have made one elaborate speech on this subject, I have made my report; and I shall not, in my remarks, deviate from the principles and from the facts as therein set forth. My object will be to vindicate them as assailed and attacked, not to restate principles, positions, and facts that I have heretofore stated. He can reply to that, and then I will respond, if I see proper to do so.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is my privilege, also, to have made a report, in which I have stated my views, in common with my associate on the committee who agreed with me in opinion, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE;] but I do not consider that that in any way precludes me from enlarging upon those views, nor does it relieve me from the duty, perhaps, of elaborating and sustaining them. So it is with the Senator from Missouri; but the view I have is very obvious from general usage.

Mr. GREEN. I am willing to do it, or to waive it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not mean to urge the gentleman to open the case; but I do not wish him to close a debate which he has not opened. I want it distinctly understood that he is not to close it if he does not open it. If that is understood, it is all very well.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator desires me to open it, he shall be gratified. I supposed I was gratifying them by waiving my right to open; but if it is insisted upon, he shall be gratified to his heart's content.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have distinctly stated, and I now restate, as the gentleman does not choose to understand me, that I do not request him to open it, but I request that, if he will not open, he will not close it.

Mr. GREEN. I do not think he need have so much apprehension about my ability in closing.

Mr. HALE. Before the question is taken, as I feel a little responsibility about the Army bill, I wish to know what is the intention as to that? Is this subject to supersede it?

Mr. IVERSON. I take this occasion to say what I desired to say, and should have said some time during the progress of the morning, that, as soon as the personal discussion between the two Senators from Tennessee shall have ended, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Army bill, with a view to press it as rapidly as possible to a conclusion. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is so unwell that he will not be able to be here for some days, perhaps a week or ten days. It is useless, therefore, to keep the Army bill back in consequence of his indisposition, and we ought to get rid of it as soon as possible. I shall endeavor to press the Army bill to-day, and, if it is possible, to get a vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the motion now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the bill for the admission of Kansas be made the special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. We may have the Army bill before us, and the present day is mortgaged. I would suggest the day after to-morrow, or Monday.

Several SENATORS. Say Friday.

Mr. GREEN. Well, Friday will do. I move to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the motion by striking out Friday and inserting Monday. To-day is undoubtedly to be occupied, and the Army bill cannot be disposed of very soon. ["No, No!"] I withdraw the motion with the understanding that the Army bill is to be first disposed of.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is a matter of accommodation with gentlemen to fix the time when it can be taken up. Putting it for to-morrow, or the next day, leaves the matter in perfect uncertainty. Those of us who feel it to be our duty to participate in the debate, perhaps early, should like to know what is the certainty. If you say Monday we shall know that there is something certain.

Mr. TOOMBS. Let us take it up on Friday if we can get to it after disposing of the Army bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. But that leaves us in uncertainty as to the time when it will be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to make the bill the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move to amend the motion by saying Monday.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

LA FAYETTE'S LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. SLIDELL. A bill amendatory of an act permitting the relocation of certain land warrants granted to General La Fayette, was postponed yesterday in order to enable the Senator from Ohio to offer an amendment, which I presume will meet with the assent of the Senate. I have no objection to it myself. I move to take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 71) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4 and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette," approved February 26, 1845; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. SLIDELL yesterday, in lines nine, ten, and eleven, to strike out the words "subject to entry at private sale at $1 25 per acre," and insert "not specially reserved;" so that it will read:

"Shall be authorized to relocate the said land warrants on any of the public lands of the United States not specially reserved."

Mr. PUGH. I cannot perfect the bill to answer my idea exactly as I am disinclined to it; but the best I can do is to offer this substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. It is to strike out the words "subject to entry at private sale at the sum of $1 25 per acre," and insert:

Subject to public or private sale, and not reserved in pursuance of any act of Congress for the construction of railroads or other public works, or reserved for military or other special purposes.

Mr. STUART. That will do.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio the meaning of the words "public or private sale." Is it to cause the holder of these warrants to take lands at such prices as they will bring at public sale?

Mr. SLIDELL. The warrant calls for no price. General La Fayette, in 1804, was authorized to enter so many sections of land—I do not remember the exact number—wherever he might think proper. He located one section in the immediate vicinity of New Orleans, on land not surveyed and not claimed by the city. From that property he realized probably two hundred thousand dollars. Other entries were made in Florida; some in Louisiana. There appear to have been adverse outstanding titles, and these entries failed. He then disposed of his right to enter lands to individuals, who entered lands under a law passed in 1845, which proved to have been reserved, because they were live-oak timber lands. Now the privilege is asked by these men, who paid many years ago to General La Fayette probably eight or ten dollars an acre for these warrants, and, for aught I know, a much higher price, that they shall be permitted to enter any lands that are not specially reserved, where there is no price at all, of course. That is the whole amount of the matter.

Mr. POLK. I did not understand the amendment as it was read. What is the meaning of the word "public," as inserted in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STUART. I will say to the Senator that the effect of this amendment is to allow entry on any lands subject to entry at $1 25 per acre, or less; but not to allow entry on lands that are reserved sections in railroad grants, or other grants, or reserved specifically for any other purpose. That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. POLK. But I ask the Senator from Michigan if the land may not be had, at public sale, at a price greater than $1 25?

Mr. STUART. Undoubtedly; but he cannot use those warrants at a public sale.

The amendment offered by Mr. PUGH was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed; was read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTINE BARNARD.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the third reading of the bill to continue a pension to Christine Barnard. It was under consideration on Friday last, and was then postponed on account of objections that were made by the Senator from Ohio and the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who have now kindly waived their objections. I think it will now pass without opposition. As the lady is here, and in great distress, I trust the Senate will indulge me in taking up the bill. The bill is on its third reading.

Mr. CLAY. I must object to the consideration of that bill at this time. I want to say something on it.

Mr. IVERSON. I waive it.

The motion was therefore withdrawn.

TENNESSEE RESOLUTIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to print the resolutions of instruction of the Legislature of Tennessee, which were presented yesterday.

Mr. BELL. I feel under great obligations to the Senate for doing me the favor of adjourning last evening; for when I come to reflect on it, knowing the circumstances and the excitement of the occasion, I think that perhaps I might have demeaned myself in a manner which, at a subsequent time, I should have great reason to regret. As I said yesterday evening, it must be obvious to the whole Senate that the course of my colleague was uncalled for, and was entirely unprovoked by anything I had said.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By the permission of my colleague, I wish to make a single remark in this connection. The introduction of my colleague seems now about making to his speech, and the manner in which he concluded his remarks yesterday evening, and what he said in the commencement of his speech then, have made the impression on my mind that he supposes it was my intention to attack his motives or his private character. I want to state to my colleague, so that we can proceed understandingly, that my intention was to have nothing to do with, and to make no reference to, his motives as a man. My business with him was as a Senator, as an agent of the people, representing a State, and not with his personal integrity or his private character. I am inclined to think that when the gentleman's feelings subside, and he looks over my speech, he will find that there is nothing in it that makes any assault upon his integrity personally, or his private character. I want to comply with the courtesies of the Senate. I have said thus much for the purpose of making this discussion proceed understandingly. My business is not with him in any other character than as a Senator and an agent of the people.

We have many cases of this kind in the history of the British Parliament. I do not pretend to understand much about parliamentary law, but I have tried to make myself familiar with it to that extent which would enable me to conduct myself here with reasonable propriety. On one occasion, Colonel Barré in the British Parliament, declared the conduct of Lord North to be indecent and scandalous, to which Lord North replied with great severity, denouncing it as brutal and invidious. The British Parliament called him to order, and made him observe order. It led to an explanation that Colonel Barré had the right to arraign him as a minister; that he might be arraigned as a minister, and his conduct denounced as indecent and scandalous when it was no attack on his personal integrity or his private character.

It has not been my intention to make use of anything that would impugn the motives of my colleague. It has not even been my intention to make use of language that was disrespectful even in relation to his course as a public man, and a public servant. If I can, I intend to keep myself in the right; I do not intend to be thrown in the wrong; and if, upon examination of my speech, there is anything that impugns the integrity or private character of my colleague, I disclaim it. I have not had time to read it. I did not even visit the reporters last night. I find it here on my table. I have not had time to examine it. I have felt it due to my colleague, seeing that he was laboring under some misapprehensions of this sort from his manner and one or two expressions that escaped him, to say thus much so that we could proceed understandingly hereafter.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am reduced to this alternative, since the remarks which my colleague has now made: either to suppose that he is entirely ignorant of the tenor of his own argument and the language he used, or that he does not understand the import of charges which are made against Senators or persons out of the Senate. Did he not intend to assail my motives and my character as a public man when he said I was influenced by a want of principle (which I hope I am not an example of) not equaled anywhere? Did he not describe me from a long period anterior to this as having looked to the North and shaped my course so as to have the support of the North in my political aspirations, and now and then giving a vote that indicated (I do not remember my colleague's language) that I was holding on to the South with one hand and grasping the North with the other?

Now, sir, I consider that the most offensive and insulting charge that can be made against me or any other member of the Senate. My colleague should look over his speech, and see how far he has gone. He may not be conscious of the length to which he has gone. He deprecated the idea that a Senator should ever get into his head an aspiration for the Presidency; he told us how unfortunate it has been to the country, and how unfortunate it must continue to be. All this was not pointed directly to me, but every gentleman who heard his speech and who will read it will understand that it was pointed at me. If he will disclaim these imputations, I shall accept his explanation of what he meant, and I will even give him time to read over that speech.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am as ready now to make a reply as I shall be at any time.

Mr. BELL. I understood my colleague to say he had not had time to read his speech. If he wants to go on, I should like to call his attention to some other statements in his speech in relation to me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Perhaps it would be better for me to decline saying anything until my colleague gets through with his remarks, and I shall make my reply accordingly.

Mr. BELL. Very well, sir. After all this, I shall not proceed to-day in the manner I intended yesterday evening. I am restrained by respect for myself, to say nothing of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understood that my colleague preferred that I should decline to make an explanation now and take another time.

Mr. BELL. Go on at any time you please; but I shall proceed with some points I wish to notice, without regard to what I considered the offensive remarks of the Senator. I propose to review some of the positions he took in the outset of his speech which will not involve any feeling on either side.

In my observations on the resolutions I presented yesterday morning, I endeavored to show that there had been no disapprobation expressed by the people of Tennessee against my course on the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854, in such a form that I could feel in any degree bound to notice it, and that there had been no such reasonable certainty expressed as to the opinions of that people on the subject. I said that now I considered it very late to bring forward the subject. In his reply to this, my colleague referred, in the first place, to resolutions which he states, and states truly I believe, were pending in the Legislature of Tennessee when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was under consideration. I paid but little attention to those resolutions because I knew that neither the Whig nor Democratic members of that Legislature had considered or contemplated the probable consequences of that measure. Again, from the resolutions quoted by my colleague in his speech, which I now hold in my hand, there is apparent on the face of them the very contest, or something approaching it, which was manifested between the Whigs and Democrats in the Senate of the United States when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was first presented. It is evident that the idea of the Whig members was, that if the Democratic party really meant to force such a measure as that through Congress, they should do it in terms that no man could misunderstand. He has spoken of two resolutions, one of which was voted for by his own friends in the Legislature, the Democratic party, very well expressed. That resolution is:

"Resolved, That the bill now pending before Congress, called the Nebraska bill, the leading principle of which is that Congress has no right to legislate on the subject of slavery, but that the same is an institution over which the people alone, in forming their organic law, have full power and control, meets our cordial approval and is sanctioned clearly by the principles of the bills creating territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah, and we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives to give it their hearty support."

I do not even find the word "instruction" there; but that is of no consequence in my view of the validity of instructions; but what was done by the Whigs in the Legislature? Understanding that the measure was intended to proceed on the principles of the New Mexico and Utah bills; and, at the same time, to furnish the foundation for a contest in Kansas, and also in Nebraska, if there should be any temptation to it there, as to the establishment of a slave State, without repealing the Missouri compromise in express terms, what did the Whigs do? Before they could have any advice, any information, any knowledge of the motives and feelings prevalent here, they urged a resolution of this kind:

"Resolved, That we cordially approve of the amendment proposed by the Hon. Archibald Dixon, of Kentucky, to the bill reported to the Senate of the United States by the Committee on Territories, for the organization and government of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska."

That amendment proposed a direct repeal of the Missouri compromise. This reminds me of a conversation I had with one of my late colleagues in the Senate as to that bill, and the equivocal language in which it was presented, which was unexpected by me altogether; for, though I was a member of the committee, I had not reached Washington in time to attend the first meetings of the committee. He told me he was not willing it should stand in that way; and I agreed with him that, if the intention was to create an agitation on this subject, to make a question before the country for the purpose of uniting the whole South with the Democracy of the North, it should be done openly. The next thing I heard was the introduction of Mr. Dixon's amendment. I do not say that it was dictated by me; but I am speaking of a private conversation, in which I declared that, if the Missouri compromise was to be repealed, it should be done openly and palpably, so that the people of the North and South could see it. But it was not exactly so at the last. I am sorry to allude to, or review the discussions on any one of these points. I have never considered them creditable to our Government, nor creditable to the principle of popular rights and popular sovereignty so much dwelt on yesterday. I do not like the idea of getting up a parcel of words, syllables, and lines of such equivocal and uncertain import in the nature of the worst sort of clap-trap that was ever used in legislation. I did not approve of it then. That is the character of those resolutions introduced into the Legislature during the pendency of that bill. I thought it was perfectly right myself that the party in the ascendancy here should be required to act in such a manner that their action should be understood. I am sorry to talk so much about party. I respect the largest portion of all parties, for the largest portion of the public is honest and patriotic. I dislike to say anything that would seem to characterize one party as less worthy than another; but I never could have conceived, and did not conceive, when the proposition of Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky, was introduced in the Senate, that it would be embraced by the honorable Senator who had charge of that bill.

Let me do him the justice to say, not from my direct personal knowledge, but from circumstances and evidence that are equally satisfactory to me, that the honorable Senator from Illinois was sincere in the course he took finally after he had made a report against the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and depicted its consequences in a manner which was calculated to strike the whole country. He yielded. The Administration you know, sir, pronounced against the measure through its ordinary organ. It was understood that the Administration was decidedly opposed to Mr. Dixon's amendment. He was charged with attempting to stir up all those mischievous and dangerous agitations on the question of slavery, which had before shaken the Union to its center, in 1820 and 1850. Nevertheless, in a few days afterwards the Administration came into the support of the measure, simultaneously, I believe, with the majority of the Senate.

There is nothing, then, in the resolutions of 1854, which can be taken as of binding force. There was the sort of game played there that was attempted here. I did not know the heart of Mr. Dixon, or what his purposes were; but I did not believe at the time the amendment was introduced, that he had any such purpose. I need not go into a detail of how the contest waxed warmer and warmer. Angry debates took place between members who represented the northern feeling and the southern feeling on that subject. A man had to take his position on one side or the other on all questions which arose. There was no opinion among the people of Tennessee, at the time these resolutions were introduced. They were ready to follow their friends and leaders on both sides. It was a question on which they had no assured and confident convictions that the measure was very right or very wrong. They were ready to act, as is usual in such communities, in the South particularly, when anything is presented that looks as if it would add to the strength or security of that institution which they all consider to be one which needs all the guards against the growing power of the North that can be thrown around it. I say nothing of their disposition, but the growing power and preponderance of the population of the North. Every sensible man in the South has those feelings. I have them myself. The people understood that their leaders in Congress, both Democrats and Whigs, were going for the measure, and it would be natural, under such circumstances, to suppose that it must be right.

I now come to the next point my colleague made in opposition to my remarks on the second resolution of the series before us, which expresses the opinion that the people of Tennessee had pronounced against my course in "the recent elections," which I presumed to include the election of 1855. I have my doubts whether they meant to include it or not, but I infer it. The late election would afford them better ground than the presidential election, because everybody knows that Mr. Buchanan carried the State by seven thousand five hundred majority. I doubt whether they meant to include the election of 1855 at all, which came off fifteen months after the passage of the Nebraska bill. How does my colleague attempt to bolster up the idea that that election settled this question? He does not deny that at that time both branches of the Legislature were carried by the party in opposition to the Democratic party in the State, but he says this question was in issue, and he knows it, because he was in the canvass, as the candidate of the Democratic party for Governor. He says that this was one of the main questions in the canvass. I stated the contrary of that yesterday and I state it now, not meaning to impugn his opinion on the subject. I reaffirm that it was not the principal subject of controversy in 1855. I was in Tennessee during a considerable part of that canvass at all events, and know something about it.

The declaration of my colleague on this point is in these words:

"But my honorable colleague spoke of the contest of 1855. He will pardon me for making the allusion, but I was engaged in that contest. I was one of the candidates for Governor. I canvassed the State from the mountains of Johnson county to the Chickasaw Bluffs in Shelby county. I was in nearly every county in the State; and well do I recollect the exciting events that took place during that canvass. I had a competitor who was eloquent, who is known to many members of this House, who was with me on every stump in the State. One of the leading issues in that canvass was the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I pressed my competitor upon it before every audience, and there were scarcely ever such turn-outs in the State as during that canvass. It was one of the main issues between him and me."

I said that Americanism was the main issue, and almost the exclusive issue; for I had a perfect recollection that the canvass was opened on the part of the Americans with the most assured and confident feeling that they would carry the State off by an overwhelming vote. So confident were they, that they asked aid from nobody, I believe, as a general proposition, who did not belong to the order, and had not been regularly initiated. I remember the alarm manifested by the opposite side. I affirm that I was a looker-on in that contest, though not engaged in it. My colleague said this was the main issue between him and his opponent for Governor, and added:

"I pressed him upon it in every single speech I made in the State, and he uniformly declined to take ground."

He uniformly failed to make the issue with him. They had no issue on that subject. He went from Johnson to Shelby with his eloquent opponent, the main issue being the Kansas-Nebraska act, and yet that eloquent gentleman did not open his mouth on the subject! My colleague is a little incautious as to what language he uses, and how he frames and gets up his arguments. He must do it with a little more skill than that, if he wants to succeed in questions of this sort. Speaking of the contest between himself and Colonel Gentry, he said:

"I pressed him upon it in every single speech I made in the State; and he uniformly declined to take ground. He was afraid to take ground against it or for it, as was then believed, for fear that it would injure him in the canvass. He was afraid of coming in conflict with my honorable colleague and others in the State. There was no doubt, in fact, that he harmonized and agreed with the Democratic party on this point; yet he shrank from the responsibility with a view of getting many votes by taking a non-committal course."

My colleague must excuse me if I cannot take his statement on that point. He may speak what is true, but in speaking what is true he contradicts a gentleman as well known for his honor and integrity as any man in the State of Tennessee. Colonel Gentry told me himself that he would have taken the course I did, and all the censure he had to pass on me in relation to it was that I ought to have taken the ball at the first hop. Again, I heard from as honorable a gentleman as anywhere existed that in the very opening of the canvass of 1855, Colonel Gentry did declare in a public speech, at Murfreesboro', I think, that if he had been a member of Congress when that bill was before the body, he would have voted against it. It is incredible to me that he flinched and shrank from the contest during the canvass of 1855 on that point.

This statement is made by my colleague after my declaration that I did not feel called upon, by any opposition made to me throughout the State, to make a single speech or explanation of my course on that bill before the people of Tennessee, during that whole canvass. There were reasons that might have restrained Colonel Gentry from setting forth and explaining to the people the probable mischiefs of that measure, and how wrong it was to disturb this ancient compromise, which had for thirty years been the bond of harmony between the North and South. He might have been restrained by the consideration that two of my respected and honored Whig colleagues in the House of Representatives voted in favor of the bill; and they were still highly esteemed and popular gentlemen, representing two of the largest districts, one adjoining, and one including, my own residence—the town of Nashville. I undertake to say that my lips would have been sealed even if there had been attacks to a great extent on the subject; and wherever I have spoken on the subject since, I have always had to do it with the greatest delicacy and forbearance in regard to the course of my distinguished colleagues in the House. Mr. Zollicoffer and Mr. Ready are the gentlemen to whom I allude; and Mr. Gentry may have been restrained in their districts, or anywhere else in the State, from discussing that question. But my colleague speaks of its being one of the main issues before the people. I take it he did not discuss it alone. If he found that his opponent could not be brought up to the issue, I presume he would employ himself on more profitable topics, as he had a right to do.

I do not know; I cannot speak from personal knowledge; but I have inquired over and over again at home; I have looked for the speeches of my colleague, if he had printed any; I have sought from his leading friends to know what were his principles on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which, he says, in 1855, was one of the principal topics of debate in Tennessee. I never heard from his lips his views on the subject, until I heard him speak yesterday, and the drift of his remarks then can be well understood. He then took a view of the subject that, in 1855, would have been very distasteful, I know, to many of the leading men of his party. I never could trace in any speech or any letter of his, nor could I hear from any respectable gentleman with whom I associated, or in the Whig ranks, that he had taken ground in favor of that bill, except in his usual course of declamation in behalf of the fundamental right of the people always to govern themselves, and to ride down and overslaugh all who should pretend to smother their voice, and level all who should have any pretensions as "aristocrats"—"slaveholding aristocrats." In that way he may, perhaps, have sanctioned the bill. I do not deny that he discussed that subject sometimes by himself. He must have done it alone, according to what he says in his speech yesterday, for Mr. Gentry does not seem to have met him on that question, and made no discussion about it. When I wanted to know last year what had been the course of my colleague on the subject, I found a speech of his, made in the canvass of 1856, in the presidential election—a speech written by himself, I understood, and said to have been delivered at a public meeting in Broad street, Nashville. My colleague will understand me that as to what he said on that occasion I have nothing to say, except on the information of others, for I was not there. I was directed to his printed speech by a friend, when I desired to see what Governor Johnson's course had been, because Governor Johnson has a potent influence in Tennessee, even if you have not heard of him before, and in his own party particularly. He controls his party on many questions. If their opinions and views do not correspond with his generally, he lets them understand that they shall conform to his views. This is magnifying him greatly; but not unduly.

Looking over that speech I found that his own doctrine about popular sovereignty was partly limited to a State coming into the Government, and he partly relied on the fundamental principle of the people having a right to do as they pleased; but in the very next sentence he quoted a clause from Mr. Buchanan's letter of acceptance, or some letter he had written connected with this subject, which recognized the broad principle of popular sovereignty and the right of the people to govern themselves, independent not only of Congress, but of all other authorities, on the great principle that has been heralded forth as the discovery of this very recent age. They say it is as old as the Revolution, the right of self-government existing in the people at all times, which the President has ratified and confirmed by his recent message, in which he says that no restrictions, no trammels, no fetters, can be imposed even by an organic act or constitution of a State which they cannot override whenever they please by amendment or abrogation.

When I pointed to my friends the result of my labors, on looking over that strongly written and plausible speech, I said to them, this does not furnish me the information. I had been told that squatter sovereignty and popular sovereignty was his hobby. They said, "Well, then, that speech is not written out in conformity with what he said at a large public meeting at a certain time on Broad street." I asked them if they could be satisfied of that in any way. They replied, that probably hundreds could testify, if I felt any interest in prosecuting the subject, that he illustrated the doctrine of the right of the people before they came into the Union, and while in the condition of a Territory—the doctrine of popular or squatter sovereignty—by asking, "Does a man that squats down have any less right of self-government and sovereignty than when he is erect and standing up?"

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By permission of my honorable colleague, I will say that he seems to be predicating a position from which, I presume, he expects to draw some conclusions, on a conversation that he had had with some individuals, either Democrats or somebody else, in reference to a speech I made at Nashville. My views as delivered at that meeting are published and printed in that speech, and I am responsible for them as there. I would prefer my colleague to make a quotation from the speech, and not a quotation from his memory of what somebody said about it. It is very easy, we all know, for persons on both sides to misrepresent a speech. Sometimes one understands it one way, and sometimes another. A sentence is quoted, and a particular expression is left out. My speech was published in that same community, and circulated by thousands. For that speech I am responsible.

Mr. BELL. I understand, then, that speech was a retraxit of any former opinions he had, if he had any such former opinions. I mean it was a withdrawal, a change of opinion from any he had entertained in the canvass of 1855.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. That speech contained the opinions I expressed that night, written out and published—no withdrawal, no alteration.

Mr. BELL. I will not on such an occasion ask my colleague—I have no right to ask—whether he did not explain that the great principle of the right of the people to govern themselves, and settle their own domestic institutions, applied to their condition while a Territory as well as when they should be a State. Did he not put it in this form: whether, when they were squatting down, they had any less power than when they were standing up? But I will not ask him that.

I do not wish to hold up my colleague for this; but I allude to it for the purpose of asking what right he has to arraign any Senator's course on this subject, and with this view I have alluded, and shall allude to his course. I have understood, since the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, that he concurred, in regard to it, with my respected colleague in the House of Representatives, GEORGE W. JONES, the most honest Democrat I think I ever knew. I do not concur with him at all in his views, but he does honor to his kind by the uniform consistency of his course. I do not think his principles are of a very enlarged character in reference to the operations of this Government, and the great questions of public policy involved in its administration; but, nevertheless, in my opinion, the views which he holds, he holds conscientiously. I will not say what he has stated to me, but I will say what he is understood to avow, and to have the boldness to avow everywhere—that he was against the whole Kansas-Nebraska bill, except for that one feature of squatter sovereignty; that whatever others might say about it, and however much they might deride it, that, and that alone, could induce him to give a vote for such a bill as that repealing the Missouri compromise. I have understood that my colleague agreed with our mutual colleague now in the House of Representatives on that subject. If I have misstated what his doctrine was, I have done him injustice, and shall be ready to correct it.

Here let me remark that in the canvass of 1856, the people of the State of Tennessee began to have some idea of the true bearings and tendencies of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and not before. I mean that they had not before a full and adequate idea of them. The majority of the people who favored that bill in Tennessee, gave their support to it on the ground that the people of a Territory, while in the territorial state, were powerless as to the question of slavery; and that it was only when they came to form a State constitution that they had the right of sovereignty to exclude it; and therefore, I suppose it is, that my colleague, in 1856, not thinking proper to break his head against what appeared to be something like a stone wall, rather modified his principle. I infer that, and I think, under all the circumstances, I have a right to speak a little by conjecture in relation to the motives of his course. Mind you, sir, I am not imputing it to corrupt motives. There was a powerful reason why, at that particular time, it should be understood that his opinions were in conformity with the general views of his party in relation to the construction of that act. Great difficulties had arisen in Kansas, and the question debated was, whether the people of a Territory, while in the territorial condition, could exclude slavery. On this point there was a difference of opinion manifested in the Senate between the friends of that bill. But I have not time now to dwell on that subject, and I shall not comment upon it.

I have spoken of the election of 1855, and I have asserted that Americanism was the main, and almost exclusive, ground of that contest. It was just such a question as was pending in the State of Virginia at the time Mr. Wise took the field in opposition to the American party, and they acted so foolishly as to let him traverse the State without a competitor to meet him. A similar contest was going on in Tennessee, and that State was counted on as certain for the Americans by a large majority. They could tell, as they said, and I believe it is the fact, the number they had in their councils. I think it was upward of one hundred thousand, and no person doubted the election of Colonel Gentry, when he became a candidate. Colonel Gentry, however, with all his powers of debate, and all his eloquence, had not the strength in that contest which it might be supposed such a man would possess, and which, in previous political contests, he himself had possessed. He had voted for General Pierce against General Scott in the preceding presidential election, and that withdrew from him the support of a great number of the old Whigs, and he was weakened by that. I reaffirm what I stated yesterday, without going over all the details, that the State of Tennessee did not declare against me in that election.

I ought to state another fact in this connection. Before I left Washington in the spring of 1855, I stated to all who inquired what my course would be, that I would vote for the American ticket. Several old Whigs consulted me, by letter and personally, and I said, "We had better support the American party. Although its platform is too exclusive for the success of a great national party, yet it may contain a germ from which we can ultimately develop a great national party." I advised my friends to support it on that principle. I recollect now, when I think on the subject, that the present Postmaster General, during the canvass of 1855, either in a speech or a pamphlet which he published, attempted to make capital out of the fact that I did not belong to the American party—that I had not gone into its councils and taken its oaths. I was cited as an example of the course of experienced public men in reference to that party. Near the close of the canvass in Sumner county—my colleague well knows where that was—an attempt was made, I think by the Postmaster General, to state that I would not support the American party; or if he did not say it, some other public speaker did. A gentleman who was present, and who had seen me within a few days, declared that he could state to the contrary; and "that although Mr. Bell was not a member of the party, he would support its ticket." You may judge, sir, from this whether there was any war upon me during that canvass as to my vote on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, or any excitement or great interest on that subject. The interest which the Democratic party felt at that time was to put down Americanism, which seemed to threaten to overwhelm them in that section.

The next point which I shall notice is the citation by my colleague of the Cincinnati platform to show the grounds on which he will support the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; or perhaps he quoted it for the purpose of showing that no enabling act on the part of Congress was necessary prior to the admission of a State. I do not allude to this in reference to the tenor of his address to the Senate so much as to show the principle to the support of which my colleague is driven by party considerations. He quotes a resolution of the Democratic platform, from the first part of which it would seem that it acknowledges full power in the people of a Territory to control this subject, but then in the latter part of it comes the limitation "whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it." The Cincinnati platform is an indorsement of the popular-sovereignty feature of the Kansas-Nebraska bill when a Territory contains a sufficient number of inhabitants to form a State.

I allude to that for the purpose of showing what is the evil of these controversies that now beset us. They engender new, before unheard of, disorganizing, anarchical doctrines. Here is the Democratic platform referred to as making constitutional law for the Democratic party, or as having the force and effect of constitutional law. This was referred to for the purpose of showing that Kansas had a right to admission into the Union under that platform without any enabling act from Congress whenever she had a sufficient number of inhabitants to justify it. My colleague says the people must first make a State, and then it is for Congress to say whether it shall be admitted or not. I shall not, however, comment on that point.

My colleague comes next to speak of the complaints which he supposes I made of the injustice of the Legislature of Tennessee, in regard to the extracts taken from one of my speeches in 1854, and which I said were garbled. I did not allude to this in any spirit of complaint toward the Legislature. These acts were incorporated in the resolutions, and are printed in them, and yet my colleague took the pains to read them verbatim; and then he said "these are no garbled extracts; they carry their context with them; they are taken verbatim from his own speech, which he is presumed to have read and revised, and printed in pamphlet form and circulated over the country." I did suppose that my colleague, who has studied so profoundly the principles on which all Governments must stand, the philosophy of government as well as the philosophy of slavery, would understand that an extract from a speech may well be objected to as a garbled extract when it leaves out the context remaining in the speech which is not quoted or referred to. I never said that these extracts were not taken verbatim et literatim from my published speech; but that they misrepresented what I said in the Senate. I said they were garbled because the preamble did not refer to other passages in my speech which would explain the meaning of the circumstances which I would require before I would consider such a question to have been decided against me by the people, and that was after they should come to understand the principles and objects of that bill, and see its consequences.

My colleague asks what time do I want? I said in my first remarks that the first election which took place in Tennessee was fifteen months after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and then they did not debate against me. He says they did, according to his construction of the result, and they decided against me again in 1856 and 1857, and he says that this is surely time enough for the people to understand the question. I beg leave to say that it is understood only to a very limited extent, indeed. In the resolutions introduced into the Legislature in 1854 the idea of restoring the status of the Territory to what it was under the treaty with France before the passage of the Missouri compromise, was one of the grounds on which they predicated their course. He might have stated still further that many of the members here, some Whigs from the South of whom I have a knowledge, vindicated their course before that bill passed, on the ground that it was a blotting out of the charge of a breach of national faith which the world might bring against the Congress of the United States under an article of the treaty with France by which the Territory was acquired.

In this respect I cannot say that I was surprised, because I know that these discussions proceed generally upon party grounds and party interests, and the people vote on the one side or the other, according to the party to which they belong. The question was not considered so vital to them that it was important that they should construe and criticize nicely the provisions of the bill. I asked a gentleman very high in position, a lawyer who takes an interest in all questions of this kind, and who has taken an active interest in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, if he was certain that he understood all its provisions, and whether his friends did. He inquired of me to what points my inquiry was specially directed? I asked him if he understood what was the effect of the Badger proviso, for example? He did not remember it by that name, and had never heard of it. I pointed out to him what it was, and showed that, after all, there was direct and positive intervention by Congress in the passage of that bill. You did not leave Kansas Territory as you had left New Mexico and Utah, subject to the local law then existing, and the effect that law might have under the treaty in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States; but by the Kansas-Nebraska act you removed the status, which was a slavery one, that existed in that Territory before the passage of that bill. He said his attention had never been turned to it, and he had never heard it suggested in any of the debates on the subject. In my own intercourse with the people, I have yet to find the first man who understood that question properly. It may have been talked about from the stump, but it was not understood generally. I do not mean to say that the people have not intelligence; I do not mean to say that the large portion of them are not reading people and thinking people; but I say the fact is as I have stated; and it is so because they generally follow the lead of the leaders of their party, and vote with them. I undertake to say that at this day, there are not five hundred men in Tennessee who understand that bill perfectly, particularly in relation to that point and the dispute between the North and the South as to its proper construction—whether the people can decide the slavery question for themselves in the territorial condition, or whether they can only do it when they come to form a State. We can hardly expect that that subject will be viewed by the North and the South in the same light. Probably the decision of the Supreme Court alone can bring them together, if indeed, the North recognizes the authority of that decision. That may reconcile them, but nothing else can. I am sure that up to last year the people of Tennessee did not understand whether the measure was to be viewed as giving to the people of Kansas, while under territorial government, a right to decide the question, or whether they could do it only when they come to form a State constitution.

But my colleague has arraigned me as having been prepared, at all times, to make concessions to the North. He has spoken of me, and he has made allusions to me, and directed at me, as if I had, from an early period in my career in Congress, fixed my eye on the Presidency, and adopted a policy which was calculated to conciliate the North. He has referred to my public acts, and speeches, and votes, for the purpose of sustaining him in the position that I have been at all times ready to make concessions to the North with the motive which I have indicated.

Mr. President, I have seen it stated somewhere, and I regard it as the greatest compliment which has ever been paid to me as a public man, that I was constitutionally conservative; that this feeling was ingrained in my very nature. From the time I was old enough to form some opinion or judgment of my own, as to the probable duration of this great Union, I saw, or thought I saw, that the question of slavery coming to be concentrated or localized in a section in the South, having no existence in the North, was the greatest peril to which it was exposed. My whole policy in relation to that subject has been to keep down unnecessary agitation, to dry up its sources, to make no false or imprudent issues on the subject, to take no indiscreet steps to precipitate a contest between the North and the South, or even a hostile collision of sentiment. The question on the reception of abolition petitions came up in Congress when I was quite young, and when it would hardly be expected that I could have those aspirations to which my colleague alluded, at so early a period in my public life, when there was such a vast host marching far in advance of me. This was at a period when it cannot fairly be presumed that anybody of my age could have any pretensions to the highest honors in this country. I feel myself called upon to review, somewhat, my course in reference to the charges of my colleague, made yesterday.

I was called upon to act on the question of the proper reception and disposition to be made of the petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which began to come in rapidly upon us as the emancipation policy seemed to advance and approximate to its consummation in England. It was an off-shoot from abolition societies in England. When these petitions were first presented they did not attract much attention; but by-and-by they multiplied to such a degree as to attract notice. The unanimous course of the southern delegation, taken without much consideration or reflection, was to vote against the reception of such petitions, considering the subject to be one on which Congress had not the power to act. I gave one or two, or it may be three, votes against the reception of these petitions, with other southern men. In a year or two I found that this course on the part of southern members tended to multiply the numbers, the power, and the influence of the abolition societies of the North. Then, speaking only to my colleagues, the Representatives of my own State, I pointed out to them the mischievous tendency of making a question on the right of petition—an old, traditional, and popular right, which I thought it dangerous to interfere with, particularly when it could do no possible harm to receive those petitions, refer them to a committee, and have a report on them at the end of each session. I thought there was no danger, at that period, but that a report would uniformly be made against them.

Mr. Adams, at the time of which I speak, was chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia. He contested strongly for the right of petition; and from his looks and his manner and the spirit he manifested, it was evident that he would be chopped into mince pieces before he would surrender that right. At that very time he told me privately that if those petitions were sent to him he should report against them, not on the ground that he did not think Congress had power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, but because he would consider its abolition as a breach of the good faith which was pledged by the North when this District was selected as the seat of Government, surrounded by two large slaveholding States. I had taken my course before that time, and as the question progressed in heat I became more deeply interested in it. I saw the mischief it was doing. We were warned by the North that we were giving a strength to the Abolitionists which it was not possible for them ever to attain of themselves. We were warned that they were gaining strength by urging on the people that the South would not even hear petitions on the subject. So strong were my convictions on this point, that in 1839-40, in the presidential canvass between Mr. Van Buren and General Harrison, when my own friends in my section of the country wished to take decided ground against Mr. Van Buren on account of his anti-slavery tendencies and propensities, as evinced by his vote in the New York Legislature, to instruct the Senators from that State to vote against the admission of Missouri, and other acts of his, I took this ground distinctly: this is a delicate question; here is a great national contest; the parties are both national; you see what has been the effect of the rejection of abolition petitions up to this time; it has been to give a strength to the Abolitionists of the North which they never could have, otherwise attained; we ought to suppress the agitation in all cases where, from party considerations, there is any inducement whatever to bring it to bear on the elections; and I held aloof. I told them that they must excuse me on that ground; I was conscientious in relation to it, and while I would not oppose this course on their part if they thought proper to pursue it, I could not cooperate with them in it. That was a period long anterior to the present, but not so far back as when the question first arose in the House of Representatives.

When I commenced voting for the reception of abolition petitions, I was assailed at home on the same grounds, in substance, which were urged by my colleague yesterday. I was charged with being an Abolitionist; but when I came before the people I never had occasion to make more than two or three speeches in vindication of my course. To be sure, I had not the whole State to canvass, but I was sustained by the people of my district. During the whole period of our contests in Tennessee, the Democracy have denounced the Whig party as Federalists, as aristocrats, as monarchists in principle. They have held themselves up as being the missionaries of freedom throughout the world, as friends of the extension of the area of freedom, as friends of mankind; and they assailed me as an Abolitionist because I voted to receive abolition petitions on the ground that by their policy they had created Abolitionists by thousands every year they had persisted in it. I went before the people on that issue and I never had occasion to make more than two or three speeches upon it. After that time I never heard of it in my State—certainly I never heard of it in my district, nor when I canvassed the State as I have done twice, I believe, as elector.

I dislike to detain the Senate on such a matter as this; but the assault which has been made on me by my colleague, I think justifies me in pursuing the subject further, and I mean to do it with the indulgence of the Senate. I have before me a letter written by myself in the contest between Van Buren and Harrison, in 1840. I do not know the date of the letter, but it was published in the Intelligencer of the 8th of August, 1840. The letter was in defense of General Harrison against whom a prejudice was attempted to be raised in the South. Here let me say that no greater patriot, no greater friend of the Union of these States, and no greater friend, on just principles, to the protection of slavery ever lived in this country than that gallant old hero. This letter was addressed to the Hon. George R. Gilmore of Georgia, an old and intimate political, and, I flatter myself, a personal friend, with whom I was associated for many years in the House of Representatives; and I believe he is yet living, a respected and venerable citizen of Georgia. I beg leave to read a few paragraphs from this letter, and if it were not too great a tax on the Senate, I think in these times it would not be unprofitable to read the whole of it, because I claim it to be prophetic to a great extent. In that letter, I declared:

"The deliberate and persevering obstinacy with which the supporters of the Administration, in the slave States, persist in making Abolition one of the issues between the two great parties which now divide the country, I consider wicked and mischievous in the highest degree. That all the apprehensions of an accession of strength to the abolition movement in the event of Whig success, and the consequent alarms for the safety of the South, so incessantly proclaimed by the partisans of Mr. Van Buren in that section, are utterly groundless; no careful observer of the circumstances of the times, and of the state of the abolition question, can for a moment doubt. If any guarantee for the security of southern institutions were wanting, in addition to those of the well-known feelings and opinions of General Harrison, and the great body of his northern supporters, it can be provided in the decided, generous, and united support which the whole South and Southwest may accord to his pretensions. If there is one gentleman in the South who really feels the alarm he professes, he will perceive that the only safety, in the present aspect of parties, is for the slave States to rally as one man upon General Harrison. Such a manifestation of confidence in the great Whig majority in the North and East, could not fail to increase the existing good feelings among them towards their southern brethren; while the ties of party associations and interests would be superadded to those of constitutional obligation in sustaining southern rights. But what ought to be the measure of indignation and punishment which should be dealt out to those hollow and false guardians of southern interests, who will, for the sake of a trifling party advantage, put everything to hazard by perpetual agitation?"

Of course I meant this to apply to nobody now in public life:

"For there is, and always has been, quite as much to be apprehended on this subject from those who agitate the question on political account in the South, as from the Abolitionists themselves.

"I have been a member of Congress, as you know, from the commencement of the agitation upon this subject. I have witnessed all that has taken place in Congress in relation to it. I saw, and I think I fully understood the game that was playing by some gentlemen, but I was not inclined to take part in it, because I thought the stakes too high."

I meant that I had no desire to take part in it as a party man. The stakes were too high—the Union, and the interests bound up with the Union.

"It was the common impression that the first movements of the Abolitionists at the North were not looked upon with any deep regret by a portion of our fellow-citizens at the South."

I have the evidence to prove it.

"Their fanatic spirit was rather provoked than deprecated. The North, without distinction, was freely charged with a settled feeling of hostility to southern interests and institutions; and many injurious reflections were cast upon their motives calculated to give strength to the cause of the fanatics, by uniting with them a more rational and calculating class of the northern people. The motive to this policy in the South, to whatever extent it was adopted, was, beyond all doubt, to combine the South and Southwest more closely in their political movements and preferences. I then thought the experiment a dangerous one, regarding it in a political view only; for it struck me that if the ambitious aspirants of the North should take it into their heads to play the same sort of game in retaliation, the South would soon be thrown into a settled minority, and forthwith deprived of political power. Nothing, in that event, would be left for them but unconditional submission or disunion."

I do not charge my colleague with having, by the course of argument he has thought proper to pursue in relation to me, entertained any such views as I charged then existed at the South—the views of goading, and insulting, and denouncing the people of the North in a body as Abolitionists. I never considered this as likely to result in anything else than the greatest mischief and perhaps most unfortunate catastrophe that could befall the country. In this letter I go on to quote the sentiments of some gentlemen on the subject, at that period:

"In confirmation of what I have written upon this point, permit me to refer you to a debate in the Senate of the United States, in 1836, which may have escaped your recollection. I desire your attention particularly to the evidence to be found in that debate, that there was then a strong conviction at the North of the existence of some sinister management in the South connected with this subject. I will first quote a few passages from the speech of the Hon. Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire, the reputed author of the address put forth by the late Baltimore convention, and circulated extensively in the extra Globe:

"Now, sir, as much as I abhor the doings of weak or wicked men, who are moving this abolition question at the North, I yet have not as bad an opinion of them as I have of some others who are attempting to make of these puerile proceedings an object of alarm to the whole South.

"Of all the vehicles, tracts, pamphlets, and newspapers printed and circulated by the Abolitionists, there are no ten or twenty of them who have contributed so much to the excitement as a single newspaper printed in this city. I need not name this paper, when I inform you that for the last five years it has been laboring to produce a northern and southern party; to fan the flame of sectional prejudices; to open wider the breach; to drive harder the wedge which shall divide the North from the South.

"It is the newspaper which libels the whole North by representing the almost united people of that region to be insincere in their efforts to prevent the mischief of a few fanatical and misguided persons who are engaged in the abolition cause."

Then I quote Mr. Niles's authority, quite as strong as Mr. Hill's, and perhaps stronger, and add:

"My opinion was, that, whether the petitioners had strict right on their side or not, sound policy dictated the reception and reference of their petitions. I believed that any unusual course in regard to them would give undue importance to the movements of the Abolitionists, furnish new ground for agitation, and rather increase the existing excitement than allay it. In my opinion, a report from a committee at each session—temperate, yet firm, and unqualified in its conclusion—would have been well calculated to correct false impressions at the North; to dispel prejudices, and prevent that ferment and angry feeling at the South which, at that stage of the question, was calculated to do mischief. Whether right or wrong, and without pretending to censure those friends who differed from me, I have uniformly held these opinions; yet I will add, that few gentlemen in the South would be more prepared for prompt and decisive measures of resistance and protection, should the rights and interests of the South connected with this subject ever be invaded through Congress, or otherwise, than myself.

"This question was very fully discussed in the Senate in 1836. I will extract a few passages, relating to this point, from the speeches of several gentlemen of the Administration party, who took part in that debate. I will first present you with a short extract from the speech of the Hon. Isaac Hill, whose opinions have already been referred to on another point:

"Deny (said Mr. Hill) the right of petition to the misguided men and women who are induced, from no bad motive, to petition for the abolition of slavery in the District, and you do more to increase their numbers than will thousands of dollars paid to the emissaries who traverse the country to distribute abolition tracts, and to spread abolition doctrines."

"I will next request your attention to the sentiment of the Hon. Mr. Wall, Senator from New Jersey:

"Sir, we all, North and South, abhor Abolitionism and incendiarism. But what is it? It is the criminating the religion of peace with the blood of our fellow-men. It is setting fire to the whole edifice, in order to purify it from the stain of a single spot. This, sir, is monomania; it is fanatical. How, sir, can this be put down? By persecution? No, sir; it is its life's blood, its aliment. Sir, the only way of putting down fanaticism is by infamy or ridicule. The history of fanaticism, in all ages, and in all countries, teaches us this lesson."

This was in support of the policy of receiving abolition petitions. Now, hear the strong language of Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, on the subject of receiving abolition petitions; and I trust I shall have the attention of honorable Senators, while I read the opinion of Mr. Buchanan:

"Let it once be understood that the sacred right of petition and the cause of the Abolitionists must rise or must fall together, and the consequences must be fatal. I would therefore warn southern gentlemen to reflect seriously in what situation they place their friends to the North by insisting that this petition shall not be received.

"We have just as little right to interfere with slavery in the South as we have to touch the right of petition. Whence is this right derived? Can a republican government exist without it? Man might as well attempt to exist without breathing the vital air. No government, possessing any of the elements of liberty, has ever existed, or can ever exist, unless its citizens or subjects enjoy this right."

I am assailed by my colleague on the ground that I voted to receive abolition petitions; and here are many of the most leading men of the country and of the age pursuing the same course. Mr. Clay took that course. Mr. Calhoun said no free government could exist without the right of petition. The passages which I have read were from a debate in 1836. In 1839, Mr. Clay made a speech, in which he reviewed the whole ground, and announced his opinions very clearly. I remember it very well, for I lived in the same mess with him at that time. He took extraordinary pains to lay down what he considered to be the true doctrine. He believed that Congress had the power under the Constitution to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; but he urged with great force the inexpediency of adopting such a measure. So satisfactory were the sentiments announced by Mr. Clay on that occasion, that Mr. Calhoun (who, the year before, had introduced resolutions seeming to take the position that the admission of the right of petition, or the acknowledgment of the power to abolish slavery in the District, was synonymous with a grant of power to abolish slavery in the States) came forward and acknowledged that the abolition movement was at an end; that there was no longer any danger; that it was smothered and stifled by the declaration of these sentiments from the great leader of the Whig party. It continued stifled until that election was over, and how long after I do not know, when it was revived again in the South. The fact was, I believe, that Mr. Calhoun had then come over to the support of Mr. Van Buren, who had recognized the power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. I referred to it in this letter, but forbore to state the principle or motive on which this change was made. I alluded to it in corroboration of the idea that the interests of party, the ambitious and mischievous views of aspirants for public honors, had fomented a division between the North and the South, and made so much difficulty about it with no regard either for the interests of the South or the maintenance of the Union. Those times have passed. I am not holding this language in regard to the present, but I am explaining the course I took under the circumstances which were referred to by my colleague to show that I had long been looking to the North.

I do not care to refer to the paragraphs which my colleague read from a speech made by me in 1850, on the compromise measures of that period, because I do not at all repent them, as I understand them. There may, perhaps, be an accidental misprint; I have not had time to examine; but I do not wish to retract any sentiment I then uttered. My colleague holds me up as an advocate of the policy of abolition in the District of Columbia, as conceding the power of Congress to abolish slavery in this District. I have just shown how many others admitted the power. Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Clay admitted it; and even Mr. Calhoun, who had two years before pronounced it destructive to the Union, then considered the doctrines announced by Mr. Clay to be settled. My sentiments in relation to that subject are cited against me to show my abolition tendencies, or my disposition to court the North. What did I say in those extracts which my colleague read yesterday? I said that even if I doubted the power, I felt bound to defer to the opinions of the many eminent men who had entertained these sentiments, to such an extent as not to place any confidence in my own judgment. I said it was a desirable object, if it could be done on safe principles, to remove that apple of discord between the North and the South, which had given rise to so much excitement in relation to the question of the reception or rejection of petitions; that if it could be done satisfactorily to both sides, it would be a happy event; but I said at the same time it could not be done unless you made some provision for removing the emancipated slaves. I declared that on no other condition would it be safe to the surrounding States, Maryland and Virginia, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. I hold the same sentiments now. I do not find the least occasion to change them.

My colleague, passing over my votes on the compromise measures of 1850, alluded to my votes on the repeal of the Missouri compromise by the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854. He said that act was only an interpretation of the compromise measures of 1850, for which I had voted. He contends that those acts repealed the Missouri compromise, inasmuch as they gave to the people of the Territories power, control, and jurisdiction of the whole subject while in the territorial condition, and provided that when they came to be admitted into the Union as States, they should be admitted with or without slavery, as their constitution at the time might prescribe. I voted for the compromise measures of 1850. They were not satisfactory to me in all respects, but under the circumstances in which the country was placed, I thought it my duty to sustain them. I did not hesitate to vote for them without regard to the ground stated by my colleague, as to the right of the people of a Territory to legislate on the subject of slavery. I wanted the whole question permanently settled; and if we had had such a statement then as I supposed was possible to be made, and as it seemed to me there was a prospect of making, we should never have heard of this question again. But "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and on this maxim the friends of the Union acted in 1850. We said, "let us do the best we can; let us make such enactments as will be most likely to settle this question between the North and the South; and we did it.

But my colleague says that I voted for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, of which I complain so much as the origin and source of all the mischiefs and disturbances that have taken place in Kansas, and the fearful agitation that exists in the country. Let us see what I actually did vote for. I have before me the Journal of the Senate for 1854; and when the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska was taken up, it appears that the Senator from Illinois offered an amendment to strike out, in section fourteen, the words: "Which was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures," and to insert:

"Which being inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention, by Congress, with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

The section which it was proposed to amend was in these words:

"That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nebraska as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures."

The vote on this amendment was merely a choice between two different forms of expression; but I presume this is the vote upon which my colleague commented yesterday, when he said I had voted for this obnoxious measure, which I now declare to be the source and origin of the mischiefs that have afflicted the country during the last four years. He asserts that by voting for this amendment, I gave my sanction to that measure, and I have heard other gentlemen assert the same thing.

I voted to strike out one form in which that principle was announced and insert another. The form which I voted to strike out was that introduced by the Committee on Territories, after their first report and bill had been recommitted. The question was on striking out the language in which the Missouri compromise was proposed to be repealed by the second bill introduced into the Senate after the committee had agreed to incorporate Mr. Dixon's proposition in some shape, and to insert the language which I first read. I voted for that motion. The clause of repeal was in the bill before, and if the honorable Senator from Illinois were here I would call upon him to say that I did not give my assent to that provision in the reported bill. On the simple question whether the repeal should be couched in the form in which it was reported, or in the other form proposed, I voted with the South and with the Democratic party.

I announced to my old associates of the South, to my Whig and my Democratic friends, when I made up my mind to go against that measure, that I would still go with them to perfect the bill in any way they thought proper. I said that I would not vote with the gentlemen standing in opposition to it, on the questions which they might present to harass its friends; but I would go with them on the amendments to the bill. That is not the only instance in which I voted in conformity with their wishes as to the shape in which they intended to put the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is always proper to have the facts right, and after we get the facts right we can draw our own conclusions from them. By turning to the Journal of the Senate for 1854, page 162, we find that Senate bill No. 22, with the amendments submitted by Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, was under consideration; and then:

"On motion by Mr. CHASE, to amend the same by striking out, in section fourteen, the words ' was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures.'

"It was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 30.

"On motion by Mr. DAWSON,

"The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present.

"Those who voted in the affirmative are—

"Messrs. Allen, Cass, Chase, Everett, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Seward, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, Walker.

"Those who voted in the negative are—

"Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge, of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, Welles, Williams."

Here the motion was to strike out that portion of the bill which declared that the Missouri compromise was superseded by the compromise measures of 1850; and my colleague voted against striking it out. If it had been stricken out, the clause repealing the Missouri restriction would not have remained in the bill; but my colleague said no.

Mr. BELL. My colleague can correct me in facts if he pleases.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I state what is on the Journal. At page 188 of the Journal of the same year, we find, the same bill being under consideration, another amendment was offered:

"On motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, to amend the amendment by striking out, in section fourteen, the words ' which was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures,' and inserting, ' Which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-interference by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void; it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.'"

My colleague voted against striking out that clause of the bill which repealed the Missouri compromise; and on this amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, he recorded his vote to retain in the bill the repeal of the Missouri restriction.

Mr. BELL. It was not at all inconsistent with my views for me to vote in both these instances precisely as I did. When Mr. Chase made his motion, I did not choose to be diverted from the course I had marked out for myself, which was to go with the friends of the bill to perfect it. If the history of the bill be examined, it will be found that I voted to give it such a shape that I thought it could never pass the House of Representatives, and possibly not the Senate. I did not suppose, I could not have supposed that such a measure could be forced through the House of Representatives, if put in a definite shape, so far as we were able to do so, consistently with the views of a majority of the gentlemen who supported it. I think that on parliamentary principles I was perfectly justified in voting as I did on the amendments to the bill, but I voted according to the dictates of my feelings connected with my associations with the South. Many of my southern friends had my assurance that I would not disturb the bill while they were putting it in shape. The vote to which my colleague alludes was on the 6th of February, 1854, when the question first came up for decision by the Senate as to the shape the bill should assume. I gave that vote conscientiously with regard to the views which I had. It was my feeling at the time to make the bill as explicit as possible. That bill went forth a repeal of the Missouri compromise; but even at last it did not go forth in that explicit and direct manner which it seemed to me at the time and since, it ought to have done in justice to the legislation of Congress on such a question. But I shall not stop now to notice that point.

My colleague points to my vote on the retention of that clause as extending my hand to the South for the purpose of keeping them firm, while I voted against the bill to conciliate the North, thus seeking to unite the two sections in my support when I should come before the people of the United States for higher honors than I now enjoy. That is the view my colleague has presented as to my course on this subject, and his language imports deliberation and calculation.

I would only desire to ask one question on this point: is the whole South to be considered so ignorant and credulous as to be imposed upon by such a vote as that, when I voted against the bill itself? Again, could any sensible or rational man, any human being of the least intelligence, who had such aspirations as my colleague imputes to me, ever suppose that they could be realized under such an obviously double, fraudulent course as he indicates mine to have been? Whoever expects success in this country without the confidence of his own section, to a large degree, at all events? My colleague must suppose that I have very little knowledge, very little power of observation on a question of this sort, when he chooses to impute to me motives of that description, if he supposes I could cheat the South into the opinion that I was really intending to protect their interests by such trickery as this. If I could suppose myself to have the character pictured by my colleague—

"Wiring in and wiring out,
Leaving the people all in doubt
Whether the snake which made the track
Was going North, or coming back;"

—if I could believe that such imputations could attach to my character, I would hold myself as infamous in my own estimation of myself, and I should trust that all mankind would fix the brand of infamy on me. But take my conservative course in regard to the reception of abolition petitions; take my course on the compromise measures of 1850, and on the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, the developments of which I think have shown my sagacity fully; and who ever could conceive that all this deserved such imputations as my colleague has heaped upon me? Perhaps he is the only man in the country who could be capable of such a thing. I do not say that he is; but from the course of that Senator yesterday, and his whole bearing, imputing to me trickery, fraud, premeditated purpose, aspirations for the highest honors of the country, if there is a man here capable of it, it is him, not me; and if he is capable of it, he ought to be consigned to the same infamy that I prescribe for myself if I were capable of it.

Now, sir, I will trace the course of my colleague a little, in reference to the elections of which he spoke. He said, in his speech of yesterday:

"I know where I stand on this question. I know what I could have done if I had been disposed to pander and appeal to the fanaticism that exists on this question, even in my own State."

What could he have done? He could have done probably what I have supposed him capable of doing whenever the time comes when he shall be tempted to it—carry the torch of domestic discord from Johnson county in the east, to Shelby county in the west whenever he shall be tempted by his ambition to do it. Since meeting with my colleague here, in the friendly passages I have had with him out of the Senate, I began to correct my opinion of what I supposed might be his disposition whenever he should be tempted to it by being thwarted in his career, to become the incendiary on this question in my own State. I have looked to the possibility of what I must believe to be a proposition seriously entertained in the South—a dissolution of the Union in certain contingencies; and I have looked to what must inevitably happen in that event in some of the slave States; and I have looked upon my colleague as a man with that sort of temper, disposition, and principles who would not hesitate to bring the question home in Tennessee, whatever might be the consequences. Since my intercourse with him here, however, I began to have somewhat different views in regard to him. From the casual conversation which I have had in society where I have met him, I began to form a more favorable opinion of him.

But to what does he allude, when he speaks of what he could have done? He has told you that the Kansas-Nebraska act was one of the main subjects in issue between himself and his opponent, Colonel Gentry, in 1853, which was discussed every day all over the State, in every county, with but few exceptions. When he says what he could have done, may I not ask what has he done on this question in the promotion of ambitious aspirations? The very first time he took his seat in the Legislature of Tennessee, if I am not misinformed, he signaled himself by bringing forward a proposition to alter the apportionment of representation in the State of Tennessee, contending that the existing basis of apportionment was unjust to East Tennessee, which had but few slaves as compared with the middle and western sections of the State. In the election of 1855, my colleague, I presume, will not deny that he continued to hold that doctrine, and that he expressed it in the most inflammatory language. He did not forbear to avow his doctrine. He was too proud; he felt too conscious of his power, to yield to any interest there might be in Middle or Western Tennessee to induce him to change his opinions. He has been consistent and persevering in them, though I understand that, since this agitation has risen to such a height, or since 1850, according to the vindication I have heard from his friends, he has ceased to urge his doctrine upon the people, though he has not abandoned it. In the election of 1855, unless I have been falsely informed from numerous respectable sources, when he was called upon to avow or disavow the sentiments attributed to him on this point, his appeals were as inflammatory as ever.

In the course of the canvasses in Tennessee, the female population usually come out to hear the champions on both sides in their debates, at barbecues and other occasions got up for the purpose of hearing them declaim on the subject of politics; and he asserted a doctrine which placed the delicate females among his auditory upon a level with the black wenches of the middle and western portions of the State—the property of the slaveholding lords or aristocrats.

My colleague says his election as Governor by a plurality of three thousand, in 1855, was decisive of the Kansas-Nebraska question. I heard none of the debates in that contest. I have only seen these statements in the public newspapers, and I have seen certificates of them. I have seen a statement of a debate, which I have not before me now, when Mr. Gentry called upon him, before a large audience in East Tennessee, to say whether he had not said so and so, having it written down and presented to him to say yea or nay, and he recognized it as what he said and thought.

Now, sir, if there is any "wiring in and wiring out," I should like to know who it is that has been guilty of such double conduct? Who has imitated the windings of the snake? I had no wish to allude to these things. I made my remarks on the presentation of the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee with the greatest caution. I even asked my colleague, as it was not usual on such occasions to make remarks, that he would allow them to pass, unless he should feel himself imperatively called upon to say something. He did not say that he would pursue the course which I suggested; but he said that his course would depend on the character of my remarks. He gave me no notice whatever of the course he intended to pursue, which was in a three-hour speech to bring forward ornamental passages which he has been in the habit of reciting on the stump, from Johnson to Shelby, when canvassing the State—all his studied views of the philosophy of government and the philosophy of slavery—all his notions of the rights of the people, and squatter sovereignty, and what not. He has brought them all up as an answer to my speech, to hold me up as an unprincipled and profligate statesman, which he in substance and effect represented me to be; and, after all, he concluded with some strikingly offensive remarks in relation to my pretensions as compared with his. He spoke of my self-conception, and said he had met gentlemen of more ability than I possessed, even with my own conception of my powers; and he asked, that he claims such superiority over everybody with whom he may come in collision?

"Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed?"

Did I pretend to claim any superiority over anybody? Did I claim that he was not my peer? The pretext for such remarks was that I had stated that I was not his competitor. I really did not mean much by that remark; but as he had called me competitor twice, I thought it proper, from the tenor of his remarks, to disavow that I considered myself his competitor; not that I did not regard him as the peer of myself or any Senator on this floor; not that I claim any superiority over him in any form.

He recites the common-place lines commencing "What constitutes a State?" Men, of course; and I ask, what constitutes a man as he should be? such men as make up a State? A man of principle, who, in public life particularly, will be governed by high principles. I have claimed no superiority over him as a member of Congress.

He has said that there was a boasting by myself or my friends in the convention which nominated the late candidate of the American party for Governor in Nashville, that I would go forth with my trident, and that I would crush the casque of any one whom I should encounter, whether he was Saxon or Saracen, Richard or Saladin. I disclaim having made any such arrogant pretensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. My statement was this, that it was said in the Patriot, one of their papers, that the Hon. John Bell, in their convention, had indicated his willingness to enter the canvass; and that he would go into the canvass, and he would meet Saxon or Saracen, Richard or Saladin, and that whoever came in contact with him his casque would be crushed. It was never contradicted. It was taken up and republished in the newspapers, and the Democratic party sought through their papers, and in fact attempted to provoke the honorable Senator into a discussion in the canvass then going on throughout the State.

Mr. BELL. I heard in the Senator's speech the statement that it was a boast of my own; that he understood I had said so, and it is treated accordingly; and then he goes on to quote:

"Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he is grown so great?"

He says:

"I have had competitors who were foemen worthy of my steel, and they have met their fate like honorable men, and recognized me as such."

He speaks of my conception of myself in another sentence. What does this language indicate? I might ask him upon what meat he hath fed that he has assumed a position of superiority far above anything I ever pretended to? I should like to know upon what meat he hath fed that he has grown so great on his own self-conception. But he said further that "a gentleman and a well bred man will respect me, and all others I will make do it." May I not exclaim,

"Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed?"

"A gentleman and a well bred man will respect me." I will not set myself up to claim that rank or position. "And all others I will make do it," he says. I say to my colleague that, after his speech of yesterday, I cannot respect him until he gives proper explanations of it; and now, or at any time, let him attempt to make me respect him.

There are many points which I have left unnoticed in tenderness and forbearance to the Senate. I shall leave for a future occasion anything I may find it necessary to discuss.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. Presiding—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. BIGGS.] Will the Senator from Tennessee indulge the Chair a moment? I was called to the chair yesterday by the Vice President to preside while he was temporarily absent on private business, when this discussion commenced. I regret very much the character of the debate. The remarks made yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] I did not deem at the time strictly in order, but I felt too much embarrassed to interpose as the Presiding Officer under the circumstances. The Senator, therefore, was permitted to proceed, the Chair relying on the usual course that has been pursued in the Senate of observing courtesy in debate. I have been called to preside to-day by the Vice President, and it was due to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] that he should have a full opportunity to reply to the remarks made by the other Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] The remarks in reply are of a character well calculated to excite personal feeling, not strictly in order according to the opinion of the Chair, but I now state—

Mr. BELL. I put everything on a condition, the President will understand. It is conditional, predicated on my colleague's withdrawal of those charges made in his speech of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark to the Senator that in his opinion on the pending question now before the Senate—the motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee—a discussion of the character that has been indulged in is not strictly in order, and that as Presiding Officer of the Senate it will be his duty to interpose and prevent further pursuit of this character of discussion unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. Well, sir, I give my consent if my colleague wants to say anything.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I merely wish to say to the Senate that I have no disposition to continue a discussion out of order. I stated this morning in the explanation I made, that my intention was to confine myself strictly within the rules of the Senate, and that if I had traveled beyond them, so far as the Senate was concerned, I was prepared to make any apology that was necessary. I felt it due to place the allusions I have made to my honorable colleague on the proper ground. It was the furthest thing from my purpose or intention to violate any rule of this body or the common courtesies of private life. My colleague made an opening speech on these resolutions, and the allusions which he made to the Democratic party, and the connection I have with them, and the Legislature I have the honor to represent here, I thought made it my duty to reply as I did. In consequence of the announcement made by the Chair, I shall not persist in going on unless by the consent of the body. My colleague has made a speech of two hours, prepared and conned and got by rote, going off this morning in the most advantageous manner, as he believes, to himself and his party. All that I ask is to be heard within the rules of the Senate and the rules of common courtesy and propriety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to print the resolutions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am in hopes the Presiding Officer will put the question. I understood I was ruled out unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to proceed?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a perfect right to proceed in order. There can be no opposition to the Senator's proceeding in order; and if there be no objection, the Senator can proceed without interruption from the Chair at all. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a short time. I will not make a long speech on this occasion, for I do not deem it necessary; because when the reply made by my honorable colleague, this morning, is reviewed, it will be found that he has not controverted a single fact that I stated yesterday; he has not answered a single argument that I presented. He has, in the run of his remarks, attempted to extenuate or apologize for some of the facts I presented, and some of the arguments I urged; but there has been no answer, and his speech furnishes the most conclusive evidence of the correctness and force of what I stated yesterday. In the little reply that I intend to make on this occasion, perhaps I had better invert the order of proceedings, and commence where my colleague concluded.

He seems, in the conclusion of his remarks, to work himself up into somewhat of an excitement. I thought the remarks I made this morning, when he commenced his speech, would place this matter upon proper grounds. I said that my business was with him as a Senator, as a public agent, that I did not attack his personal integrity or his private character as a man and a gentleman. The conduct of the agents of the people can be scrutinized, and it is parliamentary to scrutinize it with severity, without reference to their course as private citizens, or their integrity as gentlemen. I made no allusion to him as a private man; I made no assault on his personal integrity. I attacked him as a public man, and as a public agent.

But my colleague has said that his statements, just made, will stand until I take back what I have said in reference to him as a public man and as a Senator. I made the distinction here clearly this morning. I have stated facts in connection with the course of my colleague. From those facts I have drawn some conclusions and expressed some opinions. Those opinions as given, and those conclusions as drawn from the facts I stated in connection with his course as a public man, stand now just as they stood then. I have no other apology to make than the one I made this morning. That apology, I believe, and I know, according to my understanding of parliamentary law, makes the true, proper distinction, and brings what I said within the courtesies and proprieties of this Chamber.

My honorable colleague, however, has thought proper to introduce into the discussion here private conversations. I never lug in private conversations with an individual with whom I may be in contest, in addressing the people or in a deliberative body. Since the honorable gentleman and myself have met here as Senators, we have occasionally, without design, I presume, on the part of either, fallen in with each other; we have had casual conversations, and in those casual conversations it has been said that we were here as Senators representing the same State, and though we might disagree fundamentally in reference to the principles upon which the Government should be administered, yet personally we should cultivate those relations that should characterize representatives of the same State. I responded to my colleague. I told him I had no disposition to be on other than friendly terms, in a personal point of view; that it was always my pride and pleasure to cultivate relations of personal friendship with those amongst whom I lived, who differed with me politically in sentiment; and that, so far as I was concerned, in social intercourse he would find that I would not depart from these principles. I think I have not done so. It was my intention not to depart from them. In reference to the question now before the Senate, my colleague attempted to elicit from me, as I thought, a statement as to what my course would be when these resolutions were introduced. I replied to him, frankly, that I did not know; that it would depend on circumstances; and that I should be controlled by the tenor of his remarks and the circumstances that came up on their presentation. Was there any violation of that courtesy and comity which should subsist between gentlemen, in this? He presented the resolutions; he made his speech; he attacked the party with which I am associated; he spoke about their mischievous course in putting these measures upon the country; and hence I deemed it right and proper to show that he had been instrumental in doing this precise thing which he attributed to the Democratic party, and thence his inconsistency.

But in the conclusion of his remarks, he tells the Senate and the country that until I withdraw certain expressions in reference to his public course or opinions, he will not respect me. I repeat that in all that intercourse that brings man in contact with man, I will make him respect me. I will leave that right there, making a full period.

I quoted some lines that the boys sometimes repeat, and about which my colleague seems to have been thinking somewhat; for they appear to have made an impression on his mind. I did it in the sense applied to a politician. How common is it to speak of politicians being wily? While they seem to be with one set of interests South, they are playing a game for strength at the North. It is an every-day expression. It is found in all your newspapers. Is there anything personal in that? I undertook to show from my colleague's course on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in connection with his course in 1850, that he had voted for the repeal of the Missouri compromise; that he had voted for its confirmation and correct interpretation in 1854. I then showed that when the bill was put on its passage, he voted against it. I thus sought to show that on the main proposition in the bill his vote identified him with the South; but he voted against the whole bill, thereby identifying himself with the North; and then I drew the conclusion: might not a politician taking a course of this kind, look a little to the North and a little to the South?

If I were disposed to enlarge on this subject, (but I intend to be brief,) I could go back to 1850, and refer to the proceedings in the Senate when the compromise measures came up. We all remember the part taken by the distinguished statesman of Kentucky on that occasion. Notwithstanding it had been part of my teaching and a part of my education to oppose that distinguished man, yet I always looked upon him as a gallant, talented, and daring leader. In 1850, when I witnessed his efforts here in the Senate, when he was struggling for what many believed to be the peace and harmony of the country, when he threw himself into the breach, when he was standing here receiving assaults from all quarters, and defending those measures, where did my honorable colleague stand? Up to the time when God, in the exercise of his inscrutable Providence, called General Taylor to—

"The undiscovered country, from whose bourn No traveler returns," and Mr. Fillmore was called into power, where did my colleague stand? Was it not understood that he was in opposition to the course taken by the distinguished statesman of Kentucky, whom I came here to listen to with delight and pleasure every day? The gallant bearing, the noble sentiments uttered by that great man during that contest, brought me up nearer to him and removed many of the prejudices I had contracted in early life, in reference to him. General Taylor, with all the patronage of the Administration, took his stand in favor of what was called the non-action policy, leaving the country and the questions to take care of themselves, though dissolution might come, though the country was bleeding. He was for letting in California, and leaving all the other questions unsettled. Have we forgotten that strong simile that was presented in the Senate, by Mr. Clay holding up his hand, extending his fingers, and saying that there were five bleeding wounds, and that the Administration only proposed to stop one, leaving the other four bleeding profusely?

In this condition of things, and when that man was appealing to the country, where did the great compromiser—I mean my honorable colleague—stand? He stood here sustaining the Administration, and against Mr. Clay. Until General Taylor died, in July, 1850, here he stood, opposing all those measures, giving the weight of his reputation, and the benefit of his talents, in opposition to that distinguished man who has acquired some reputation as a compromiser, and deservedly so. Where did he stand while those five wounds were bleeding? After the President passed from time to eternity, and Mr. Fillmore came in, and action must ultimately be had, and his leader was gone then he came up to support the compromise. When you take my honorable colleague's course on all the measures with which he has been connected, you find a disposition rather to go along on both sides. It is his history. Take his speeches, with all his power to refine and double-distill, and they run along carrying arguments on both sides; it is hard to tell where he will locate until his vote is given.

My honorable colleague yesterday evening, in the midst of his excitement, (which was so great that he refused to allow anybody to move an adjournment,) in referring to what I had done, said that I had my documents dog-eared; and I had made a terrible onslaught. Why, sir, a portion of the things that were used by me were gotten up after the discussion commenced. In the very same remarks he told the Senate that he had studied his speech; that he had conned it; that he had memorized it; but that he had not delivered it in the Senate as he had prepared it; that he was careful in selecting the terms he used. I have no fault to find with that; but where is the force of the objection that I should have had a document ready to quote? I did have some references. I can inform my honorable colleague, if he does not know it, that I try to imitate; sometimes I am an imitator; and I remember reading the old maxim "always keep your powder dry." It was a great maxim with Cromwell. I did not know but that he might come in here on the presentation of these resolutions, or on some other occasion, and make an onslaught on Democracy and the principles I advocated, and I wanted to be prepared, come when he might, to meet his assaults; for I knew they could be met and answered successfully. Dog-eared! I think if my colleague had dog-eared some of his documents a little more than he has done, he would have been more fortunate in some particulars than he has been.

The most of the speech that has been made to-day has been an attempt to show that public opinion in Tennessee has not come in conflict with his. He repeats what I stated yesterday, that I had canvassed the State from Johnson to Shelby, and that I made the issue upon every stump. That is true. I did make the issue with my competitor, Colonel Gentry, who was a man popular in manners, of fine personal address, and as fine declamatory powers as any man in the country, and I pressed it upon him every day, with scarcely an exception. I pressed upon him to know how he was on the Kansas-Nebraska question? My honorable colleague's course was known. It was known that a portion of the delegation here had voted against him, and the inference was, that Colonel Gentry, if he had taken ground, would be with those colleagues in the other House who voted for the bill. That was the opinion; I will not say it was the fact; but it is well known that if he had taken ground against it, he would have been beaten many more thousand votes in the State than he was. He saved himself, and tried to save some of his friends, by withholding an avowal of his sentiments on the subject; but even with Know Nothingism on hand, with all their plans and the appliances that were brought to bear on that contest, the State was carried by a decisive Democratic majority. Look at the election of members of Congress, if you want to see how public opinion has been expressed. I see some of the members not far from me. The issue was made on this identical question, and every man who voted against that bill has been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. My honorable colleague is holding on to his place by the tenure of a six-years' term.

He says that the American party commenced the canvass of 1855 in the State of Tennessee with the confident hope of carrying the State by an overwhelming majority. That is very true. They did set out with the belief that they would carry it by a large majority. What they believed, and what they set out with, is one thing; but what they did, is another and a very different thing. The result turned out differently from their anticipation. They were disappointed, and we carried the State by an overwhelming majority. How is it possible, then, that my honorable colleague can be deceived in reference to public opinion there?

Then, in 1856, followed another contest, with identically the same issues involved, discussed by the electors throughout the State; and what was the result of that canvass? An increase of the popular majority for Democracy to seven thousand five hundred votes. In 1857 the same issues were before the country, and one of the electors who was on the ticket for the State at large the preceding fall was the candidate for Governor, and he carried the State by a majority of ten thousand votes. Yet my honorable colleague, in the face of all this, gets up here and tells the Senate that he does not believe there are five hundred men in the State of Tennessee who understand the question. That is very complimentary to the people of Tennessee! In 1854 the question was before the Legislature; it has since been discussed in two gubernatorial elections, in congressional and presidential elections; and yet my honorable colleague has the hardihood to give it as his opinion here that there are not five hundred men in the State who understand the question.

Now, when the Legislature are in session fresh from the people, elected at the same time with the Governor, who received ten thousand majority, they pass resolutions, after discussing the subject, in which they instruct their Senators to do certain things, in which they express their opinions, and in those resolutions they recite the language of my honorable colleague, in which he declared in substance, that if public opinion was against him in his own State he would not be seen one day longer in the Senate. Yesterday he declared that these extracts were garbled. What do we mean by a garbled extract? It is an extract taken from a paragraph, or a writing, or a speech, which taken by itself, means something different from what it would when read in connection with the whole context. Is not that so? He said it was garbled, thereby making him mean something that he did not state. Did my honorable colleague show to-day that by reading these paragraphs in connection with anything else, they meant anything but just what the Legislature has stated? He did not; and he leaves them untouched with the simple declaration that the extracts are garbled. How? They are there; every part that would make them mean just what they are; and what does he say? In his place here he declared that if the voice of the people of Tennessee was against him, he would not be seen in the Senate another day. How does he stand? Go to Mr. Etheridge's district, now represented by General Atkins, and to Nathaniel G. Taylor's district, now represented by the honorable Albert G. Watkins, and how does the matter stand? In Mr. Etheridge's district, where it was stated by my colleague the issue was directly made, and upon this question the election turned, and how does it stand there? Take the isolated case he presents. Mr. Etheridge, a man of talent and ability, was borne down by public opinion, and General Atkins sent here in his place. If all this evidence, when summed up and presented to my honorable colleague, is not a proof of popular sentiment, in the name of high Heaven, what will convince him as to the opinion of the people of Tennessee! If these proofs will not convince him, one rising from the dead would not convince him.

He says, though, that recently in arguing the question of squatter sovereignty, the people have begun to understand the subject. Then you see, that just in proportion as they began to understand the question, the Democratic majority increased. In the first race, we had say two thousand; in the next, seven thousand five hundred; in the next, ten thousand, carrying the Legislature by an overwhelming majority. Just as we understand it more and more, in the very same proportion the majority increases, running up, where they will continue to go until this question is settled.

He speaks of his course on the right of petition, and says I have referred to his course in reference to petitions. I did, and he does not controvert what I said. That stands just as it did before. The first speech I ever made in the Congress of the United States was on the right of petition. I do not look upon that right in the light some do. I do not assume that the people of this Confederacy should approach the Congress of the United States in the humiliating and humble attitude of petitioners. It is not in accordance with the genius of the Government. It will do in monarchical and kingly Governments. It is true, we have in the Constitution a provision that the people have the right peaceably at all times to assemble and petition for redress of grievances; but we assume here that the people are sovereign. When the sovereign, the great mass of the nation, expresses its will, it is the duty of Congress to obey their master, not to receive their master in the humble character of a petitioner. That is the difference between us on that point.

But by way of making a set-off and exonerating himself from the position that I had assigned him, when, going upon inference, I gave it as an opinion, that he might, if he were disposed, play a game for strength at the North and at the South; he says that I stated yesterday that I knew on this question of slavery what even I, humble as I am, could have done in my own State. I did not state it to show that I was actuated by principle. I understand the principles on which this great institution of slavery stands; and in the section of the State of Tennessee where I live, where there are but few slaves, I took the bold ground which I stated yesterday, in reference to the nature of the institution itself, and have continued to maintain it. But the gentleman here, has attempted to lug in on this occasion some things, that are understood at home, in an under-current. It was the reason and cause of my reply to his remarks yesterday on the subject of slavery. The idea with some is, and it is industriously cultivated—"Oh, he lives in Eastern Tennessee; there are not many slaves there; he does not own many," and hence the inference is "that he is to be doubted, and we will try to array all the slave feeling in the strong slaveholding counties against him." That is the game they play.

I wish he would bring here the speech he refers to, instead of relating it on some kind of conversation picked up from itinerants here and there, and read the speech itself, which he says was made on Broad street, in which I threw out some strange doctrines about squatter sovereignty and in reference to slavery. In that very speech my views are laid down on the question of slavery, and I argued on the principle upon which slavery stands. If I had been disposed to play the demagogue, I might have done so; but is there any evidence of it? In regard to my speech on Broad street, he says that his friends, or somebody else, told him so and so, and gave him this version or that version of it. Now, if you let a man go about privateering, and picking up a little scrap of information here, a loose remnant there, and a sentence somewhere else, and put all this together and make a position of it, you can demonstrate anything on the face of the earth. I disclaim and deny that sort of process of reasoning. It is not legitimate; it is not according to the rules of the logician; it is far from the character of a statesman.

I did make a speech in Broad street, and I published it all. It was read, and I thought, when I got it down, to speak rather in the language of the schoolmaster, that there was some right good reading in it. It took pretty well; it was read, and sought for. My colleague made a speech in the market-house. He made one of those moving speeches; he commenced with a good large crowd, and he spoke it all away. [Laughter.] A few days afterwards he published half of it, but the other half has never been published yet. That is what he did.

But he refers to my course in the Legislature by way of relief; but in all that he has said, has he shown that I was inconsistent in anything? I do not claim to belong to the stiff-necked family that never change an opinion; but has he shown any inconsistency? Not the slightest. But take my competitor's course, before I come to the negro idea involved in this reference to my course in the Tennessee Legislature, and what is it? The lines I presented yesterday are a clear and good illustration of it. He was for the compromise awhile and then for the non-action policy; for the repeal of the Missouri compromise and against it. He voted to repeal it in 1850, and voted against its repeal in 1854. Take his course and his speech. We are getting to be sort of poetic here, and I think of two other little lines; they are from negro melodies, and they may be pardoned, as negroes seem to be the great subject in these times, like Aaron's rod, swallowing up all other questions. What is his speech? Here is one point and there is another point; here is one inconsistency and there is another inconsistency, and I know nothing better to illustrate it by than the negro's melody:

"There's Point Look-out and Point Look-in, There's Point-no-Point, and Point Agin."

That is about a good illustration and representation of his speeches here and elsewhere, and of his course, speaking on both sides, seeming to be with both parties, going along between wind and water. I am speaking of him as a politician. Has he shown my inconsistency? Not at all. What was the main thing he relied upon? That, in the Legislature, I had been somewhat strange in my proceedings or course in reference to the question of slavery. I dislike, in a discussion with an honorable colleague, to follow him along, step by step, and remove his arguments or statements piece by piece; and after having removed them all, when we march up to this last position, it is almost painful to me. I see him standing like a cripple, resting upon a crutch; and it appears to be somewhat unkind, after having driven him to his crutch, to walk up and kick the crutch from under him; and I am almost inclined, on this point, to let the cripple go.

But what is it that I did in the Legislature? He thinks it is the first Legislature I was ever in. It seems to be all conjecture, a mysterious, incomprehensible, indefinable sort of mass that is floating along through his cranium. There is nothing distinct or tangible; but it is all confusion, somehow or other—I cannot exactly tell how. You have seen that illustrated in the effort to-day to extricate himself from the votes I pinned upon him in the Journal; and even after he got the document and was reading from it, I showed that the position I assumed yesterday was true to the letter. But in the Legislature I introduced some resolutions; and what were they? Did he show that I was inconsistent? Did he show that I had backed out from them, that I had disavowed any opinion I had ever entertained? I was a member of the Legislature in 1842, after Congress had made the apportionment of the number of representatives to which the several States were entitled according to the existing ratio. Tennessee was entitled to eleven members in Congress under that ratio. The number was settled. Three fifths of the slaves were added to the whole number of whites. In making the apportionment under the Constitution, to whom is it made? Is it made to particular districts? Is it made to particular localities, or is the apportionment made to the States? The apportionment is made to the States; and Tennessee, under the Constitution, received eleven members, getting the benefit of three fifths of the slaves. That point was settled; that was over; that was done.

In the Legislature of 1842, I introduced two resolutions. There seems to be a contrariety of opinion about them; and I will state just what occurred, so that my colleague can readily remember it the next time he undertakes to tell it. What were those two resolutions? Some said elect by general ticket, some by districts, some one way, and some another. I said: "Gentlemen, if you elect by general ticket, the qualified voters will elect all the members. How do you elect members, now? Do you not elect by general ticket? and who does elect them? The voting population. Your State, in making up this electoral college, has the benefit of three fifths of the slaves, because that college consists of a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives. That is the basis of the college." Then in the Legislature of 1842, after my State had the benefit of the three-fifths principle in the apportionment of members of Congress, I introduced a resolution, that if the State were laid off into districts, the districts shall be composed of the several counties in the State, without regard to slave population. Another resolution was that the one hundred and twenty thousand qualified voters of the State should be divided by eleven, and that each eleventh of the qualified voters of the State should elect one Representative. I was for it then, and I am for it now. It is right, and it is correct. In the States, we hold that slaves are property. We hold, in laying our States off into senatorial and representative districts, that property is not an element of representation. These resolutions were substantially in the words of the constitution of the State, that the representatives shall be apportioned according to the number of qualified voters.

Is there any abolition in that? Coming back to the idea I have ever entertained since I formed an opinion in reference to sovereignty, what is it that constitutes a State? Is it not the qualified voters? Is it not the thinking, living, active, producing, intelligent, portion of the population who have the right of suffrage? If they constitute the State, are they not all equals? And where do you derive the right, in apportioning your representatives, to discriminate between sovereigns in the same State, and to give one a larger representation than you do another?

Does the Senator show any inconsistency in this? I was attacked upon it, and it was discussed from one extreme of the State to the other. I had to discuss the question in the strongest slaveholding county in the State of Tennessee—Fayette. I discussed it with Augustus Henry, who is called the eagle orator—the lineal descendant of the forest-born Demosthenes, Patrick Henry. He, with all his eloquence and the attachment and devotion the Whig party had for him, pressed the question with all the power that was in him; and in the strongest slaveholding county in the State I increased the Democratic vote; and the State, which was understood then to be directly Whig in its complexion, was carried by the Democracy by a handsome majority.

Do none of the other southern States do what I proposed then? I think some of them do. I believe Louisiana has incorporated, to some extent, the same principle into her policy; and so have Mississippi and Alabama. Where is the difference between this principle and electing the members by general ticket? Suppose you put all your members on one ticket: do not the whole number of qualified voters elect them? Suppose you divide the State into districts: does not each division elect its own member? So we see what that amounts to; but the gentleman has relied upon it as the main thing, as a set-off.

I know the Senate are tired of this dish of politics relating exclusively to the State of Tennessee, and I have no disposition to press it upon them. If my colleague, on introducing these resolutions, had made such remarks as I thought would not have called for reply, not one word would have been uttered by me.

But, Mr. President, in conclusion, how does this matter stand? I repeat again, by way of asking the question, has my honorable colleague refuted, or successfully met one single fact stated by me, or one single argument I have made?

Does not my position stand untouched in the slightest degree? I feel now that I have pursued my colleague almost too far; for, from the contortions and restlessness manifested by him, I am not mistaken about the result. I know (and I say it not in the spirit of boast) when I have issues that will hold; I know when I have my victim that I can grip; I know when I have got the argument, and the fact that will sustain me, and upon which I can rely; and I have no disposition to pursue my colleague still further. I could enumerate many other inconsistencies of his; but, if I know myself, I am humane. I look, politically speaking, on my honorable colleague as now being down. He is now out of power, and he that is down can fall no lower. I am a humane man. I look upon him in his prostrate condition with all the tender sympathies of humanity. I have no disposition to pursue my colleague further. I will not mutilate the dead, nor add one additional pang to the tortures of the already-condemned.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I do not mean to say anything ill-natured except this one thing, which, perhaps, my colleague may so regard: I would rather be myself dead than that man living. Notwithstanding his professions, he has pursued a course indicative of the boiling over within him of that feeling of malice with which he pursued me before. I may be dead, politically speaking; but that is the position of honor when the times turn up such members of the Senate as he is.

He has mistaken my position on the compromise of 1850. He alleges that I was opposed to the great commoner, Mr. Clay, in his attempt to heal those bleeding wounds, and that I stood with President Taylor, on the non-action policy. Now, I wish merely to state the facts. I suppose my colleague does not really know very well what they are. I will tell you, sir, and the Senate, that I contended from the very first, that the best thing the South could do would be to admit California with certain boundaries, even before she sent her constitution here. There are some here, perhaps, who may remember my contest with Judge Berrien, of Georgia, on the subject, whether that could be done. They had a provisional government, with no constitution formed; and I took the position that the Congress of the United States could admit States—not merely in conformity with the language or on the condition always implied in our enabling acts; but that we could admit societies, bodies politic, formed by common consent or voluntary arrangement and agreement, with defined boundaries, when we believed there was population enough to justify it, and the population was not prescribed by the Constitution. I thought that by pursuing such a policy as that, the South would get a slave State in California; but I was voted down by southern gentlemen. Mr. Calhoun, among others, would not admit the idea that any State could be admitted into this Union under the circumstances under which California presented herself. My proposition got only a few votes; but I will state here, in my own vindication, that I had the promise and expectation of a large vote from both sides of the Chamber.

My colleague says that I acted with General Taylor in 1850. I had the greatest respect and veneration for his patriotism and for his sound practical sense. I vindicated him as the head of the administration of the Government, against what I considered the unjust assaults of leading men of his own party, and Mr. Clay among them; but that very committee of thirteen, which has been so often spoken of, was ordered by the Senate, in 1850, on my resolution. I brought in several resolutions signifying the basis of a compromise which I thought expedient and practicable. These resolutions were the basis of a proposition to refer the subject to a select committee of thirteen, made by the honorable Senator then from Mississippi, Mr. Foot. I departed from the policy of General Taylor, who was then President of the United States. My propositions were not consistent with his plan. What I suppose my colleague alludes to is the vindication by me of the honest motives of General Taylor when he proposed to defer the subject, stating his own views of the proper mode of disposing of the Territories; which was to leave them as they were until they should form State constitutions and ask for admission into the Union, which he supposed would heal the whole difficulty; and then they would have a right to come here either as free States or slave States, as they should think proper.

I disagreed with that policy so far as to make the propositions which I did, and so far as to support the compromise measures in the shape in which they were finally reported from the committee of thirteen, though they were not such propositions as I had presented to the Senate myself in the first instance. I presume that is a mistake on the part of my colleague as to the position I occupied then.

My colleague has spoken of my remarks as to the understanding of this question by the people of Tennessee. I said before that I did not believe five hundred people in the State of Tennessee understood the question at this day; and how could they, when we do not agree upon it ourselves? The fact that we here disagree as to the construction of the Kansas-Nebraska bill is notorious and palpable.

Then in regard to my colleague's remarks on the quotations from my speech of 1854, incorporated into the preamble of these resolutions which I said were garbled, I acquit my colleague from any intention to do injustice to me in that respect; for he does not appear to understand what is a garbled extract. He says these extracts are full; they are whole paragraphs or whole sentences taken from my speech; and he asks, how are they garbled? He says, part of a paragraph is not torn from the context, leaving another part which, if it had been quoted, would explain the meaning. Why, sir, what I said at first and say now, is that the whole speech is the context. I asked that the whole speech should be taken into consideration. I predicated my declarations, which are quoted by the Legislature in the preamble to these resolutions, on the ground that the measure should first come to be well understood by the people, and its consequences seen, and I did not doubt that they would be soon seen. My colleague does not take this distinction. He considers that if there is not an actual perversion and misquotation, there is no garbling. I excuse him for taking that position, for I do not think he sees it.

My colleague seemed to manifest the same disposition throughout. He spoke disparagingly of a speech made by me in the Nashville market-house, and said that the audience was good at the commencement but very small at the close, and that I only published one half of it and never published the other half. My colleague is mistaken. The speech which I published was a speech delivered to a very small assemblage called together without preparation, made in merely a conversational tone. I made two speeches afterwards to large audiences, filling the whole space around me as far as I could be heard; and until now I never heard that they had fallen away from me during the progress of my speech. I bring this in merely as a rebutter to that sort of passion which my colleague seems to have; but how small it is! He said I made a speech to a large audience at first, but that it dwindled down to a very few at the close; that I published half of it and never published the rest. This is not at all true. The speech which I published was made to a very small audience, only some forty, or fifty, or sixty, in the market-house, towards dark, when I could hardly see to read a paper of any sort, and when there was no preparation for a meeting, the market not being lighted up. This is a trifling matter, but I advert to it only because I think it is indicative of the whole feeling which has inspired my colleague. I cannot comprehend it at all.

My colleague states that he and I had a conversation in relation to the debate which might take place on the presentation of these resolutions. He tells that I had memorized the speech I meant to make in regard to them. I did not tell him so; and I believe he admits that I had not spoken it as he says it was memorized. How did he get the knowledge that I memorized it?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I always like to get facts right; and with the permission of my colleague, I will give what was my understanding. I understood him in his remarks yesterday evening to state that he had studied it. Perhaps he did not make use of the word "memorized," but he said he had studied his speech. That is what I understood.

Mr. BELL. My colleague is apt to make such mistakes. I said I had studied it, and I did it particularly to avoid any severe terms in commenting on the proceedings of the Legislature, so that my colleague might not feel called upon to reply. I told him, in advance, the severest thing I should say, which was that I considered this preamble and the first two resolutions gotten up by those who plotted them as a deliberate insult, and characteristic of the men. That is all I said that I think could call for any remarks. I spoke with respect of everything else, except that I disagreed with them. He came forward, however, with a regular set speech. Whether it was conned or not, I cannot say, and I do not know whether, yesterday evening, I said it was; but it looked very much like it. It was a translation here of one of the speeches he has been accustomed to make in Tennessee on the stump, including the philosophy of government and the philosophy of slavery.

What does he say in his recent remarks? That he kept in view the maxim of Cromwell, "keep your powder dry;" and he did not know but that I would take him by surprise. That is the foundation of the whole thing. If he had regarded me as a gentleman, he could not have had such a conceit in his mind. If he did not, where did he derive the idea? When did I ever deceive a gentleman, or prove false to pledges or obligations? There is the foundation of this whole difficulty between my colleague and myself. We have different ideas and different conceptions of what belongs to a man of principle and honor.

Mr. POLK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question of the Chair? I wish to know whether, if the Senate goes into executive session now, the Army bill will have priority of other business to-morrow as unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question has not been disposed of. It is the motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee.

Several SENATORS. Let us dispose of that question.

The motion to print was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. POLK. I renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Army bill come up to-morrow in preference to other business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not except by motion to which the Senate shall agree.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his motion, to allow me to move to take up the Army bill, simply that it may be postponed until to-morrow, or left as unfinished business.

Mr. POLK. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. IVERSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POLK. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the doors were closed. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. T. H. Bocock, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS TO OFFICERS OF WAR OF 1812.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill (No. 259) granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and to those engaged in Indian wars at that period, the consideration of which was postponed till this day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not see in his place the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] who has charge of this bill; but he informed me yesterday that he desires to have it still further postponed.

Mr. CURTIS. At the time this bill was postponed, it was understood that the Committee on Military Affairs should have time to consider it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suggest that it will be found, on examination of this bill, that it makes continuous and indefinite appropriations for all pensions created by the bill, whatever they may be; and, under the rule, it must, as a matter of course, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have consulted the friends of the bill and some of its opponents, and I find that those persons who have been desiring to oppose the bill have not yet got the information asked from the President in relation to this matter of pensions. I do not know whether it has been yet sent to the House; but at all events it has not been printed, so as to come to the knowledge of members. It is not my desire to take any unfair advantage of gentlemen, or to make use of any artifice for the purpose of securing the passage of this bill. I desire that it shall have the fullest and most ample consideration. I do not believe that it would be just towards the opponents of this bill to press its consideration at this time, or until the information asked for shall have been supplied. I therefore ask of the House to have this bill placed in such a position as to insure it a full consideration at a proper time hereafter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. What question is pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am not going to discuss it. I am stating to the House the reasons why I shall not press the consideration of the bill at this time. The Army bill, which will be reported by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will require, I think, immediate consideration. There is another subject of great national importance which is pressing upon the consideration of the House. For these reasons, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to postpone this bill till the first Tuesday in April, and that it be made a special order, and be considered from day to day till disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit the question of order, whether this bill, making an appropriation, can be debated here?

The SPEAKER. As this bill contains a continuous and permanent appropriation, the Chair is of opinion that it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAVAGE. The order that I ask can be made by unanimous consent of the House. If unanimous consent be not given, then I shall have another motion to make in relation to this bill. But I now ask unanimous consent to have it made a special order for the first Tuesday of April, and that it be considered from day to day till disposed of.

Mr. FENTON. I have an amendment to propose to this bill, in the nature of a substitute, which I wish to have accompany the bill, that it may be taken up at the same time for consideration.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be received as a substitute pending the motion to recommit; which motion precludes an amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. SAVAGE?]

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is, as the Chair understands, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till the first Tuesday in April, on which day it shall be a special order, and shall be continued from day to day, as a special order in the House, until disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood my colleague to ask unanimous consent to make this bill a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There is no objection to that. But if he asks to have it made a special order in the House, I must interpose an objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] as desiring the unanimous consent of the House to have the bill made a special order in the House, or in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. SAVAGE. In the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I must object to that.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. This is a very important bill, and I think it should take the direction of all other bills. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] offers the following substitute for the bill.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PHELPS. This bill is not now before the House. If the gentleman proposing the substitute desires to have it printed, I have no objection to an order being made to print it. But there is no use in having the time of the House consumed by its reading.

Mr. FENTON. My object will be accomplished in having it printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] asks the unanimous consent of the House to postpone the further consideration of House bill No. 259 till the first Tuesday in April, and that the same shall be considered from day to day in the House until disposed of. Is there any objection?

Mr. HARLAN. I object.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am willing to accept the proposition of my colleague, if the day to be fixed be changed to the third Monday in March. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House to have this bill made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for that day; and that it shall be considered from day to day till disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I shall interpose no objection to its being made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I prefer that this matter should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take the regular course.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the third Monday in March.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit the question of order, that the bill contains an appropriation and must, under the rule, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The Speaker has already decided that question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The motion to postpone involves the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is such a consideration as is contemplated by the rule. The Chair is of opinion that the bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless there be unanimous consent given for its first consideration in the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair whether he has ever known a bill postponed to a day certain, when the question of order was raised that, containing an appropriation, it must, under the rules, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember having ever heard the question raised before.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This must be the effect of the motion to postpone: this bill is postponed to some Monday, and then, when it comes up, the motion will be made to suspend the rules in order to get clear of the consideration in the committee.

Mr. SAVAGE. That is precisely what I desire. I wish to place the bill beyond the technicalities of the rules of the House. I only want the bill to be considered upon its merits.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to my colleague that, if this bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he can have it brought into the House on any Monday if he can get two thirds to suspend the rules for that purpose, and to have it made the special order.

Mr. SAVAGE. That is what I expect to do on the third Monday in March. My motion is, to postpone the further consideration of the question until the third Monday in March.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. From that decision I take an appeal.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I thought the Chair had already decided that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill cannot be ordered to a third reading until it has been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. And that cuts off all debate at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Must not the Chair send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. He does not send it there.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I understood that to be the Chair's decision.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to commit. There may be other incidental motions previous to its being sent to the committee. The Chair will feel himself called on to prevent any violation of the rule which requires that the bill shall have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He would, therefore, restrain the engrossment and third reading of the bill until it had that consideration, unless the rule was suspended by unanimous consent, or on Monday by a vote of two thirds.

Mr. STANTON. If the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee be voted down, what will be the next motion in order? Will it not be on the engrossment of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will not. It will be on the motion to recommit. That motion failing, and no other motion being made, the Chair would send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. Without a motion?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir, without a motion.

Mr. STANTON. I submit, then, whether a motion to postpone is not such a consideration as ought to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? It is a process in the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is the consideration contemplated in the rules. A motion to postpone does not bring the merits of the bill before the House. The only debate which can be entertained, would be on the question of postponement.

Mr. BOGOCCK. The 133d rule is the one under which I presume the Speaker is acting. It does not say that bills making appropriations shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It only says that they shall be first discussed there. The rule was formerly, as the notes show, that all motions made must be first made in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That portion of the rule was stricken out; and the rule says now that all bills making appropriations of money shall be first discussed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, leaving motions to be made in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the third Monday in March. The Chair entertains that motion as legitimate, and in order. From this decision the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] takes an appeal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule says that the bill shall have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair says the motion is to postpone the further consideration of the bill to a day certain. If it is postponed to that time, will it not be to consider the bill? And if so, then it will not have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The pending question would be a motion to recommit. That is the question the House would have to consider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that when a bill makes an appropriation, it ought, without motion, to go at once to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to recommit had not been made, it would have taken that direction.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does not the rule take it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union without a motion?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the bill could not go to its third reading, unless by unanimous consent, without having been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule does not say a word about the third reading of the bill. It says its first consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GARTRELL. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The appeal was laid upon the table.

The question recurred on the motion to postpone till the third Monday in March.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BRYAN and BURFINTON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 30.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the third Monday in March next.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill of the House of the following title:

An act (No. 81) to amend "An act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and others."

And that they had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 77) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March, 1851;

An act (S. No. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land, in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half breeds or mixed bloods of the Dahcotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1854;

An act (S. No. 71) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4, and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette," approved February 26, 1845; and

An act (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Accounts.

KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MASON, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, in regard to granting bounty lands to the soldiers of the war of the Revolution and the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REGULATION OF THE HOUSE OFFICERS.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Accounts, reported a bill fixing the number and compensation of clerks, messengers, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MASON. This is a bill regulating the officers of the House of Representatives, to which the Committee on Accounts have given a great deal of attention; but, instead of making a long and elaborate report, they have contented themselves with simply reporting a bill.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Has this bill been printed?

Mr. MASON. It has not.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to be called to act upon such a bill, until it has been printed. The gentleman can postpone it and have it printed. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, it seems that some gentlemen want to have this bill printed before it is acted on. We had supposed that, as this matter of regulating the officers of the House was a very small one, the House might have trusted the Committee on Accounts with it even without a report. But if it be the pleasure of the House that it shall be printed and made the special order for some day certain, I have no objection to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he should have this bill recommitted to his committee and ordered to be printed; and then, when the committees are again called, he can, after reasonable debate, put it on its passage. I think that will be a more certain way of securing its consideration than to fix a particular day. I make that suggestion.

Mr. MASON. The resolution directing us to examine into this matter authorized us to report at any time.

Mr. RUFFIN. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, I desire to make a suggestion. It is now near the end of the month, and the offices of this House are in very great confusion. We have found them so all the session. We have found great difficulty in settling the accounts and keeping the pay-rolls correct, and I think it is very essential that the matter should be settled as speedily as possible. For the last two or three years, everything of this kind has been carried on in a very disorderly and illegal manner. When we took this matter in charge, we found upon the floor of this House over thirty pages. The Doorkeeper had authority of law to appoint fourteen. We have recommended that hereafter there shall be twenty. The committee came to the conclusion that that was a proper number. You will recollect, sir, that during the last Congress, although the law authorized the appointment of but fourteen pages, there were a number of boys on the floor throughout the whole Congress who had not been legally appointed; and upon the very last day of the last session a gentleman got up in his place and offered a resolution, containing the names of eleven extra pages, to pay them the same allowance, with the extra compensation, that was paid to the other pages. Well, sir, this thing is in confusion yet. There are now upon this floor some twenty pages, and only fourteen are authorized by law. There are more messengers than are authorized by law. We found, also, some twenty-eight persons employed in the folding-room, at a compensation of two dollars and fifty cents per day. We thought that entirely wrong. We took the responsibility, as we had authority to do, of reducing that force. We authorized the Doorkeeper to employ four persons at two dollars and fifty cents a day, and two laborers, at one dollar and fifty cents a day, and to have the rest of the work done by the piece, as it was done in former Congresses. We wish to have the matter of the authority of the committee over the folding-room settled beyond all doubt; and we have embodied a provision in this bill to that effect, giving that authority to the Committee on Accounts. It is necessary that all these things should be settled in some definite form; for the members of the committee are constantly annoyed, and have been, every day this session, by persons sending for us out of this Hall to speak about their accounts. Everything is in confusion, and I, for one, am opposed to this thing being put off. I am willing that the bill shall be postponed until tomorrow, or the day after, or long enough for it to be printed; but I am decidedly opposed to postponing it from week to week, so that it will not be arranged for another month, and I trust the chairman of the committee will not agree to it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to have that clause of the bill read which prescribes the number of persons to be employed in the post office of the House during the recess of Congress.

Mr. SEWARD. Is this bill up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It has been read a first and second time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I now ask to have that clause read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Provided, That during the recess of Congress the Postmaster be, and he is hereby, required to reduce the number of persons employed in his office to the actual requirements of the same.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I suggest that that leaves the matter entirely too indefinite. It certainly cannot be necessary to have more than one person here during the recess of Congress, simply to forward letters.

Mr. MASON. If the gentleman will inquire particularly into the duties of the Postmaster, he will find that he has a large mass of matter to distribute immediately after the adjournment of Congress, and he cannot do without this force. As soon as ever that labor is done, we have a right to calculate that the Postmaster will act according to the law, and reduce the number of his employes. If he does not, we can reach him by discharging him.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Would it not be better to specify the number he shall employ?

Mr. MASON. The number is specified. The Postmaster is authorized to employ five messengers and four mail boys and assistants. He can employ five messengers at three dollars a day.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the House? and is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope the bill will be printed before we are called to vote upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Accounts, and printed. The committee can report at any time; and hence there is no necessity to set it down for a particular day. I ask the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. What will be the effect of seconding the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The House will be brought to vote first on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEARING, from the minority of the Committee on Accounts, presented a bill on the same subject, in the nature of a substitute for the bill of the majority.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I make the same motion in regard to the substitute: that it be recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope the House will proceed with the call of committees.

The motion was not agreed to.

CHANGE IN MARINE HOSPITAL SYSTEM.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the present system of providing relief for sick and disabled seamen; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed. I desire to call the attention of the House to this bill, as it proposes a radical change in the present system of marine hospitals—one which has been recommended by three successive Secretaries of the Treasury. I desire to have the bill printed and recommitted, because, when the committee is again called upon to report, we may see fit to ask to have it put upon its passage, after reasonable debate. It is not necessary that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because it embraces no appropriation. I desire to call the attention of members to the bill, and particularly the attention of those who represent districts where there are marine hospitals.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman whether he does not propose to allow some opportunity for discussion?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have already suggested that when the bill is again brought before the House, we may propose, after reasonable time for discussion, to put it on its passage. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under its operation the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD C. MURPHY.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented an adverse report on the letter of the Secretary of State in reference to the claim of Richard C. Murphy, late consul at Shanghai; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES MARKS, AND OTHERS.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, presented an adverse report upon the petition of James Marks and others; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WINNEBAGO RESERVATION CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. MAYNARD, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions in reference to the Winnebago reservation claims, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division, ayes 86, noes 51.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, on which Mr. CRAWFORD was entitled to the floor.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I propose, in the hour allotted me, to examine the causes and to explain the reasons why it is that the public peace has been so much disturbed, and the apprehensions of law-abiding citizens aroused lest civil war should break out upon the borders of our western States, and spread its desolating influences throughout the entire Republic.

In so doing I cannot hope to bring anything new before the country; but I do hope to show whence originates this dangerous spirit, and to whom we are indebted for all the confusion, disorder, and rebellion with which we have been threatened.

I propose to show, further, that the opposition to the admission of Kansas originated here, and is not the result of any action whatever of the Le-compton convention, but of a fixed and settled determination upon the part of the anti-slavery men of the North to repudiate the pledges of 1850, and to defeat the very object accomplished by the passage of the Nebraska act.

The Territory of Kansas has attracted more of public attention, and excited more bitterness of feeling among the statesmen of the country and the people of the United States, than any other subject since its first introduction into national politics.

The question very naturally and properly arises, why is this so? The answer lies in the hatred which exists with the Republican party of the country to slave labor, and the doctrine of self-government as is provided for the people of Kansas by her organic act. The area over which this act extends, differs in no material respect from other portions of the public domain, for which similar legal provisions have been made. The soil, climate, and productions differ but little from those of the adjacent country, which skirts her borders. Nature has made no great change in her gifts toward this and other surrounding territory; then why, we repeat, this struggle—this conflict over Kansas? Nothing, except that she permits her citizens to employ slave labor, wherever they may prefer it to white labor, and has embodied that provision in her constitution.

This clamor is not new to this House, nor to the country. For a quarter of a century we have listened to it before this Territory was known to the people; and had it not been seized upon by a great and powerful party to carry the popular elections, not a hostile gun would have been heard on the plains of Kansas. The torch of the incendiary and the bloody knife of the assassin would have been unseen within her peaceful limits, and the military tread of American soldiery would have been known only to protect the hardy settler in his quiet home from the depredations of the savage Indian.

The worst passions belonging to humanity were excited and put in action by these party influences, and manifested themselves in acts of arson, robbery, murder, and treason. Why, let us inquire, should these results have occurred in Kansas? All the territory of the United States had been provided for except Nebraska and Kansas.

Governments had been given to the territory acquired from Mexico, and in them the greatest and most alarming question in American politics was considered and settled. The enemies of our Constitution, at home and abroad, looked upon the question of slave labor as the rock upon which this Union would split, and leave our country divided and distracted, as they hoped it would be, a fit and proper subject for the cupidity and avarice of the commercial nations of the earth. And whilst we had hoped that this danger had passed, and that this question had been forever closed by the Congress of the United States, in having placed it beyond the reach of its own intervention, and in the hands of each separate community when it becomes sovereign; yet we are well convinced that if it shall ever be settled, it must be when we have yielded to every demand which fanaticism makes, or cease to live in a common Government where it prevails.

In the above simple, easy, practical and constitutional manner was this perplexing question disposed of, and, as it was hoped, forever; and if in good faith it had been kept, peace and harmony would now prevail between the North and South, and this new sister would be welcomed into the family of States upon the ascertainment that her constitution was republican in form. But, sir, when we attempted to apply this principle to the organic act of Kansas, and to give the people the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, it became necessary to repeal a law which was in direct conflict with the exercise of this prerogative. Northern and southern patriotism was equal to the task, and in pursuance of a principle which was just, as well as constitutional, American statesmen repealed the law, and put Kansas where she had a right to be—free to determine her questions of domestic policy, limited only by the Constitution.

When this act, securing these rights, was first reported in the other end of the Capitol, the enemies of slave labor and self-government manifested their opposition in every possible form; and from that hour to this, the peace of the country has been disturbed, and Kansas made a scene of bloody strife, almost amounting to civil war, and all done alone to destroy the rights which had been secured to the citizens of one half our States by a law of Congress regularly enacted.

That it may be seen that I charge no man wrongfully, I will read a part of "an appeal to the people of the United States," put forth by the leading opponents of slavery in the Senate and House of Representatives at that time. They say:

"At the present session a new Nebraska bill has been reported by the Senate Committee on Territories, which, should it unhappily receive the sanction of Congress, will open all the unorganized territory of the Union to the ingress of slavery."

Will open the territory to the ingress of slavery! And for this encroachment upon the rights of the free States, they conclude their appeal with the following words:

"We implore Christians and Christian ministers to interpose. Their Divine religion requires them to behold in every man a brother, and to labor for the advancement and regeneration of the human race."

"Whatever apologies may be offered for the toleration of slavery in the States, none can be urged for its extension into territories where it does not now exist, and where that extension involves the repeal of ancient law, and the violation of solemn compact. Let all protest, earnestly, emphatically, by correspondence, through the press, by memorials, by resolutions of public meetings and legislative bodies, and in whatever other mode may seem expedient, against this enormous crime."

"For ourselves, we shall resist it, by speech and vote, and with all the abilities which God has given us. Even if overcome in the impending struggle, we shall not submit. We shall go home to our constituents; erect anew the standard of freedom, and call on the people to come to the rescue of the country from the domination of slavery. We will not despair, for the cause of human freedom is the cause of God."

In this appeal we find that the opponents of slavery, and the enemies of self-government, were determined to resist the passage of this measure by vote and speech, and all the abilities which God had given them; fearing lest these should prove ineffectual, they invoke the aid of the men of God, and call upon Christian ministers to interpose, and especially seek their interposition, upon the ground that in each slave they saw a brother; and this, sir, to some extent, is true, for whilst the one is a slave to his master, the other is a slave to his own fanaticism and folly. This appeal had its desired effect, and thousands of deluded clergymen—men upon whom holy hands had been laid—stepped from their high and divine mission, and united with these Abolitionists in endeavoring to prevent an American Congress from allowing the men in Kansas the same rights and privileges which they themselves enjoyed. To this appeal, and these efforts, they did add a pledge of resistance to the law, should it be passed, and called upon the people, in that event, to rescue Kansas from the domination of slavery.

These anti-Kansas men were in sober earnest in all they said upon this subject; and they have, with a devotion worthy of a better cause, contested every inch of ground over which this question had the slightest bearing. The developments of the Kansas investigation of the last Congress, brought to light the fact that, upon the passage of the bill, the enemies of slavery and of self-government formed a society to defeat the very objects secured by the enactment.

The Hon. Mr. Mace, a member of that and the next succeeding Congress, swears that—

"Immediately after the passage of the Kansas act, I, together with a number of others, who were members of Congress and Senators, believing that the tendency of that act would be to make Kansas a slave State, in order to prevent it formed an association here in Washington, called, if I recollect aright, the 'Kansas Aid Society.' I do not remember all who became members of that society, but quite a number of members who were opposed to slavery in Kansas, of the lower House, and also of the Senate, became members of it, and subscribed various sums of money. I think I subscribed fifty or a hundred dollars—I am not prepared to say which."

"My recollection is, that generally those members of the House and Senate who were opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska act became members of this society, and contributed to it."

"I think no other object was mentioned or specified, except the prevention of slavery in Kansas. I think that was the sole object of the movement. My impression is, that a majority of those who voted against the bill were members of that organization. I do not remember the total amount of money raised."

Under this testimony we find that the members generally who voted against the act, joined this society, and contributed money to prevent slavery in Kansas, and to defeat the very object which Congress had in view in its passage, that of removing the restriction against slavery, and allowing the people who were to be affected by it to establish or prohibit the same as they thought best. This fund thus raised was used in the transportation of men and guns from the eastern States to the Territory of Kansas, that they might by powder and ball prevent the people there from the enjoyment of a right which Congress by law had conferred upon them. Congress had said, "form and regulate your domestic institutions in your own way, so that you do not violate the Constitution;" but these men, who had determined to resist the law by speech and vote and all the powers which God had given them, armed their people and sent them out to accomplish on the battle-field what they had lost in the council chamber. Boxes of rifles, marked "Revised Statutes," had been shipped to Kansas to arm the free-State men who were to prevent, by their bloody use, the people from establishing slavery should they desire it.

Thus from the Capitol to the soil of this new Territory was transferred the same spirit of resistance to law and order which originated within its walls. The fiat of a great and powerful party in this country had gone forth that "no more slave States should be added to the Union," and it must be obeyed. True, the Constitution said no such thing; that the law of Congress had declared that this, as well as other Territories, might be admitted as States, either with or without slavery; yet these are not regarded; for the day has yet to come when Abolitionists are found observing the Constitution or obeying the laws of the land. Instead of allowing Kansas peaceably to populate itself, they organize here, in the heart of the nation, a society for the purpose of preventing the ordinary process of settlement, and to throw into Kansas a class of men who were to take possession of the "Revised Statutes," and shoot down or drive out of the Territory the slaveholder, when his Government no longer interposed by legal enactment to restrain him from its use and occupation with whatsoever was property. They had received, under the official signatures of their great captains, a written statement that if Congress consented to allow slaveholders to settle in the Territory, they never would submit to such an enormous crime. In pursuance of this feeling of insubordination, we find introduced into, perhaps, the first convention they ever held in Kansas, the following significant resolution:

"Resolved, That every reliable free-State man in the Territory be furnished with a rifle, a brace of pistols, and a sabre, gratis; and that he be required to take an oath to come when called upon, and muster into service under his superior officer, and to sacrifice his life, if necessary, to rescue the person and property of any person who would be brought under the jurisdiction of the present laws of the Territory."

These men had been advertised that if southern men should be permitted by law to occupy this Territory, then they would be called upon to "rescue the country from the domination of slavery." In obedience to this command, we see that the free-State men are to be armed with a rifle, pistols, and a sabre, gratis, purchased, perhaps, with the funds referred to by the Hon. Mr. Mace in his testimony. To what immediate use were they to be applied? In resisting the laws enacted by the Legislature of Kansas. Why? Because they protect the slaveholder in his rights of property. Admit that they were unconstitutional: then why not appeal to the courts to declare them so? Because theirs was not a mission of law and peace, but of blood and treason; else, why ship the rifle and the revolver, instead of the Bible and the prayer-book?

These men neither regarded the law of Congress nor the law of the Territory; they were opposed to all law, and to its enforcement; hence, in pursuance of the above resolution, they swear their men to resist the laws, and to sacrifice their lives, if need be, to rescue the person or property of any who might be brought under their jurisdiction. Here is the oath:

"I, of my own free will and accord, in the presence of Almighty God and these witnesses, do solemnly swear that I will always hail, forever conceal, and never reveal, any of the secrets of this organization, to any person in the known world, except it be to a member of the order, or within the body of a just and legal council. I furthermore promise and swear that I will not write, print, stain, or indite them on anything movable or immovable, whereby the least figure or character may become intelligible to myself or any other person. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, hold myself in readiness to obey, even to death, the orders of my superior officers. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, use my influence to make Kansas a free white State. I furthermore promise and swear that, all things else being equal, I will employ a free-State man in preference to a Missouri man, or a pro-slavery man. I furthermore promise and swear that all business that I may transact, so far as in my power, shall be transacted with free-State men. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, hold myself in readiness to take up arms in defense of free-State principles, even though it should subvert the Government. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, wear upon my person the regalia of my office and the insignia of the order. I furthermore swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, wear on my person a weapon of death. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, keep in my house at least one gun, with a full supply of ammunition. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, at all times, and under all circumstances, when I see the sign of distress given, rush to the assistance of the person giving it, even where there is a greater probability of losing my own life than of saving his. I furthermore promise and swear that I will, to the utmost of my power, oppose the laws of the so-called Kansas Legislature. I furthermore promise and swear that, when I hear the words of danger given, I will repair to the place where the danger is. I furthermore promise and swear that, if any part of my obligation is at this time omitted, I will consider the same as binding when legally informed of it. I furthermore promise and swear that, at the first convenient opportunity, I will commit this obligation to memory. To all of this I solemnly swear, without equivocation or self-evasion, binding myself under the penalty of being declared a perjurer before Heaven and a traitor to my country."

This oath expresses, more fully than anything which I could say, the object of this bloody and treasonable organization. They were to keep their secrets from every person in the known world, except members; they were to obey, even unto death, the orders of their superior officers; to be in readiness to take up arms in defense of free-State principles, although it should subvert the Government; to wear at all times upon their persons a weapon of death; and to oppose to the uttermost the laws of the Kansas Legislature. Never were orders more strictly obeyed than were those issued from the headquarters of this revolutionary party in this city. It is proclaimed from this Capitol, by Senators and Representatives, that although Congress may open territory to the ingress of slavery, yet we will never submit to such an enormous crime. Instantly the Free-Soilers of the eastern States caught up the cry, and they, too, declare that we never will submit. And all along the lines of the great Republican party, stretching from Boston to the plains of Kansas, is reëchoed the same determined spirit of insubordination and resistance to law, that was first heard from those who ought to have been the last men in the Government to stir up insurrection, and to excite the people to acts of incipient treason. These men have faithfully kept their pledge, and the "Kansas regulators" their oath; for soon we see another convention at Topeka forming a constitution without law, without authority, and in direct opposition to the regular territorial government authorized by Congress.

Under this constitution they attempted to subvert the local government, for the next movement of these armed and sworn "regulators" was to place themselves in the attitude of resistance to the laws, and by force of arms to prevent their execution by the officers. The dispatch of Governor Shannon to the President explains the condition of the country immediately after the formation of this constitution, and proves the assertion which we have made. He says:

"Affairs in this Territory are daily assuming a shape of real danger to the peace and good order of society. I am well satisfied that there exists in this Territory a secret military organization, which has for its object, among other things, resistance to the laws by force. Until within a few days past, I have looked upon the threats of leading men and public papers, who have placed themselves in an attitude of resistance to the laws, as not intended by those who made them to be carried into execution. I am now satisfied of the existence of this secret military organization, and that those engaged in it have been secretly supplied with arms and munitions of war; and that it is the object and purpose of this organization to resist the laws by force. The strength of this organization is variously estimated at from one to two thousand, but I have no satisfactory data from which to estimate its real strength; and I do believe they can command, for any given purpose, more than one thousand men. They are said to be well supplied with Sharpe's rifles and revolvers, and are bound by an oath to assist and aid each other in the resistance of the laws when called upon so to do."

He further says:

"On Monday last a warrant was issued against one of this band of men for threatening the life of one of his neighbors, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county for execution, who, with a posse of some ten men, arrested him on Tuesday night; and as he was conveying the prisoner to Leecompton, he was met about two o'clock in the morning by a band of these men, consisting of between forty and fifty, all armed with Sharpe's rifles and revolvers, who forcibly rescued the prisoner out of his hands, and openly proclaimed that there were no officers or laws in this Territory."

Here, we see, sir, before the Topeka constitution was ninety days old, that these sworn "regulators" rescue prisoners, destroy property, burn houses, and force helpless women and innocent children, terrified by fear and threats, to flee their homes and seek shelter in Missouri. It is to prevent all this the Governor calls upon the President to send the Army of the United States to aid in the preservation of life and property. I will not fail just here to pay to the late President of the United States the high compliment which he so richly deserves for his manly and patriotic reply to Governor Shannon, by inserting the same, that the country may honor him for his devotion to law and order, and give him the high position to which he is so justly entitled, but which the party bitterness of the hour denied him. He says:

"Your dispatch is received. All the power vested in the Executive will be exerted to preserve order and enforce the laws."

Notwithstanding this, the sworn "regulators," continuing their rebellious opposition to the local government, go forward, elect all their officers, both State and Federal, declare certain persons Governor, Senators to Congress, judges and sheriffs, with the avowed purpose of destroying that government which Congress had authorized. This new one was put in operation; but very soon sufficient arrests were made to temper the spirit of rebellion which had broken out among these "regulators," and forced the immediate parties to acknowledge that theirs was only a mere "fancy" government, and existed only on paper; understanding full well that no man could be punished because he imagined himself a Governor, a judge, or a sheriff.

No sooner, however, were these men discharged, than they attempted to set up their State government, and put at defiance the laws of Kansas, and it became necessary for the President of the United States, by proclamation, "to command all persons engaged in unlawful combinations against the constituted authority of the Territory of Kansas, or of the United States, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes; and to warn all such persons that any attempted insurrection in said Territory, or aggressive intrusion into the same, will be resisted not only by the local militia, but also by that of any available forces of the United States."

This proposed use of "villainous saltpeter" had a very happy, though temporary effect; for, although no forcible attempt was made to set up the Topeka government, yet every other method was adopted to weaken and destroy that which was lawfully established. Failing to accomplish their purposes in Kansas, these "regulators" came before Congress and demanded admission for her into the Union as a State under their government; but she was rejected by the votes of every member of Congress except those who were determined never to act in obedience to a law which opened our common territory to the ingress of slavery, and whose party had planted itself upon the doctrine that no more slave States should be added to this Union.

The Democratic party, upon that occasion, stood by the law of 1854 organizing the territorial government, and in which law was recognized the right of a people in forming their constitution to adopt or reject slavery, as they might choose; and, without regard to that subject, such State might be admitted into the Union. Upon the rejection of this revolutionary State government by Congress, the imprisonment of certain "regulators" in Kansas, and upon the great principle of self-government contained in the act itself, these "regulators," through their chiefs and head men, appealed for justice, as they called it, to the American people in the popular elections of 1856. They stood with "bleeding Kansas" and the Topeka constitution emblazoned upon their banners, and called upon the people to hurl from power the oppressor, and to drive from these Halls all who had refused to redress the wrongs of Kansas. But even here they appealed in vain, for a majority of the people decided to stand by the law, and to sustain those men only who lived in obedience thereto.

Thus our present Chief Magistrate came into the executive chair instructed to enforce the laws as they had been made, and as they had been construed by his predecessor.

The people of Kansas who were obeying the laws of the Territory, seeing that a majority of the people of the States would not justify rebellion even there, and desiring to satisfy the wishes of those who sought admission as a State for her into the Union, through their Legislature pass a law in January, 1857, authorizing the election of delegates to a convention, which was, in pursuance of the same, to form a State constitution. So much had been said and written upon the subject of Missouri voters, and of their having forced the laws of the Territory upon an unwilling people, that the Legislature provided against fraudulent voting in the election for delegates, by requiring a registry of the names of such persons in each county, as were authorized to vote, to be made three months prior to the day set apart for the election.

The "Kansas regulators" at that time as well as at this, claimed for themselves a majority in the Territory. Yet under this fair and proper mode of ascertaining who were legal voters, and who were not, in some counties they refused to be registered, whilst in others, as for instance Franklin, the sheriff who was authorized to discharge this duty had been killed; and the probate clerk, who in the absence of the sheriff had the same power, utterly refused to obey the law.

This preliminary duty, however, was executed as far as possible, and wherever the people would submit to it; and at the regularly appointed time the election was held and delegates chosen for the purpose of forming a State constitution. The elective franchise is a right or privilege which is to be enjoyed or not by the citizen; if he chooses, he exercises it; and if not, he delegates to others the authority and power of acting for him. By his own refusal, therefore, he is estopped from complaint at results which his own act might have prevented. Thus, in Kansas, those men who refused to obey the law by withholding their names from registry, and subsequently from voting, are foreclosed from objection by their own deed. This, of itself, is a sufficient argument against them; but how much more so it becomes when we remember that, in this matter as in all others, they stood outside the Government, and obstinately refused to participate in the rights secured to them, or perform the duties required of them. They had the assurance of both territorial and Federal Governments that they should be protected in all their rights. Instead, however, of accepting these proffered offers, and by way of manifesting their purpose to disregard all law, they undertake, by the authority of a municipal election, to exercise certain chartered rights given to the town of Lawrence, in known violation of territorial law, and in direct conflict therewith. So palpably rebellious was this new movement that Governor Walker, who had made himself obnoxious to the charge of intervention in their behalf, thus writes to General Harney, commander of the troops in Kansas:

"I have received authentic intelligence that a dangerous rebellion has occurred in the city of Lawrence in this Territory, involving an open defiance of the laws and the establishment of an insurgent government in that city."

"This movement, if not speedily arrested, I am also assured, will be extended throughout the Territory and must result in the renewal of civil war."

"It becomes my painful duty, under my instructions from the President of the United States, to request you to furnish a regiment of dragoons to proceed at once to the immediate vicinity of Lawrence, to act as a posse comitatus in aid of the civil authorities, in due execution of the laws and for the preservation of the public peace."

General Harney obeys the order and marches with his command upon Lawrence; but before any act of hostility by the troops upon this population, Governor Walker issues his proclamation, in which he charges them with the following crimes:

"You are inaugurating rebellion and revolution; you are disregarding the laws of Congress and of the territorial government, and defying their authority; you are conspiring to overthrow the Government of the United States in this Territory. Your purpose, if carried into effect in the mode designated by you, by putting your laws forcibly into execution, would involve you in the guilt and crime of treason."

General Harney's troops and this proclamation had a most "soothing effect" upon the "regulators" of the city of Lawrence; for although many were for bringing on the conflict, yet the more prudent counsels prevailed, and a bloody issue was avoided. Still no obedience was given to the laws, and no participation was taken in the affairs of government other than such as would tend to break up and destroy it. The law-abiding citizens, however, had chosen their delegates to the constitutional convention, and were only awaiting their action to ask admission into the Union. This body met at the time and in the manner provided by law, framed a constitution, and prepared Kansas for taking her place as one of the great family of States. And now, sir, she stands before Congress claiming admission. Yet, strange to say, she is met with opposition, and that, too, upon the ground that these same "regulators" had not participated in the formation of her constitution; that their names had not been registered; that they had not voted in the election for delegates to the convention; nor had the constitution been referred to them for ratification; and that they do constitute a majority of the legal voters of the Territory. What unblushing effrontery! After having obstinately refused to recognize the laws of the Territory; after having refused to register their names; after having refused to vote for delegates; and after having refused to vote for or against the constitution; they stand here at the doors of your Capitol and demand that Kansas shall not be admitted—and that, too, because of their factious and rebellious conduct. Others are found opposing her admission, not only on these accounts, but for the reason that Congress had no power to repeal the law which made an unconstitutional discrimination against the slaveholder; and although the Supreme Court has decided that the law of 1854 was constitutional, yet this opposition still exists, and the decision is met by the charge that the court making it, as well as the law-making power, both here and in Kansas, are all corrupt. Yes, sir; the Senator who introduced the bill and the President who approved it, have both been burnt in effigy more than once for their offenses; the one for bringing forward, the other for signing, a constitutional law.

The great and paramount question now is, however, shall Kansas be admitted? In answer to this question, I am pained to say that recent developments have shown that new and more dangerous foes are added to the list of those who have hitherto clamored against her admission. Who are they? and whence do they come? They are the early friends of the Kansas act; men who stood by it whilst it was theoretic, but who do not now sustain it in its practical results. They are of the few northern Democrats who withstood the shock of the political elements after the passage of the Nebraska act. But they are the last men in the world who ought to have bowed their heads after the violence of the storm had passed. It is only another convincing proof that the great ties which bind us together are one by one being snapped asunder.

But, sir, to the question—why is it that Kansas is to be rejected? Because her constitution is not republican in form? No man has yet made such an objection. Because there is not a sufficient population? That is not urged. Then why is it? First, because there is a pro-slavery clause contained in the constitution; and second, because it is asserted that there is a sufficient number of "Kansas regulators" to vote it down. For the sake of the argument let us admit that those who advocate the Topeka constitution have a majority. Who are they, and by what right do they come before us to ask admission under their constitution? They are the men who never did, and do not now, recognize our law providing them with a government; they are the men who went out to take charge of the "Revised Statutes," and who, in obedience to the great "Appeal" issued from this Capitol, settled in Kansas with a fixed determination never to submit to your law, nor to any other that might be made under it. They are those who entered into solemn league and covenant, under oath, to resist the laws of Kansas, though that resistance should subvert your Government; they are the men who set at defiance all law, human and divine, and committed the grossest acts of violence and wrong upon helpless and unoffending people; they are the men against whom Governor Shannon marched with the forces he could command to quell their insurrectionary movements; they are the men who came to Congress asking admission into the Union under the Topeka constitution, and whose very petition, I believe, the Senate decided to be a forgery. These are the men against whom General Harney was ordered to march to subdue their rebellion in the city of Lawrence, and the same who refused to qualify themselves as voters by registering their names; who refused to vote for delegates, or upon the constitution; and who now, for these reasons, ask you to reject Kansas because they did not choose to exercise their franchises according to law—and more than all, these are the men who now say to an American Congress, that, if you dare to admit Kansas, civil war will be the consequence: we never have recognized this government of yours in Kansas, and you must not; we have never lived under it, for we have uniformly resisted its laws. We have an inherent right to make a government without your authority, and we have made it; under it we have officers and we have citizens—under none other have we lived; and under this (the Topeka government) we ask admission into the Union.

How different with those who represent the Lecompton constitution. In 1854 you passed an act organizing this Territory; the grant which you gave was accepted. Under it, a Legislature was chosen, and laws enacted for the protection of person and property; and as the population increased, they, under a recommendation of the late Chief Magistrate to Congress, suggesting that a State government should be formed, submitted that matter to the sense of the people; a majority of the voters indorsed the recommendation, and the Legislature ordered an election for delegates to a constitutional convention. All this was regular and lawful; what else was done? In order that only the actual residents should vote, they provide that no person should be permitted to vote unless he had been a resident inhabitant for three months prior to the election; and to make assurance doubly sure, they required that the names of all persons living in the Territory be registered, so that the armed bands of Missourians should be excluded. Congress had extended to them the power to legislate upon all rightful subjects, and to determine who should, at all elections after the first, constitute the voters. In the exercise of this grant of power, they prescribed who should be voters and who should not. This law was constitutional and valid—therefore binding. Those who qualified themselves under it could exercise the elective franchise; those who did not, were, by their own act, properly excluded, and must accept the fruits of their own obstinacy without complaint. The convention therefore was in pursuance of law, and, as a necessary consequence, its action was binding and irrevocable, except in the proper and legal mode. The constitution upon your table, sir, is the result of their labors; and, with it, Kansas asks you to admit her.

Just at this point she is met with the objection that her entire constitution was not submitted to the people for ratification; her answer is, that eighteen of your thirty-one States did not submit theirs to the people, and that eight of the new States now in the Union have been admitted without this requirement, and that it is unjust to put upon her a restriction never before required of others. It is then urged that the voters were compelled to vote for the constitution in voting for or against slavery. How plausible soever this objection may be, we insist that it should have been made before the convention of Kansas as a reason for submitting the whole instrument; but it is a question that comes not properly before us. The delegates were authorized and instructed by the law, calling the convention, to frame a State constitution, but upon the subject of submitting their work to the people, they were left untrammelled and uninstructed, therefore free.

Being thus clothed with sovereign powers to make a constitution, they were clothed with the right to submit the whole, or a part, or none of their labors as they might determine; and these are questions not for us to inquire into or decide. That convention, unlimited as it was by legal enactment, possessed all the power that it would have had if every man in Kansas had been a member, and voted upon each article and section until the whole was complete; this being true, when that constitution was made it expressed the voice and will of the people as though they had been present, and from that judgment of the sovereignty of Kansas there lies no appeal. If this be not a sufficient answer, she points you to your own act of 1854, where you expressly secured to her the right to form and regulate her institutions in her own way, and conferred upon her the power to legislate upon all rightful subjects. She has, by your permission and under your authority, exercised these grants of power, and now presents to you a republican form of government and asks you to receive her as a State. There can be and is but one objection to her admission, and that is, her constitution recognizes and protects slavery; but even upon this point she is guarded, for she refers you to the pledge made in advance, that she might be admitted either with or without slavery as her own people might determine.

But it is urged that although the charges made be true, and that a majority of the people did not vote at all former elections, yet the Lecompton constitution was voted upon legally and decided against by the people on the 4th of January last. This demands consideration, but is easily overcome. The question made is, that the Legislature of the Territory, called by Secretary Stanton, directed that a vote should be taken against the constitution, and that this Legislature was legally assembled, and possessed power to send to the people the Lecompton constitution for adoption or rejection. Our answer is, that the Legislature calling the convention and clothing it with power might have limited it in its action, and required the whole constitution to be submitted to the people; but as it failed to do so, then the convention was free to act as it thought proper, and no subsequent Legislature could trammel or direct its action. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the Legislature was superior in power and sovereignty to the convention, for if it could direct and control this subject and thus defeat the constitution, it would be the higher power, and in possession of attributes unknown to legislative bodies. This Legislature could pass any law within the scope of its jurisdiction, but nothing more; the power once enjoyed by the Legislature had passed away from it, and the subject was above and beyond its reach; the door was closed; the act was nugatory; and the election was as much without effect as though it had been upon the Kansas act, instead of the constitution. It only remains to be seen whether Congress will redeem its pledge, or whether it will offer a reward to the rebellious spirit which has existed in Kansas from the passage of the organic act to this time.

The great question underlying all this controversy is slavery; the Republicans of the North have determined that no more slave States shall be added to the Union. The American Democracy has pledged itself to sustain each sovereign community in the right to determine for itself whether it will have slavery or not, and that in the admission of new States this right will be recognized in its fullest sense. Whenever this doctrine shall be repudiated by the northern Democracy then a majority in the Government ceases to recognize our equality, and the American Union must necessarily become our bitterest foe, and all will see that though there may be a Union on paper, there will be none in sentiment nor in affection. Already is the southern mind awakened to the inquiry, "of what great service to the South is the Union?" She sees that within her borders her productions are of the annual value of near two hundred million dollars; that a very heavy per cent. of this sum passes into the hands of northern men, who merely act as our agents in the shipment and sales which are made for us abroad; they see that the importations into the United States are principally paid for by the products of the South, and that these too pass again through northern hands, and another heavy per cent. charged thereon, all of which must be taxed upon the people of her section. The well-informed men of the North understand full well the bearing of this subject upon their interest. We call attention to the remark, in this connection, of the leading journal in the North in reference to this matter. The Herald says, in one of its issues:

"We believe that the Union, southern niggers, and southern cotton have paid, and continue to pay, such handsome dividends to the North; that we cannot do without them; and we think, too, in consideration of the heavy profits which the North thus 'realizes' from the South, that an adherence to the practical compromises of the Constitution, with an occasional concession in behalf of southern slavery, can be no very violent stretch of northern reciprocities or northern magnanimity."

We ask you for no concessions in our favor, we only demand the "practical compromises of the Constitution," nothing more; and so far as my voice, my vote, and my influence may go, I will never be satisfied with anything less than these. We therefore call upon northern Democrats to "stand by the flag;" it is borne aloft by the strong arm and patriotic heart of one of your own gallant chieftains; and under this same leader, and with this same banner, you have met and driven back the cohorts of northern Republicans in their strong and steady march towards the nation's Capitol; will you now, when this last conflict is upon us, let the columns waver, or will you fire the last shot which secures a perpetual triumph to law, to order, and the Constitution?

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to express my views as to the policy of the President in relation to the Territory of Kansas and its admission into the Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution, set forth both in his annual and special messages. While I am reluctant to ask for myself the attention of the committee, I find a sufficient apology for so doing in the fact that this is the subject, with the issues of vital importance connected with it, which rivets the public attention, and fills and stirs to the uttermost depths the hearts of the people of the whole country. Believing, sir, that candid and fearless discussion opens the way to the chambers of truth, I shall speak with that sincerity and freedom which become a representative of constituents accustomed to read, think, and decide for themselves, and to fearlessly utter and maintain their sentiments—always the characteristic of a free people. I desire, at the same time, to treat with due respect the opinions and even prejudices of all, and can only ask for my own views the same measure of attention which I shall always be happy to extend to others.

Sir, Congress is the great tribunal that is to pass upon those issues of unutterable magnitude made up and presented for its decision by the great body of the people of a Territory on the one side; and by those on the other, who, as it must be conceded—for it is impossible to disguise it—have usurped the rights of that people, and are endeavoring to force upon them a government against their will, and institutions they abhor. The parties, with their supporters—both the oppressors and the oppressed—stand, as it were, at the threshold of this body; their cause is before us. With the one is the "slave power," with its dark incantations, and the President and his Cabinet, with their powerful spells of executive patronage and party discipline—fearful odds! but with the other are, and will be whenever and wherever they can reach the question, the masses of the people, with their instinctive sympathies, their love of justice and humanity, and, more than all, that spirit which was with our fathers at the nation's birth, and first breathed into its free institutions the breath of life.

I have said that Congress was to render its decision; but we should also remember that there is another and higher tribunal before which that decision will go for adjudication and review under our form of government—the last resort, the source of power—the real sovereigns of the land, who make and unmake Presidents, Senators, and Representatives, and with whom the right will eventually triumph.

Sir, to apply the Ithuriel spear of truth to the President's special message, and expose the grave errors of statement, the strange suppression of leading facts, the partisan perversions and monstrous fallacies with which it abounds, and to have a full appreciation of the real issue before us, it will be necessary to trace back the history of events for the last few years; and, although it may fall upon our ear like a thrice-told tale, I will hastily glance at them.

1. The 30th of May, 1854, the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska were organized, and the prohibition that excluded slavery therefrom, and which had stood, ever since the admission of Missouri into the Union as a slave State, an insurmountable, and as was supposed eternal, barrier to the extension of slavery into the territory west of the Mississippi, and north of 36° 30', was repealed. By this legislation, Congress, in violation of good faith and honor—trampling upon the compromise and compact by which this broad domain, rivaling kingdoms and empires in extent, fertility, and natural resources, had, in consideration of the yielding of other territory to slavery, and the admission of Missouri as a slave State, been solemnly pledged to freedom by the legislation of the nation—disregarding the fact that the South had reaped the full measure of benefits—appropriated the entire consideration for this concession to the rights of liberty, and, as I believe, against the will of a large majority of the people of the Union, overthrew this barrier, and under the pretense of allowing "the people to govern themselves" and "form their own institutions," opened wide the portals of this vast Territory—the mother of future States—to the entrance of slavery.

It was charged at the time that the professions of "popular sovereignty" and "non-intervention" with which that measure abounds, would prove to be "false pretenses," by which a rightful heritage was to be wrested from free labor. The people were warned that the pretext put forth to cloak this monstrous wrong, to wit: that "the people of Kansas should be left perfectly free to form their own institutions in their own way," to make their own laws and constitutions, was a fraud and delusion; that the whole scope and palpable effect of this "new invention" was to open the door to the aggressive spirit of slavery, and enable it, through fraud and violence, its legitimate offspring, to plant its destroying and oppressive system upon that "land of promise," to the exclusion of free and honest industry. The startling events that have followed in rapid succession, and the action of the past Administration, and the policy and avowed purpose of President Buchanan and his Cabinet, afford confirmation strong as "holy writ" of the truth of those predictions, (so far, at least, as the Administration and its abettors are concerned,) and justify the verdict of popular condemnation that followed the consummation of this opening scene in the fearful drama of wrongs which are now sought to be crowned by an act unparalleled save in the worst despotisms the world has ever seen. When the present shall have become merged in the past, history will affirm and record this verdict of condemnation in characters that will never die.

2. At the very first election held in the Territory, under the provisions of this act, that sacred source of popular power, the ballot-box, was dishonored and perverted by a horde of ruffians who thronged the Territory from the bordering slave-holding States, controlled the election, and sent a Delegate to represent, not the real inhabitants of this Territory, but the interest of slavery in the halls of Congress.

3. The 30th of March, 1855, the so-called Territorial Legislature, (the Council and Assembly,) the first under the organic act, was elected by an armed invasion from the slave State of Missouri. Some five thousand men in martial array, with arms and munitions of war, marched into this devoted Territory, distributed themselves through the different election districts, and, with a ruffian boldness that scorned concealment, openly avowed the purpose of their invasion to be to vote, control the election of delegates, and make Kansas a slave State. Everywhere the people of the Territory—American freemen—were robbed by force of the dearest rights; the elective franchise utterly usurped; the laws defied; and these reckless invaders, wielding the powers and franchises they had plundered, without a show of authority, elected the delegates to that Legislature. So complete was the subjugation of Kansas, that not a member of that pretended Territorial Legislature, save one, was elected by the votes of the actual inhabitants of the Territory.

4. The Legislature thus imposed upon the people enacted the most tyrannical and barbarous laws, worthy only of the darkest ages; the freedom of the press and of speech was cloven down; the slave code of Missouri was adopted; and it was made a felony for one to write, print, or speak against the right to hold slaves in the Territory—a State's prison offense for an American citizen to deny or question its rightful existence there. By odious test oaths and enactments, a vast majority of the people were disfranchised, and the inhabitants of other States allowed to vote. Under its sway, crime, rapine, and murder, stalked abroad at noonday unrebuked; the property, liberty, and lives of freemen, our own people, were at the mercy and sacrificed at the will of the banded ruffianism that had inaugurated a "reign of terror," and established its iron rule for the sole purpose of fastening slavery upon an unwilling and outraged people. The then Administration, for the same purposes, threw the whole power and influence of the Federal Government on the side of the oppressors and against the oppressed. The President declared that the Army and militia of the country should be used, if necessary, to enforce the laws of that Legislature—the mere creature of fraud, violence, and usurpation; and United States soldiers were so used, to the everlasting shame and disgrace of our country.

5. The people, oppressed by this insufferable tyranny, and following the example of Michigan and California, by their chosen delegates in convention assembled, formed a constitution and government, and asked to be admitted into the Union as a State, without slavery. Their action was denounced by the Administration as treasonable and revolutionary, and their petitions spurned with insults and contempt.

6. Subsequently, this illegitimate Legislature, upheld by Federal bayonets, but repudiated by a vast majority of the people of Kansas as an "unlawful tyranny," established over them by force and fraud, passed an act providing that, in October, 1856, the people of the Territory should vote whether a convention for forming a constitution should be called or not. The people refused to acknowledge, by voting on this question, the authority of this body that had, with a strong hand, seized upon their rights. The masses stood aloof; and but a small minority, composed principally of the abettors of these flagrant wrongs—less, I believe, than one sixth of the people of the Territory—participated in the election. Upon their votes, and by the exercise of powers it had usurped, the Legislature—composed of the upper House, elected by the armed invasion of March 30, 1855, and the lower House, elected in October, 1856, while the free-State men were disfranchised by the infamous test oaths and enactments of the "body of usurpers" who had trampled down their rights—on the 19th of February, 1857, passed an act providing for the election of delegates to a convention, to meet on the first Monday of September of the same year, to frame a constitution for Kansas preparatory to her admission into the Union as a State. This mockery of an election was held on the third Monday of June, 1857, under the regulations prescribed by the Legislature thus established, and to which the people of Kansas had delegated no powers, and the very existence of which was but a continued usurpation. In this election of delegates to the convention a great majority of the people refused to engage. They would not consent to sanction, by voting, that assumption of authority which, not content with the tyranny already exercised, sought to perpetuate itself by controlling the formation of the State constitution, and thus force and fasten the institution of slavery upon the people against their will. There were but some one thousand seven hundred votes cast at this election, while the voters of the Territory numbered from nine to twelve thousand; thus did the electors of Kansas repudiate this election of delegates to a convention they did not, and could not, upon any principle of right, law, or free government, be required to recognize.

7. But further, half of the Territory of Kansas, or rather more of her electors than there were votes cast for the Lecompton convention, were by the acts of the Legislature and the officers it had appointed, absolutely deprived of the right of voting at the election of delegates to this convention. By the law providing for the convention and the election of delegates, thirty-four counties were recognized as election districts, and it was by law provided that in all of these counties a census should be taken and the voters registered. This duty was to be performed by the sheriffs and probate judges already appointed by the Legislature. After this was done the delegates were to be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these thirty-four counties there was no census taken, and in fifteen of the thirty-four counties there was no registry of the voters. In more than half of the counties of the Territory, there being no census, there could be no apportionment as required by law, and in fifteen counties where there was no registry of voters, not a vote was cast, and not one could be cast for delegates to this convention; the people were utterly disfranchised. These fifteen counties, Governor Walker says in his letter of resignation, comprise many of the oldest organized counties in the Territory, and contain more voters than there were votes cast in the whole Territory for delegates to the Lecompton convention. The sheriffs and probate judges were the creatures of the Legislature, and neglected or refused to take the census or register the voters in these counties. A majority of the inhabitants were free-State men, and to show conclusively that it was the intention to disfranchise them, it appears that when the people in these counties made a census and registry to supply this omission of the officers appointed by the Legislature, and proceeded and elected delegates; those who were thus chosen were refused seats in the convention. Thus did this convention place the seal of its approbation upon this disfranchisement of the people.

8. This wholesale destruction of the elective franchise, the President, in his last message, attempts to ignore, by speaking of it as a mere "omission to register the comparatively few voters who were inhabitants of certain counties of Kansas in the early spring of 1857," concealing the fact that those "certain counties" were nearly half of the counties of the Territory, and that the "few voters" residing there outnumbered the votes cast in the whole Territory at the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention, as shown by the vote of these counties at the October election, held but a little more than three months afterwards. The President also suppresses the fact that the free-State men offered to waive their rights, and submit to the humiliation of engaging in this election, if the notoriously fraudulent and partial registry of voters for the Territory could be corrected and completed, and the ballot-box protected from violence and fraud, but were informed by acting Governor Stanton that he had not the power to comply with these conditions. If the President, in this message, had stated these important facts, which no one on this floor will attempt to deny, it would have shown the fallacy of his statement that "this was the propitious moment for settling all difficulties in Kansas," and exhibited the gross injustice of the President's charges against the people of Kansas for not engaging in this election.

9. Both before and at the time of the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention, it was understood by the people of Kansas that the convention was only to frame a constitution and submit it to the people for their ratification or rejection. Both the national Administration and territorial government represented that it was to be so submitted. Many, if not a majority, of the delegates, at the time of their nomination, were instructed to vote for a full submission of the constitution to the people. The leading delegates to the convention, including John Calhoun, its president, gave written pledges to the same effect. President Buchanan, in his annual message, states "that he took it for granted that the convention would submit the constitution to the people," and says, "hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms." Mr. Walker only accepted the appointment of Governor of the Territory on the understanding, with the President and his Cabinet, that the constitution should be fairly submitted to the people for their decision. He says, and his statement is not questioned by General Cass, in his reply, nor by the President in his last message:

"With these views, well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas. My instructions from the President through the Secretary of State, under date 30th March last, sustain the regular Legislature of the Territory in assembling a convention to form a constitution, and they express the opinion of the President that 'when such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.' I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to a vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

This was, in effect, a pledge made by Governor Walker to the people of Kansas, with the sanction of the President and his Cabinet, that the constitution should be fully submitted to the people; and that if it was not, the conclusion is implied—nay, direct—that the Administration would not favor the admission of Kansas under it as a State. How has this understanding and these pledges been fulfilled by the convention and the President? On this point the message is silent. Let the facts answer.

10. After the October election of 1857, in which the free-State men achieved an overwhelming victory, and the people pronounced most emphatically against slavery in the Territory, the delegates previously elected to the Lecompton convention, by a meager pro-slavery minority, representing in fact less than one sixth of the people of the Territory, assembled, pursuant to adjournment. So well did these delegates understand that they were not the representatives of the people, and were but the mockery of a convention, that it was with the utmost difficulty a quorum could be kept in session, and to protect them from the indignation of the people, for whose government they were assuming to frame "this constitution," they were furnished, by the direction of the President, with a body-guard of United States soldiers. Thus that convention, originated and forced upon the people of Kansas by "unlawful authority," and there held and sustained by Federal bayonets, proceeded to produce this "misshapen monster," the Lecompton constitution; and then, with shameless effrontery and a defiant disregard of the rights of the people—in the face of pledges and representations—refused to submit the constitution to the people, but, by a partial and dishonest submission of one clause, sought by trickery and fraud to rivet slavery upon Kansas.

The conditions of that submission were that no one should vote upon the question of slavery or no slavery, in the territory, unless he would also vote in favor of the constitution, and if challenged, take an oath to support it if adopted—thus disfranchising those who were opposed to the constitution, and who, as it was well known, and as was declared by the delegates who opposed the submission, constituted a large majority of the people of Kansas; for the submission of the constitution was objected to on the ground that the people who were to live under it, if adopted, would vote it down. The enormity of these conditions are the better appreciated, when it is understood that whether the vote was "for the constitution with slavery," or "for the constitution without slavery," it was a vote for slavery in Kansas, as I will show by-and-by; and this pretended submission of the slavery clause to the decision of the people was but a mockery and fraud.

Further, this convention provided for the election of State officers and a Legislature, and ignored the officers, ministerial and legislative, just elected at the territorial election, and also the powers of the executive appointed by the President; and, by an unprecedented and unjustifiable exercise of power, gave to its presiding officer, John Calhoun, (a chief among the border ruffians,) the sole power to appoint commissioners in each county; and they were to appoint the inspectors of elections in each district, who were to hold the elections, and make their returns to him, and he was to count the votes, and declare the result. Thus this convention vested its president with these unheard of powers, and held the entire control of the machinery of the elections it had ordered—a significant fact, when we also learn that this same body, in its apportionment of representatives among the several counties, indorsed the infamous Oxford and McGee frauds, by which thousands of votes were returned that were never given; and after they had been thrown out by Governor Walker, gave representatives to these counties, based on these fraudulent returns, and elected the author of these frauds a clerk of the convention by acclamation. On the last night of its session, the convention also amended the schedule, by striking out the word "citizen," and inserting "inhabitant," in the clause defining who should be entitled to vote—all prophetic of the frauds practiced at the election of the 21st of December, when the slavery clause was voted into the constitution, and large numbers of Missourians were allowed to vote for the constitution with slavery, by swearing that they were for the instant, while offering their votes, inhabitants of the Territory.

Mr. Chairman, this instrument, thus originated and presented, which upon its face establishes the bondage of labor in Kansas, and if sanctioned by Congress will drag her an unwilling victim into the Union, as a slave State, is "the Lecompton constitution with slavery," which has received the approval of President Buchanan and his Cabinet, and which, by his special message, he urges upon Congress. The people thus wronged and outraged are charged in this extraordinary document with disloyalty, and with being "in a state of rebellion against Government;" while the usurpers and conspirators, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors against the rights and liberties of the people of Kansas, are represented by the President to be the "loyal" and "law-abiding people of the Territory." He, in speaking of their proceedings, (which the whole country knows were conceived in, and marked at every step by, fraud and violence,) says: "It is impossible that any people could have proceeded with more regularity in the formation of a constitution than the people of Kansas have done." Sir, I submit that the friends of the Administration can offer no apology that will avail the President, unless they claim and insist that the "great delusion" with which the message opens "pervades" the mind of the Executive, instead of seeming to pervade the minds of the people, as modestly charged by the President. The issue is thus made and pressed by the Administration, and it must and will be met.

I have thus hastily recalled the brief but eventful chapters of this history, yet fresh in the public mind, and presented a plain record of startling but unquestionable facts, that they may, with voices multitudinous and irrepressible, plead "trumpet-tongued" against this threatened act of fearful injustice and oppression—against the peril and strife, shame and guilt, the Administration will bring upon the nation, if it persists in this attempted, and, if successful, utter subversion of the rights of the people of a whole Territory, insuring the triumph of usurpation and slavery over our own brethren—American citizens.

Sir, in the light of the facts I have presented, leading to conclusions no logic can resist, and in view of the issues that cluster around this great question, it rises to a magnitude far above all party considerations, and appeals to all with a voice it would be criminal to disregard, to come upon the common ground it opens, of stern resistance to the infliction of this overshadowing wrong upon the people of Kansas—this impious denial of the vital principles of human rights, which underlie and uphold our entire system of free government. With overwhelming force does it appeal to the supporters of the "Kansas-Nebraska act." They struck down the barrier against which the waves of slavery had dashed, only to be broken and hurled back. The barrier that held this Territory, with its broad prairies and rich fields, its luxuriant productiveness and resources, a home for the children of free-toil farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who would make it nature's workshop for free and honorable industry—the Titan architect of national wealth and greatness—was by them demolished to make room, as was claimed, for the application of a principle, "popular sovereignty," "that the people of Kansas should be left perfectly free to form their own institutions in their own way. That the people of Kansas should be left free to decide whether they would have slavery or not; free to make their own constitution."

They who comprise the party that elevated this Administration to power, pledged their faith, the nation pledged its faith, and by the Nebraska-Kansas act guaranteed to the people of this Territory the right to exclude slavery, and the right to frame and decide upon the constitution under which they are to live. Shall this faith be violated and these pledges broken? The Lecompton constitution establishes slavery in Kansas; but this constitution has never been ratified, but is condemned and repudiated by the voters of the Territory. It is not the people's handiwork; and the convention that framed it derived no powers from the great body of the people of Kansas. They, by the election of October last, decided against slavery, and in reality against the constitution; and, at the election on the 4th of January ultimo, the people branded it with their disapprobation and abhorrence.

Sir, although I was opposed to and still condemn the "Kansas-Nebraska act" for its repeal of the "Missouri compromise," believing that the freedom of these Territories should not have been thus periled; but since it is the law, the supporters of that measure are required, by the clearest teachings of honor and good faith, and by the strongest dictates of justice, to redeem their pledges, and see that the people of Kansas are secured the right of excluding slavery and of deciding upon the adoption of the constitution under which they are to live. For them to aid in forcing slavery and the Lecompton constitution upon Kansas, against the expressed will of the people, would furnish an example of shameless treachery to professed principles, hardly equaled in the political annals of our country. Therefore I respect the distinguished Senator from Illinois and others, for maintaining against their party and the Administration the rights secured to the people of Kansas by this act. But, sir, the people cannot respect, but will condemn, an Administration, and the party which supports it, that thus in the face of the nation, standing upon broken pledges and forfeited faith, wields its powers to force upon a portion of our people an oppressive form of government, and institutions at war with the humanity, civilization, and Christianity of the age.

The President says in his annual message:

"I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota 'should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State,' may be followed on future occasions. I took it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded as it is on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

Congress, by its action, required the constitutions formed for Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Oregon to be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. This practice, the President says, is founded on "correct principles," and trusts it may be adopted on "future occasions." If this be so, then is not he acting, and would not Congress be acting, on incorrect principles to force, or even admit, Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, without submitting it to the people for their decision; and if he trusts this practice will be followed on future occasions, why does he not favor its application to this occasion; if it is proper and desirable for the future, it must be for the present. There never can be a case where all of the facts and circumstances, together with justice and right, will more imperatively demand the application of the "example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval of the people of the proposed State," than is now presented by this attempt to force the Lecompton constitution upon the unwilling people of Kansas in the very face of these "correct principles."

It cannot be denied but that every step in the proceedings by which this constitution was produced has been accompanied by fraud and violence. The people protest against it; they demand the right of deciding for themselves as to the constitution they will present to Congress. And yet the President and his Cabinet would deny them this right—withhold from the present and reserve for future occasions the application of these "correct principles," that Kansas may come into the Union bound and ironed with the Lecompton constitution with slavery. The action of the President is at war with his precepts. The truth is, the people of Kansas have already decided against this constitution, and it should not be received nor considered by this body.

The reasoning of the President, in his special message, against requiring conventions to submit their work to the people, comes in conflict with the sentiments of the foregoing extract from his annual message, and with the now universal practice of all the States; for not a single State of the Union is now governed by a constitution that has not been submitted to, and received the approval of, the people who live under it. Why should Kansas be made an exception, against the wishes of her people? No answer can be given, except that the Administration is determined Kansas shall be a slave State.

The Lecompton convention, by section seven of the schedule, provides that "before this constitution shall be sent to Congress, asking for admission into the Union as a State, it shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of this Territory for approval or disapproval;" and then the strange provision follows in the schedule that all of the ballots cast shall be for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery; allowing the people to vote to approve of the constitution, but refusing to allow them to disapprove of it; permitting the people to vote if they will vote as the convention desire. This is, indeed, a new form of submission—an invention worthy of border ruffianism. But again, the President says in his annual message, and repeats it in his special message, without even alluding to the objections that show the utter "folly of his statement," that the slavery question has been (by this schedule) "fairly and explicitly referred to the people." It is indeed strange that the chief Executive of the nation should, in the face of facts known to the whole country, commit this grave error, for it is perfectly clear that this issue is not "fairly and explicitly submitted to the people." The constitution contains provisions for banks, for grants of lands to railroad corporations, the qualifications of officers, and the perpetuity of slavery even though it is decided against—each a matter of the first importance, in regard to which people hold different opinions; and yet, in order to vote upon the slavery clause, they must, as a condition precedent, vote to approve of the constitution in all of these respects; whether they are opposed to these provisions or not, they are compelled to vote against their views upon other points in order to vote upon this one point. It is an abuse of terms to call this a fair and explicit submission of the slavery question.

But it is a still stronger, and an unanswerable objection, that whether the vote was given for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery, it was still a vote to establish slavery in Kansas. If the "constitution with slavery" was adopted, then of course slavery was established. If the "constitution without slavery" is adopted, it still exists, for section seven provides that the "rights of property in slaves now in the Territory shall not in that event be interfered with," and section fourteen, which provides that the constitution shall not be amended until after 1864, also provides "that no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves," and in order to have voted for the "constitution without slavery," the person thus voting would have had to vote for these two clauses, which make slavery perpetual in Kansas. It was so regarded by pro-slavery men, as appears by an extract from a violent pro-slavery paper.

"It is clear that the pro-slavery party have completely outwitted Walker and Stanton and the whole Black Republican party; and that, after all, Kansas will apply to Congress for admission as a slave State, with a pro-slavery constitution." * * * "But suppose they (the Black Republicans) do vote, and by their vote exclude the article concerning slavery from the constitution, will slavery be abolished in Kansas? The Times contends that it will, and quotes to prove it the following clause in the constitution providing for this contingency." * * *

"The Times prints in large capitals the words, 'And no slavery shall exist in the State of Kansas,' and then continues the words, which follow in small italics, 'except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with.' Now, if the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with, how is slavery abolished? It not only exists, but here is a guarantee that it shall be in no manner interfered with. We have not a doubt that the first part of the clause seemingly abolishing slavery was inserted for the benefit of just such people in the North as the editors of the Washington Union. It will give them a small plank on which they may stand in practicing the juggling feats of humbuggery, whilst the prohibition in the latter part of the clause secured to the pro-slavery party substantially Kansas as a slave State."—Charleston (South Carolina) Mercury, November 26.

Thus have I shown the unfairness and injustice of this pretended submission, and I ask how could freemen be expected to indorse it by voting upon a proposition thus presented? The Constitution of the United States provides, that Congress may admit new States into the Union. It vests Congress with a discretionary power in this respect, full and unlimited save by the restriction contained in the same instrument. And, although proceedings taken in a Territory for the formation of a constitution may not have been authorized by an enabling act, but have emanated from an actual Territorial Legislature, or directly from the people themselves, yet Congress may, notwithstanding their invalidity, receive and entertain the application and grant or refuse the petition as the circumstances may require; but it is the imperative duty of Congress, especially when there has been no enabling act, to see that the people are consulted and that the constitution proposed has received their sanction. To use the words of Attorney General Butler, in his opinion in the Arkansas case, "And as the power of Congress over the whole subject is plenary and unlimited, they may accept any constitution, however formed, which, in their judgment, meets the sense of the people to be affected by it."

No one will claim that the Lecompton constitution meets the sense of the people of Kansas. It is apparent that it was contemplated that the new State was to ask for admission, and that it was for Congress to act on the proposal, consent to or refuse it, as should be most proper. But it never was intended that Congress, on the application of a small minority, without an enabling act, or with one, should drag a Territory into the Union as a State, under a constitution against the will of the majority. It is well known that this constitution is repudiated by the people of Kansas; they protest against admission under it. What an abuse and usurpation of power, then, would it be on the part of Congress, to approve of the Lecompton constitution, by compelling the admission of Kansas under it as a State! The proposition should be met and repudiated at the very threshold.

It has been claimed by some, and is now asserted by the President in his message, that the "organic act" for Kansas contained provisions which made it equivalent to an enabling act. This is too palpable an error to need refutation. The language of the organic act, the action of Congress in reference to it, and the fact that very similar provisions (except as relates to slavery) are contained in the acts that established the Territories of Minnesota, Michigan, &c., show that it is impossible to construe it into an enabling act. Hence it follows that the Territorial Legislature, if valid, had no power to call a convention to form a constitution, or do any other act destructive of its territorial organization; and in this respect, therefore, it must be admitted that this was an illegitimate convention, and without authority. It is now asking Congress to clothe its unauthorized acts with authority, notwithstanding the indignant protests of the people whose rights it has usurped. Mr. Buchanan, speaking in reference to the application of Michigan to be admitted as a State, and of the powers of Territorial Legislatures, says:

"No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

In this connection there is another view of the subject which, of itself, should be conclusive. There has been no enabling act. It must be admitted that the Lecompton constitution has not been ratified by the people. The results of the elections show, and it is well known to the whole country, that a large majority of the people are not only opposed to it, but abhor and detest it; and will, if forced upon them, openly resist it. The admission of Kansas under this constitution is asked for but by a small minority. All of the proceedings from which this constitution originated (even if they had not been forced upon the people) have no validity only as Congress shall clothe them with authority. The issue is thus presented: whether Kansas shall be by Congress forced into the Union with this constitution? Whether Congress will give the minority authority over the majority? These issues must be determined in deciding this question. There cannot be found an instance in the history of our Government, where there has been no enabling act, and the constitution has not been approved by the people, that Congress has admitted a State into the Union under a constitution to which it was even alleged that the people to be affected by it, were opposed, much less when it was ascertained and known that the people had condemned and repudiated it by a large majority. And shall this practice be now departed from, and this new and dangerous precedent established for the purpose of fastening a constitution with slavery upon Kansas? Sound policy and patriotism, and the spirit of our free institutions, alike forbid it.

Sir, the President in his message says that Kansas is now "as much of a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina;" and then gravely argues, that if Kansas is admitted under the Lecompton constitution, the people can immediately thereafter, by the Legislature submitting the question to them, call a convention, change the constitution, and prohibit slavery. If this were true, it would not justify Congress in compelling the people of the Territory to submit to wrong and oppression; but none should be deceived by this pretense of the President. The Lecompton constitution declares that the right of property in slaves "is before and higher than any constitutional sanction." It also provides that it shall not be amended until after 1864; and also declares "that no alteration shall be made (in the constitution) to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." If those provisions which make slavery perpetual could be disregarded, still it would be impossible for the people to alter the constitution, and prohibit slavery, for many years to come, except by force and revolution; for section fourteen provides that the constitution can only be amended by the Legislature submitting, by a two thirds vote of each House, the question of calling a convention, to the people. The members of the Senate are elected for four years, and of the Assembly for two years. According to the latest reports, Calhoun will, through the grossest frauds—by false returns and manufactured votes—declare the pro-slavery Governor and State officers, and also more than a third, if not a majority, of pro-slavery delegates, elected to both branches of the Legislature; but a minority of more than one third in either House, or the Governor's veto, can defeat all attempts to submit the question of a convention to the people. It is therefore clear that nothing can be done within the pale of this constitution to throw it off or prohibit slavery for the next four years; and then, in addition to the way having been opened for the introduction of more slaves, a perpetuation of the frauds hitherto successful would insure the same result, and Kansas would lie prostrate at the feet of slavery.

The President asserts that the rejection of this "constitution with slavery" would be keenly felt by the fourteen slave States of this Union; but that the speedy admission of Kansas under it would restore peace and quiet to the whole country; and that he could then withdraw the army from that Territory. Sir, the army is now there without right; the people do not require it; and the President should at once withdraw it. The maintenance of a United States army in Kansas, which has been used to suppress the rights and liberties of the people, and to support the usurpations of their oppressors, who had in view the establishment of slavery in Kansas, against the will of the people, has cost the Government nearly five million dollars; and although the people have been loyal to the Constitution and laws of the United States, yet the President has now there, for the same purpose, two thousand four hundred soldiers, at the yearly expense of more than two million five hundred thousand dollars; while against the Mormons of Utah—a Territory containing more inhabitants, and in a state of open rebellion—the President has sent an army of but eighteen hundred men. Sir, to force this constitution and government upon the people of Kansas, would be to require a whole community of our citizens to bend to usurpation and tyranny as insufferable and degrading as that against which their fathers and ours, at the threshold of the Revolution, pledged their fortunes, lives and sacred honors; and I believe, sir, it would meet with a like resistance and fate. Instead of peace and quiet, it would produce strife and discord. It would involve a contest which I hope the wisdom and patriotism of Congress will avert, by allowing the people of Kansas to frame their own laws and constitution.

Sir, at the election of the 21st December, the slavery clause was voted into the constitution, not by the people of Kansas, but by illegal votes and false returns. Legal investigations have shown that at Oxford, from which there were returned some one thousand votes, there are but forty-two voters. Shawnee, from which there were returned twelve hundred, has but forty legal voters. From Delaware Crossings there were returned some four hundred votes, and it has only forty-three voters. All of those frauds, and others, were for the constitution with slavery, and were reëlected on a more extended scale at the election for State officers and members of the Legislature, on the 4th of January last. Is it claimed that the free-State men should have voted for the constitution without slavery? I have already shown they could not, without voting for slavery and taking an oath to support it if required; for, in either shape, the constitution would establish slavery in Kansas. The people were only allowed the privilege of deciding whether the master should raise or import his slaves. It would have been folly and madness for the people to have bowed to this tyranny, and thrown themselves into the power of those who had destroyed the security of the ballot-box and the sanctity of the laws—who sustain their authority by fraud, violence, and crime.

Sir, at the election held on the 4th of January last, ordered by the Territorial Legislature, and recognized by the President, as appears by his orders to Governor Denver, the people, by an admitted majority of nearly five thousand over the vote for the constitution of the 21st of December, but throwing out the three thousand fraudulent votes then returned, by a real majority of more than eight thousand, pronounced against this constitution, and it now stands a thing condemned and repudiated by the electors of Kansas. They have spoken through the ballot-box, and their verdict of rejection is branded upon this instrument in characters as ineffaceable as the mark that was placed upon the brow of Cain.

In view of these facts and results, Congress should at once pass an enabling act, providing for a convention, and the formation of a constitution by the people of the Territory, subject to their approval. This is the only true and wise course, and would be but an act of simple justice to the deeply-wronged people of Kansas. Let her not be dragged into the Union, crushed by oppression, and compelled to wear the symbols of bondage and shame; rather let her come of her own free will, and be welcomed into the sisterhood of States, arrayed in the white robes of freedom, and chanting the sublime hymn of liberty.

I had hoped that the Administration would recede from its position, and refuse longer to sanction the appalling frauds and wrongs that have thus far produced and accompanied these proceedings which had in view the subjugation of Kansas to slavery; but the policy avowed by the President in his special message forbids this hope. Unmindful of the disapprobation of the people, and their fast gathering indignation, the Administration and its supporters bow in abject obedience to the mandates of the colossus of slavery, that seeks to bedevil the nation.

Sir, the honorable member from Georgia, [Mr.

GARTRELL,] and the honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] while claiming for slavery a Divine origin, and in speaking of it as a social and political blessing, said that the constitutional rights of the South must be maintained at all hazards, and that to do this, Kansas must be admitted under the Lecompton constitution as a slave State, or the Union would be endangered. Sir, does the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the South, and the preservation of the Union, require that we shall, by Executive intervention and congressional legislation, force upon the great body of the people of a Territory a constitution and rulers they repudiate and institutions they loathe? Does it involve an atheistical denial of the common and God-derived heritage of freemen? This is not the maintenance of rights, but the exercise of attributes which belong to tyrants and despots only; and as such will be resisted until the love of liberty and all reverence for the faith of our fathers shall be extinguished. The Constitution and the Union can never be made the dishonored instruments for the accomplishment of such objects without destroying the high purposes for which they were established.

Sir, in the very midst of this discussion, and in the face of these arrogant claims, the great fact stands boldly forth, breaking through and towering above all artifice and sophistry, too clear and plain to be denied or even questioned, that the people of Kansas, in the most solemn manner, and with the forms prescribed by law, have, by an overwhelming majority, declared against this constitution, and against the system of slavery it seeks to rivet upon them.

Notwithstanding all this, the Administration, unavailing to the gaze of the nation its devotion to the interests of slavery, hastens, with the power and influence of the Government it controls, to complete this daring and infamous conspiracy; and urges Congress, at the risk of civil strife and bloodshed, to force not only this constitution, but State officers and the institution of slavery upon the people of Kansas against their expressed and recorded will. Sir, this attempt will awaken a just spirit of retribution; its success would arouse the whole land, and call forth a response from the ballot-box, compared with which the uprising of the people of the free States at the presidential election of 1856, would be but as the whispering of the summer winds to the loud wail and fearful blasts of the awakened tempest.

Sir, I will not further detain the committee on a question when the path of duty is so plain; the real issue from which there is no escape, and the admitted facts on which that issue stands, together with every consideration of right and patriotism, all demand justice for Kansas.

Mr. Chairman, I have uttered my convictions in no spirit of unkindness. None would rejoice more than myself to see the harmony and brotherhood of the olden time restored; but it can never be done through injustice and oppression, nor by bending the powers of the Government to the extension of the institution of slavery—the “bondage of labor,” the palpable evils and destructive tendencies of which are written in legible characters on every soil darkened by its presence, and which was against all of the vital ideas and great truths that are embodied in, and uphold our free Government. It can only be accomplished by returning to the principles which secured that unity of feeling and concord of action; the policy, in this respect, of the very founders of our free institutions, the fathers of the country—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and their associates—who, as if inspired with wisdom from on high, laid strong and deep the foundations of our civil superstructure. They all endeavored to limit and restrict this system of bondage, and looked forward to its final extinction. Their teachings and their voices entreat us not to throw from the nation's heart the worship of freedom, but to maintain in the action and policy of the Government the integrity of the principles they inaugurated, and which alone can give us success and perpetuity as a nation.

Let us, then, return to the policy and keep the faith of our fathers, and clinging to the “wealth of glorious memories” that brighten the pages of our country's history, and the still greater “wealth of more glorious hopes” that crown her future with a beaming and radiant bow of promise, we may hopefully invoke the guidance and protection of a kind and beneficent Providence for our common country. “Length of days be in her right hand; and in her left, riches and honor; may her ways be the ways of pleasantness, and all her paths be peace.”

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, since the passage of the Nebraska bill, I have sought no opportunity here to enforce the views, respecting the power of Congress over the Territories, which I then took occasion to express. I have had inducement, and even provocation, enough to do so. My arguments have been repeatedly replied to, and, indeed, the whole subject has been almost incessantly discussed by gentlemen whose views differ from mine. To be sure, this has been done with uniform courtesy and kindness to me. In my somewhat isolated position, I appreciate it, and I shall return it. But I have been content to be silent. I knew that the time would soon come when the correctness of my views would be shown by results. That time has come already. It was fully accomplished in the late decision of the Supreme Court; and now, sir, standing here, in the midst of predictions fulfilled and forebodings realized, I can look back on the events of the past two years, and feel that no part of the responsibility for the disturbed state of the country rests upon me; and that, if my views and opinions have had any effect at all, they could have none but to allay the discontent of the North, and to moderate the too hasty exultation of the South.

The defense of the Nebraska bill has sometimes betrayed southern gentlemen into the expression of what I deem very erroneous views and opinions. I regret that even the clear and excellent speech of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CURRY,] yesterday, is not altogether free from exception in this respect. Some of these views I propose to notice and to combat, as not merely erroneous, but mischievous. The subject is likely to be one of great practical importance in our proposed legislation for Utah, as well as for Kansas and the other Territories.

It is pleasing to me to know that my difference with my colleagues, and many others of my southern associates, has never been one of doctrine or principle. All that they approved, I approved. All that I disapproved, they also disapproved. The question between us simply was, whether what we approved or what we disapproved was contained in the bill? It was, for the most part, a question of interpretation or construction; and upon this, almost the sole point of difference between us, I take leave to remind them that a large majority of the Democratic party agree with me and differ from my colleagues.

I know, sir, that scarcely anything could have reconciled them to the support of the Nebraska bill but the promised repeal of the Missouri compromise. But what was the course of Congress upon it? That compromise was denounced, on the one hand, as unconstitutional and invidious; it was defended, on the other, as constitutional and right. It would seem, then, that the only thing that Congress could properly do, was either to repeal it, or let it alone, as the one or the other sentiment prevailed. But, strange to say, Congress would do neither.

Either, sir, would have avoided the mischiefs which followed the passage of the Nebraska bill. Had Congress simply repealed its own law of 1820, the former state of things would have revived. It would have fixed the condition of the Territory by its own solemn act, and have left nothing to be determined by the inhabitants. It is true that some violence would have been done to the prejudices and sentiments of the majority of the northern States. Perhaps, sir, their processes would have been lavish of complaints, and an anathema would have been now and then hurled against the authors of the act. But, Mr. Chairman, from the constitution of our nature, men never quarrel long or fiercely upon mere points of speculation and theory. They may differ ever so much, but their differences are harmless when they are confined to matters of abstract opinion. A controversy about the existence of an atmosphere around the moon will hardly ever lead to blows. It is only when opinion is to control conduct, when something is to be acted upon as well as talked about, that contention becomes eager and fierce.

This, then, was the grave and fatal error into which Congress fell. They apparently believed the Missouri prohibition to be unconstitutional; yet their legislation, as I shall presently show, was shaped rather upon the idea of its validity. They declared this prohibition inoperative and void; but they would do so only upon conditions, to which we were required to submit. One was, that slavery, as a legal relation, should not be revived by force of their law, but should depend upon the will of the people who might go into these Territories. The other was, in effect, that no law or regulation relating to slavery, which might have existed prior to the act of 6th March, 1820, should be revived or put in force.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 54.

But for this unfortunate fluctuation—I will not call it trimming—the country would have been spared the calamities which afterwards befell us. Kansas and Nebraska would have been settled, quietly and gradually, by peaceable emigrants from the North and the South. If Abolitionists or anti-slavery men had been urged to go quickly to Kansas, that they might outnumber the men of the South, the answer would have been, “why, what can we effect by a superiority of numbers? Has not Congress fixed the condition of the Territory, and can we deprive the southern emigrant of his legal privilege?” And so, had southern men been urged to anticipate the arrival of northern emigrants and prevent a hostile majority of anti-slavery settlers, their answer would have been, “what should we care about that? Shall we not hold our slaves under a higher warrant than the mere will of a majority of the inhabitants? Can they alter the established order and renew a prohibition which Congress has removed?”

But instead of pursuing this wise and salutary course, Congress adopted one which was alike inconsistent with the grounds on which the bill was to be defended at the North, and with the views previously entertained by almost all classes of politicians at the South. It said—of course not in words, but in effect—“the prohibition of 1820, which transformed a slaveholding into a non-slaveholding Territory, was wrong, and it shall not stand. But we will not restore the Territory to the condition in which we found it. We will revoke our interdiction; but whether it shall be renewed or not—whether slavery shall be allowed or not—shall depend upon the people who may go to take possession of the government we are now providing. Run, then, men of the North and of the South. Let us see which shall go first and in greatest numbers. To the swift and to the strong shall the prize be given.”

Sir, is it to be wondered at that, after thus referring such a controversy to the people, there should have been an immediate rush of emigrants to the scene of strife? In a contest to be settled by numbers, was it strange that each party should seek to swell its forces? Was it likely they would be very scrupulous in the employment of means? For what purpose did they go to Kansas? Why, to determine whether slavery should be allowed or prohibited. From the very nature of their mission, it must needs have been that those who went were the zealots and bigots of their respective sections. They went not to confer upon subjects of common interest, but to proclaim a mutual opposition and defiance; and that, too, upon a question so irritating, so associated with rancorous recollections, as hardly to admit of temperate discussion, even in the Halls of Congress. Sir, it ought to have been foreseen, that when they met, they would meet not only as opponents, but as enemies.

Had the Territory been inhabited before a government was made for it, even these mischievous provisions would not have produced the deplorable results that followed. The intercourse of the inhabitants would have brought them into relations of friendship and familiarity. The daily commerce of life, the customary interchange of good offices, a thousand ties, would have bound together men of opposite political opinions; and when, at last, they came to give expression to these differences of opinion, in the making of laws and the regulation of their domestic affairs, they would have differed as neighbors and friends who knew and esteemed and loved one another. The most extreme party antagonism would have been perfectly consistent with personal good will.

But unhappily we did not wait till the country was inhabited. As I said on a former occasion, when opposing the bill, we planted a government in the wilderness, and then drove a people to take possession of it. Those who went to engage in the strife to which we invited them, met one another, not merely as opponents and enemies, but as strangers. There was nothing in their past intercourse to soften the fierce animosities which stirred them to violence and bloodshed. They recognized each other only as foes; and the rifle and the bowie-knife were, naturally enough, the first arguments used by men whom the law set so far apart that they could not reach one another by the softer appeals of reason. Mr. Chairman, the civil war which followed was the necessary, I may almost say the logical, consequence of these provisions of the Nebraska bill. That civil war was the Nebraska bill in action. Sir, at the instant that these fatal changes were made in the bill, though I had voted with the friends of the measure up to that time, I sprang forward and moved to lay the bill upon the table. From that moment it had no more earnest opponent than I was.

Sir, these objections were such as ought to have been common to all parts of the country and to every variety of political opinion. But let not the northern opponents of the measure take credit to themselves for their course upon it. Let them not boast that they voted against a bill which produced these calamitous results; for it was in deference to their views and wishes, and to conciliate their favor, that the provisions were inserted which caused these results. To them, the sole point of objection was the abrogation of the Missouri compromise; and I have already said that that would have occasioned only a brief and comparatively harmless agitation. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. GOODWIN], who has just taken his seat, could see nothing in the bill which met his disapprobation except the repeal of that compromise. Yet for this cause alone they opposed the bill with warmth and bitterness. Their opposition only stimulated the zeal and ardor of its friends. It should not have been so; but, in the violence of party strife, we too easily persuade ourselves that what our opponents condemn, we ought for that very reason to approve. There are some who, in the words of Iago, “will not serve God if the devil bid them.”

This transfer to the people of the Territories of the entire control and regulation of the slavery question, while it produced convulsions which, at one time, threatened the safety of the Union, was also liable to the very constitutional objections which applied to the Missouri compromise itself. If Congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the Territories, how could it grant such authority to the people of these Territories? How could it delegate to others what it did not possess itself? The government of a Territory is the mere creature of Congress. It is not a self-existent, independent power; it can do nothing which we have not authorized; it can establish nothing which we forbid. In the late decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Dred Scott, it is decided that—

“Congress may establish a territorial government, and the form of this local government must be regulated by the discretion of Congress, but with powers not exceeding those which Congress itself, by the Constitution, is authorized to exercise over citizens of the United States, in respect to their rights of person or rights of property.”

The northern advocates of the Nebraska bill justified the repeal of the Missouri compromise upon the ground that Congress had no power to pass such an act; and yet they compelled or persuaded us to accept a substitute which, while it was even more mischievous in its practical effects, was as palpable a violation of the Constitution as the act which it supplanted.

It will be seen, sir, that I adopt the construction given to the bill by its northern advocates as the just and true interpretation of its meaning and objects. I know that some of my southern friends and associates, and particularly my colleagues, are unwilling to admit this construction. They say that the bill gives no power to the people of these Territories to prohibit slavery, as long as they remain in the condition of Territories, but only authorizes them to do so in forming a State constitution, or after they have become a State.

Indeed, sir! Is this, then, all that is included in that great doctrine of “popular sovereignty,” which is said to be the distinctive feature and the chief excellence of the Nebraska bill? Is this the new article of faith which has been adopted with so much ceremony, and with such an air of resolute defiance, into the creed of caucuses and conventions? Why, sir, if this is all that is meant by popular sovereignty, there is hardly a man in the country, and surely not one in this House, that will dispute it. Who has ever denied that a State may establish or prohibit slavery? And what more is involved in the idea that the people of a Territory may exercise this power in forming a State constitution, than that a State itself may do so? When a Territory becomes a State, it is only as a State that its inhabitants can form a constitution. If they are admitted into the Union, the recognition of them by Congress as a State relates back to the time when they formed their constitution. It is a sort of acknowledgment of their independence, and of their independence at the time of making their constitution. If they are not admitted, why then all their acts were simply void, and they formed no State constitution at all, but only something which they wanted Congress to recognize as a constitution. A State cannot make a constitution for a Territory; nor can a Territory make a constitution for a State. Nothing in our political system is more unlike than a State and a Territory. A State gives power to Congress; but a Territory receives it from Congress. A Territory is the creature of Congress; while Congress is the creator of the States. Congress, then, is not the source of any of the powers exercised by a people in forming a State constitution; but it is the only source of all the powers exercised by the people of a Territory. The exclusion of slavery, therefore, by a State, does not imply any such power in Congress; while its exclusion by a Territory would necessarily imply the possession of the power by Congress.

If it be true, then, that the Nebraska bill concedes to the people of Kansas and Nebraska nothing more than the right to exclude slavery when they form their State constitutions, it would, as I said before, only be the concession of a principle which nobody has ever disputed. And yet many of our southern presses stoutly maintain that this is all Congress ever intended to do; they have diligently impressed this idea on the southern mind; and they quote in support of their views two clauses of the Nebraska bill, one in the first section, which provides that—

“When admitted as a State or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission.”

The other from the sixth section, providing that—

“The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act.”

Now, sir, if these were all the provisions of the bill applicable to this question, there would be much force in their conclusions. There is, however, nothing in these two provisions distinguishing the Nebraska bill from other territorial bills. The first may be found in the acts organizing territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico, in the very words used in the Nebraska bill. The intent and meaning of this provision are obvious enough. It was simply designed to pledge the faith of Congress that these future States should not be refused admission into the Union merely because of their allowing or prohibiting slavery in their constitutions. The other may be found not only in the Utah and New Mexico bills, but, I believe, in every other bill establishing a territorial government.

But there is a further provision in the Nebraska bill, to be found nowhere else. It distinguishes that bill from every other territorial enactment. It is impossible to escape the force of its language. We cannot give it a special application to the forming of a State constitution; for the first section provides for that. We cannot regard it as a description of the general legislative power of the Territory; for the sixth section provides for that. It can be viewed in no other light than as a license or permission to the people of the Territory, while a Territory, to establish or prohibit slavery; and as I shall presently show, if this power cannot be properly exercised by the people of a Territory, it is not because it was not granted in the bill, but only because, under the decision of the Supreme Court, you had no right to grant it. This is the clause to which I refer:

It was "the true intent and meaning of the act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but"—but what?—"to leave the people thereof"—what people? Why, the people of any Territory or State—"perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." What domestic institutions were here intended? Why, among others, that institution which we of the South are accustomed to speak of as our most important domestic institution—the institution of slavery. Who will deny that slavery was one of the domestic institutions which the people of any Territory or State were left perfectly free to form and regulate in their own way?

Ah! but I am sometimes told that this power, as expressly stated in the bill, was granted "subject only to the Constitution of the United States;" and that if its exercise is not consistent with the Constitution, why, then the grant was void; that such a power is not consistent with the Constitution, and, therefore, the grant was not operative or effective; and that Congress, waiving any decision of the constitutional question, intended to submit it to the courts of justice.

Mr. Chairman, every act of Congress is subject to the Constitution. If Congress expressly declare that it shall not be subject to the Constitution, it will be so nevertheless. If they say it shall be subject to it, they do not make it more so than if they said nothing about it. To suppose that such a declaration has any effect at all, is to imply that on some occasions Congress may properly direct that their acts shall not be subject to the Constitution. The expression, therefore, in the most favorable view we can take of it, was wholly without meaning or operation. To me it appears absolutely childish. It reminds us of Dr. Johnson's conditional prayer for the soul of his deceased wife—"if it were lawful."

But, sir, the doctrine involved in this excuse is as mischievous as it is unsound. What right have Congress to waive the consideration of their constitutional authority to do what they propose? Are not our powers defined and limited by the Constitution? And are we not required to take an oath to support it? Are we not as much bound to keep ourselves within the limits of the Constitution as the courts of justice are to keep us there? Are the courts themselves under greater obligations to support the Constitution than we are? I protest against this doctrine that an assumption of ungranted power may be innocent, and even laudable, if we express a willingness that our acts may be annulled when declared unconstitutional. Upon such a principle, what might we not do? We could charter a national bank, subject only to the Constitution; we could lay a duty on exports, subject only to the Constitution; we could grant a title of nobility, subject only to the Constitution. What an easy method for indolent legislators! How much labor and anxiety would be saved in the examination of difficult questions of constitutional law! But, sir, it was the very object of the Constitution, in requiring of us the oath we take, to confine us within the limits marked out for us, and restrain us from going beyond them whenever we might have a mind to do so.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me dwell a little longer on this branch of the question. It is admitted that if Congress has this power, it is granted by the bill. If not, then it is said it is not granted. Then it follows that the words or terms of the law make this grant to the people of these Territories; and if it is not a valid grant, it is only because it is an unconstitutional one. But, sir, how is it ever to be known whether it is a constitutional grant or not? Why, sir, that can never be determined unless these people should undertake to exercise the power delegated to them. If they never claim it, or use it, no opportunity would ever be afforded for testing the question; and thus the very object attributed to Congress by the friends of the bill would be defeated—which was, to submit the question, in the last resort, to the courts. The Territorial Legislatures, then, the inferiors of Congress, were to decide upon the extent and constitutional validity of the grants made by Congress—a subject of too much difficulty and magnitude for Congress itself—and to exercise powers which Congress could not satisfy itself of its own right to use. If they should pass laws excluding slavery, and no question were raised as to the validity of such laws, why, then judgment would go against the South by default, and Kansas and Nebraska would be free-soil Territories. But, of course, such legislation might be contested. The owners of slaves might bring their claims before the courts. But is it certain that they would do so? How many would be willing to carry slaves to Kansas, and brave the hazards and vexations, and the great expense of a protracted law-suit? Why, sir, more than thirty-five years elapsed after the passage of the Missouri prohibition before its constitutionality was contested before the courts of justice.

But suppose a case properly made up and submitted to the judges. From my observation of the judicial character, I think they would decide it, and decide it upon all the views that belong to the subject. But, should they refuse to sift the authority of Congress, under the Constitution, to delegate the power in dispute, and, from deference to the legislative body, affirm the validity of the law; should they too "waive" the constitutional question, would you have any right to complain? You may tell me they have sworn to support the Constitution, and that it is their duty to decide the question. But have we not also taken this oath? And if we may refuse to inquire how far we are laid under restraints by the Constitution, in the discharge of our duties, why may not they?

But, Mr. Chairman, it is a novelty in legislation to make laws with express intent that their meaning and validity shall be canvassed by the courts of justice. Who ever heard before of laws being framed with a view to drive the people into the courts? It should be the object of all laws to keep them, if possible, out of the courts. To attain this end, the most exact and precise language should always be employed, and the legislative intent clearly expressed. Courts are designed for the punishment of those who, either from willfulness or ignorance, disobey the law; and it is the duty of the law-maker to take away any excuse for this disobedience, by a clear expression of his meaning, and, above all, by refraining from the exercise of doubtful and illegal powers that may tend to provoke resistance.

This notion that the courts have an exclusive or superior power to determine all constitutional questions, if not ancient Federalism, was certainly not a part of the creed of ancient Republicanism. If it is intended to ingraft it on the faith of the Democratic party of the present day, I can only enter my humble protest against it. President Jackson properly said that he must administer the Constitution as he understood it; and the duty of Congress is not less imperative.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, attempted to show that the construction given to this bill by its northern supporters, and, indeed, by many of its southern advocates also, is the only one that its language will admit. But in denying, as some of the southern members have done, that it authorizes the Territorial Legislatures to exercise the powers in question, do they not see that they deprive themselves of all excuse for having voted for the bill? For if the Territories cannot legislate for the establishment or exclusion of slavery, how can slavery ever go there, so long as they remain Territories? Congress, in annulling the Missouri compromise, expressly declares that it is not to be understood as legislating slavery into any Territory or State, or excluding it therefrom; but as leaving the whole subject to the people, in the words I have just quoted. Now, if this only authorized them to act upon this subject when they frame a State constitution, and not before; and if, by the clause known as the "Badger proviso," no law or regulation which may have existed prior to 1820, establishing or protecting slavery, is to be revived or put in force, how is it possible that slavery can ever get there, until, as States, they may choose to establish it? Congress will not introduce it. So far from it, they disclaim any such intent, and provide that the former laws shall not be revived or put in force. Don't tell me that the constitution establishes slavery there, for I am speaking of the effect and operation of the Nebraska bill, not of the constitution. I say, that if slavery exists there now, it is in spite of all that the Missouri compromise and the Nebraska bill have done to prevent it.

But how can gentlemen deny that the bill delegated the power to establish or exclude slavery, when it is known to almost every man in the country that the people of Kansas have been in the open exercise of this power ever since the passage of the law? If, in their territorial condition, they had nothing to do with the subject, for what purpose were men sent out from Massachusetts and other northern States, and from Virginia and other southern States? What was the meaning of those earnest appeals and those contributions of money to quicken the emigration to Kansas? Was there nothing to be done? Were no votes to be given? Was there no contest to be decided? Ah! but gentlemen may tell me that the people of Kansas might pass laws, as they have done, in favor of slavery, but could not make any against it. Indeed! Then, when these people were authorized to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, it was intended that they were to do it only in one way, and that was to be not their own way, but our way—the southern way.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is vain to deny that the construction I have given to this clause in the Nebraska bill is the only one it will bear. The force of its language was fully appreciated by southern statesmen only a few years ago. Sir, are you curious to know the origin of this language? We need not go far to find it. It is covered with none of the venerable rust of a remote antiquity, although it has come to be regarded with so much reverence as to be a test of political orthodoxy. It was only in June, 1850, that Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, in opposing the clause in the compromise bill which provided that the territorial governments should not legislate respecting African slavery, and urging that it should be stricken out, because, as he said, he did not want "to perpetuate any institution against the will of the people," uttered this sentiment: "I wish to leave them free to regulate their own institutions in their own way."

To be sure it was a very terse and pointed remark; but we did not then know that this part of Mr. Douglas's speech was a few years afterwards to be enacted into a law. When it was the private sentiment of a single Senator, it did not command the approval of his southern associates. Nay, sir, it was resisted with extraordinary earnestness, and almost with virulence. They insisted on retaining the clause which expressly forbid the Territorial Legislatures to pass any law establishing or prohibiting African slavery. This clause he moved to strike out, and only two southern Senators, Mr. Clay and Mr. Underwood, voted for his motion, while twenty-five voted against it. I cannot resist the desire to read their names. They are Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Clémens, Dawson, Downs, Foote, Houston, Hunter, King, Mangum, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Soule, Spruance, Turney, and Yulee. What a proud reflection it must be for the Senator from Illinois that he should, at last, have succeeded in stamping his pithy little saying upon the statute-book of his country, not only in spite of the opposition of the most eminent statesmen of the South, but with their approval, and by their help; and still more, that they should be now so charmed with it as to insist on making this newborn truth a touchstone of fitness for public station. It was proper that General Cass, too, should partake of this triumph; and it was not strange that, denounced as he had been in the South for the utterance of similar sentiments in his Nicholson letter, he should seize the opportunity presented by the debate on the Nebraska bill to tell us of his perseverance, and exult over his success. He said:

"These bills organizing governments for Nebraska and Kansas grant full legislative power to these Territories over all questions of human concern, including slavery, unless restrained by the Constitution of the United States." *

"This doctrine of the right of the people to legislate for themselves, was, what more than any other, provoked denunciation. It was pronounced by Mr. Calhoun to be the most monstrous doctrine ever advanced by any American statesman."

"Another able and eminent southern Senator considered my opinions so extreme on this point that he said I was the only man who entertained them in this Chamber, or almost beyond it; and in the compromise committee of thirteen it met with little favor, though zealously urged." *

"I am gratified at this occasion of rendering justice to the consistent course of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas], upon this momentous topic. He was found on the right side, and his opinions were expressed with equal firmness and clearness. 'I have always held,' he said, 'that the people have a right to settle these questions as they choose, not only when they come into the Union as a State, but that they should be permitted to do so while a Territory.'"—February, 1854.

Sir, if I, too, did not yield to the influences which produced such changes in the minds of those whose authority I have been accustomed to respect, it may be only an argument of my own insensibility. I do not question the sincerity with which they were submitted to by others. All that I say is, that I simply retained the views which, before that time, we seemed to hold in common. If, considering the force of the mighty wave which then swept over us, I may feel surprise at my own steadfastness, I yet feel no regret. I rejoice, indeed, at the course I pursued; while I acknowledge the pain with which I differed from so many of the representatives of the South.

It may be that, in my humble position, overshadowed by loftier intelligences, the light of this doctrine, so lately risen above the horizon, has not yet reached me. But I protest against the attempt to take from Congress its proper control of the Territories of the United States. Call it by what name you will, territorial sovereignty, popular sovereignty, or squatter sovereignty, I oppose and resist it. What belongs to all the States cannot be withdrawn from their management by any body of emigrants who may go from any of them. Territory may be acquired by the Union for high purposes of State. The general welfare may demand that it be reserved for uses wholly different from those to which the inhabitants might wish to apply it. Must the national will be defeated? Must the public interest, and, it may be, the public safety yield to the caprice or selfishness of those who can claim no other right to govern us than that we have suffered them to dwell upon our lands? No, sir. It is both the right and the duty of the States, acting, as they can only act, through their representatives in Congress, to restrain and govern them. We may concede to them some of the powers of government, and allow them to provide for their own welfare. But they take them only as a grant from Congress. They can do nothing which we are not authorized to do; and it is not always fit that they should be allowed to do what the Constitution may not restrain them from doing. We cannot tell what sort of people may inhabit these Territories. Bad men may pass laws to give a sanction to their own vices; and depraved women may call their wickedness religion. Licentiousness the most disgusting, blasphemy the most daring, crime the most atrocious, may impudently demand to be tolerated and protected as established domestic institutions. What are we to do in this case? Must we regard these evil-doers as separately possessed of his distributive share of the general sovereignty, and therefore free to do as he pleases? Must we let the reputation of our country be tarnished in the sight of the world? Must we become a byword and a reproach among the nations? No, sir; we should, at once, exert our authority and apply the correction. This is the principle which has always been acted upon. In every act establishing a territorial government it is expressly provided that the laws of the Territorial Legislature shall be submitted to Congress for revision, and if disapproved, shall be null and void. But in the Kansas-Nebraska bill we may look in vain for such a clause. It might once have been seen there, but, on the motion of Mr. Douglas, it was stricken out. When these Territories were authorized to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, it was doubtless very consistent that they should be relieved of their subjection to Congress, and made "subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Having considered, Mr. Chairman, and at greater length than I intended, the character and consequences of the first of the two conditions upon which Congress consented to annul the Missouri compromise, I propose to notice, more briefly, I hope, the other condition, the objections to which belong more particularly to the South. I refer, of course, to what is commonly known as the Badger proviso. It provides—

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive, or put in force, any law or regulation which may have existed prior to the act of 6th of March, 1820, either protecting, establishing, prohibiting, or abolishing slavery."

The effect of this provision I discussed, at some length, before the passage of the Nebraska bill, and I do not intend to repeat the arguments which I then used. But the late decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Dred Scott, has given a point and significance to my objections, which they were not admitted to have before; and I wish to view this proviso in the light of that decision.

The territory ceded to the United States by France, in 1803, was, as we all know, a slaveholding country throughout its whole extent. The institution of domestic slavery was recognized and established by law before we acquired it. It was confirmed and sanctioned by the treaty with France, at the moment we acquired it, and was protected by several congressional and territorial enactments afterwards. It would have continued a slaveholding country to this hour—a country in which slavery or involuntary servitude was a fixed and legal relation between persons—but for the passage of the act of the 6th of March, 1820, known as the Missouri compromise, by which it was enacted that in so much of it as lay north of 36° 30', slavery and involuntary servitude should be forever prohibited.

This simple prohibition is all that Congress then thought it necessary to do to exclude slavery from that country. It is all that was ever done until the passage of the Nebraska bill. If, then, slavery was ever abolished there, it was by that act of 1820, and nothing else. If it was not, and could not be, rightfully and constitutionally abolished by that act, then it never was abolished at all; for that was the only act which undertook to prohibit it.

Now, sir, the Supreme Court of the United States has lately decided that the prohibition in that act was unconstitutional, and utterly null and void; that it was wholly nugatory, and without any valid force or effect. This being so, the territory continued to be a slaveholding country; slavery, or involuntary servitude, continued to be an established and legal relation between persons; and would have so continued to this day, but for the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854. If the Nebraska bill had never passed, then, as soon as the judgment of the Supreme Court was made known, declaring null and void the Missouri compromise, which was the only impediment that had ever been thrown in the way of the slaveholder, the right to hold slaves would have been secured by existing laws to the same extent precisely as before the passage of that act. But the Nebraska bill undertakes to annul those laws, by providing, in the language I have just quoted, that they shall not be revived or put in force. In other words, the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court was to annul the Missouri prohibition absolutely, and without any conditions; while the Nebraska bill imposes upon the South very hard and unfavorable conditions. And yet this bill has been supposed to flatter southern opinion and advance southern interest.

Why, sir, now that the Supreme Court has decided the Missouri compromise to be unconstitutional, their decision is of no practical value to us whatever. If we go to Nebraska and say, "here, under the judgment of the Supreme Court, may we hold our slaves in security and find adequate laws for our protection?" we shall be told, "softly, gentlemen; it is true that that judgment has annulled the original prohibition which legislated slavery out of the Territory; but you forget that your own Nebraska bill expressly declares that it was not your intention to legislate slavery back again into the Territory. You forget that your own Nebraska bill, to put that intent beyond all doubt, prevents the revival or putting in force of those very laws whose protection you are now counting upon. You forget that your own Nebraska bill leaves it to us, the inhabitants of the Territory, to say whether those laws, or any other laws, for your protection, shall be revived or put in force; and we have not thought it proper to revive them, or put them in force. We shall let them sleep on."

If we go to Kansas we shall find that there—yes, there, after a fierce and desperate struggle, involving the most deplorable sacrifice of property and life, estranging the people, and threatening even the destruction of the Union—we have succeeded in getting back to the position which we voluntarily abandoned a short time before; but only to find ourselves surrounded with such circumstances of embarrassment, uncertainty, and danger, that our very victory has almost undone us.

Gentlemen may tell me, as some gentlemen have told me, "how could we know that the Supreme Court would decide the Missouri compromise to be unconstitutional?" Gentlemen may tell me that I am attempting to justify my vote against the Nebraska bill by relying upon events which had not then happened, which were not then known, and which could not be then foreseen. I know, sir, that it is no uncommon thing to excuse a false step in statesmanship by seizing upon an unexpected accident which converts the blunder into a happy stroke of policy. But, fortunately, I am enabled to show that it was not the decision of the Supreme Court which first suggested to me those objections to the Nebraska bill which I am now presenting; that these very objections formed a part of the considerations which influenced my course; and that they were, in public and open debate, communicated to the House. On the 10th day of May, 1854, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD], now before me, in the course of a very candid speech upon the bill, in which, while he pointed out with great clearness and force many objections to it, yet declared his purpose to vote for it, made this request of me:

"I ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], who spoke the other day in opposition to this bill, to tell me, and tell the committee, how the passage of this bill could work an injury to the South?"

"Mr. MILLSON. Does the gentleman wish a reply?"

"Mr. SEWARD. I do."

"Mr. MILLSON. As the gentleman desires that I should reply to his inquiries, I will, with pleasure, accede to his request; of course, I can now say but a few words. In the remarks to which the gentleman alludes, I commenced by showing that the South had always been in opposition to the organization of a government in Nebraska. I explained, to some extent, the reasons which had induced southern gentlemen to oppose the establishment of a territorial government there. I then stated that inducements were found necessary to be held out to us to overcome these objections. It was supposed that a repeal of the Missouri compromise would remove them. I undertook to examine into the real weight and value of the inducements held out. My purpose was to show that, under the operation of the Badger proviso, the seeming repeal of the Missouri compromise would be nullified, and that the restriction would still be in operation. And now I will state how, as I understand it, the South will be injured by the passage of this bill with that proviso, to a greater extent than by the continuance of the Missouri compromise itself."

"Mr. SEWARD. That is what I want to know."

"Mr. MILLSON. I will tell the gentleman. The Missouri compromise simply prohibited slavery in the territory north of 36° 30', but did not undertake to repeal any law, either of Congress or of the Territorial Legislature, by which slavery had, before that time, been protected there."

"Now, sir, if this Missouri compromise act should be declared to be unconstitutional, as many gentlemen maintain it is, then these laws protecting slavery would immediately be put in force again, because nothing now interferes with them but a law which, by the supposition, is unconstitutional and void. But the Badger proviso, in effect, keeps up the Missouri restriction, and repeals the preexisting laws by which slavery was protected in that territory, by providing that they shall not be put in force. Whatever may be thought of the constitutionality of the Missouri compromise act, no one can doubt the constitutionality of the Badger proviso, to the extent of its application to the legislation of Congress and the territorial government. No man can doubt that Congress have the power of repealing laws already made by themselves, or by their authority. In this state of the case, therefore, the Missouri compromise, if declared unconstitutional, would leave the laws protecting slavery in full force, while the Badger proviso would repeal those laws, and therefore operate more injuriously to the South."

Sir, is it not strange that the advocates of the Nebraska bill, who excuse all that is unconstitutional in their own measure, by saying it was intended to refer it to the decision of the courts, should not have seen that the easiest way of setting the question of the power of Congress over slavery in the Territories, was to subject the Missouri compromise itself to the decision of the courts? What was the use of passing a new law for the purpose of raising a question for the courts, when the very same question was presented by a law already existing? If southern gentlemen supposed that this question would be decided against us, what did they expect to gain by the Nebraska bill? If they believed it would be decided in our favor, as they say they did, and as it lately has been, how could they overlook the disadvantages of the new bargain they entered into, in annulling all the laws which had protected slavery, and in surrendering the institution itself to the hazards of a popular majority? Well might Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, say, in his letter to Mr. Leake, last October, that the "bill was not such as would have been framed by the delegates from either section, if it had been submitted to them alone." Yes, sir, it was a NEW COMPROMISE to supplant an old compromise. It was the Missouri compromise superseded by the Nebraska compromise; and I trust I have shown that the new was even more disadvantageous to us than the old. How long it will be before this will, in its turn, be superseded by some more modern contrivance for making everybody support what nobody is in favor of, of course I cannot tell.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHAFFEE. Mr. Chairman, my constituents have grave objections to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and they expect at my hands, as their Representative, an honest expression of their views. This must be my excuse for trespassing upon the time of the House on this occasion.

The history of the Territories of the United States that have passed through the period of their gristle and growth to maturity, and become sovereign States, forms an important study for the statesman of the present day. When we reflect that since the present organization of our Government, now but sixty-nine years, we have added more to our territorial limits than they then possessed; and that from it have grown eighteen sovereign States, with a population now of fifteen or more millions, and whose wealth reaches the enormous sum of two thousand million dollars, their importance becomes apparent; and especially is this importance enhanced and exalted when we reflect that the peopling of our present Territories, to say nothing of our future acquisitions, is not half accomplished. We have now remaining more territorial space unorganized by any government than as yet occupied; and yet the American mind and heart seems not to grasp these future commonwealths in their importance or their destiny.

At the present hour, there are three of our Territories ready for admission into the family of States, on the same terms of exact equality with the original thirteen. Why do they ask this, and why should we, the Representatives of the American people, admit them within the pale of this Union? They ask this, because of their affection toward the people from whom they emigrated, when they exchanged the refinements and cultivated society of the older States to seek to better their condition among the sturdy sons of the frontier; and because such, they understand, is the fulfilling the compact made with the inhabitants of the Territories, even before the adoption of our present Constitution, and guaranteed and indorsed by the makers of that instrument in the first session of Congress held under it. They have kept the compact on their part, and they come back to us, the Representatives of the whole American people, and ask us to keep ours.

I have intimated that the history of our territorial possessions and governments was an important study to the statesman of to-day; and I have hinted at the reasons for this importance. And yet the President, in his message to this House on the 2d day of February, has apparently never read the early history of the Territory of Kansas! The earliest date of his historic facts goes no further back than the formation of the Topeka constitution. All that preceded this instrument was in black letter, and hence antiquated, and so unsuited to the dignity and genius of this "Young America" Administration, or of so little importance as to escape recollection or notice of the Chief Magistrate. With all due deference, and with pardon, I cannot agree with the President that this history is of no consequence; on the contrary, I think it is of such vast importance that there can be no right appreciation or understanding of the affairs and true condition and aspect of its interests and hopes, unless these facts, that to the President's mind lie buried in oblivion, are continually held up to the public gaze, that their light may help us to interpret all subsequent facts.

Why, I ask the President of the United States or his friends who sustain his message—why did the people of Kansas adopt the Topeka constitution? Was it to "organize rebellion," as the President intimates? Was it the result of a fixed and settled determination to live the lives of lawless freebooters, in violation of all law, human and divine? Was it a feverish restlessness impatient of wholesome restraint, with a desire to live, on the part of a whole people, Ishmaelitic lives, with their hands against every man, and every man's hand against them? Surely this cannot be true. The belief would, if possible, be more monstrous than the document that insinuates it. Men who desire to lead lives of lawless violence do not commit the folly of placing themselves voluntarily and by choice under written law. They ignore all law, and treat with contempt its officers. I respectfully submit that such has not been the fact with the people of Kansas, who constructed and adopted the Topeka constitution.

The bill organizing the Territory of Kansas became a law May 30, 1854; and has proved the author of "all our woes." In the month of October following, Governor Reeder arrived in the Territory, and ordered an election for a Delegate to Congress. This election was held on the 29th day of November of the same year. At this election General Whitfield received 2,258 votes, 1,729 of which were found to be illegal; or, in other words, were placed in the ballot-boxes by persons not residents of the Territory, but by persons living in an adjoining State, who kindly volunteered their sovereignty to their friends in the Territory for the purpose of the franchise. Here, then, it seems, we have a beginning; and I respectfully commend to the perusal of the President House Document No. 200 of the first session Thirty-Fourth Congress. In January and February, 1855, the then Governor of the Territory caused a census of its inhabitants to be taken; and, as its result, it was found that 2,905 men were qualified to vote for a Territorial Legislature; and, on the 30th day of March, the election for members was held. The result of that election showed, not that the whole 2,905 voters had deposited their votes, or that a large portion of them had done so, but that, within one month of the completion of the census, the vote was swelled to the number of 6,309—pro-slavery votes, 5,429; free-State, 791; with 89 scattering, in all, 6,309: legal votes cast, 1,410; illegal votes, 4,900. Now, where did these illegal votes come from, and how did it happen that they were cast? I answer, they came from the border counties of Missouri, and were forced into the ballot-box by violence and fraud. I have not time to quote the proof on this subject, but must beg the President and his admirers to consult the document above quoted, and I will promise them they will find it rich in historic lore, and that it sheds a flood of light on this dark era in the history of Kansas. Why, sir, if we are to believe this document—and who can disbelieve it?—Kansas has already a history crowded with events that will pale the ineffectual lights of many of the old States.

The men, thus elected, assembled in the place indicated by the Governor and proceeded to business, and without stopping to characterize the result of their labors as history will do when she comes, after the passion and excitement consequent upon the questions of the times shall have subsided, but simply remarking in passing that the Code of Draco were mild in comparison, we come at once to the Topeka convention and the Topeka constitution. This reserved right of all free people was not resorted to till all expectation of obtaining a recognition of their just claims, by the usurpers of their government, had been hopelessly abandoned. So far from allowing them to redress their grievances through the ballot-box, they were systematically and persistently shut out from this means of redress. Test oaths were required of them, and even if they had possessed the meanness and cowardice to submit to their imposition, they had no guarantee from the usurpers that violence should not again be brought into requisition, nor that the inhabitants of the border counties would not again be emptied upon them. In this condition, and from this exigency sprang the Topeka convention, which produced the Topeka constitution.

I call especial attention to the fact that this constitution, which marks the era of the President's historical knowledge on the subject of Kansas affairs, was entirely provisional in its character—wholly and absolutely provisional; that it has never assumed or exercised any of the powers of an actual government, but has simply held its organization in readiness, in case of its being sanctioned by Congress; or, failing in that, in the alternative of the people being driven to a forcible resistance to the foreign usurpation and despotism designed to crush them out, and which might become too intolerable to be submitted to. This is the whole of this Topeka constitution. True, officers were elected under it—a Governor, a Legislature, &c.—but if they ever attempted the functions of these offices, where is the proof of it? I deny the charge, and demand the proof. What act is overt here? None. Nor can the President specify.

The complaint of the President against the people of the Territory, for the formation of the Topeka constitution, is not without its parallel in the history of this country. The same complaint was once made against the colony of Massachusetts, by George III. He had attempted to bring that colony to terms of submission by repealing the charter, and thus destroying the colonial government. But to his utter surprise and consternation, with that of British statesmen generally, the colony did not seem to be affected in the slightest degree. Her voluntary associations, through her committees, commanded and received the obedience of the people, to a degree to which the hitherto colonial government was a stranger; and this without the bustle and bloodshed of a revolution, but springing spontaneously from the people. And, sir, it is obedience that makes a government, and not the formalities by which it is instituted, or the name by which it is called. Do the people prefer, and will they yield a more cheerful obedience to, the Topeka constitution? Then it is the best constitution for the people of Kansas. And yet the President characterizes this whole Topeka movement as a rebellion; and all objection to the rule and reign of the usurpers as "open defiance of the Constitution and laws." What constitution? What laws? But here is what the President says of the message of the Governor under the Topeka constitution:

"The very first paragraph of the message of Governor Robinson, dated on the 7th of December, to the Topeka Legislature, now assembled at Lawrence, contains an open defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Well, what does that wicked Governor say, in such a defiant tone, against that palladium of our liberties—that hope of the struggling millions of earth's imbruted sons—our glorious Constitution? And here the President quotes him in all his diabolism of purpose and language, as a warning to the froward, and an encouragement to the faithful:

"The Governor says: 'The convention which framed the constitution at Topeka originated with the people of Kansas Territory. They have adopted and ratified the same twice by a direct vote, and also indirectly through two elections of State officers and members of the State Legislature. Yet it has pleased the Administration to regard the whole proceeding revolutionary.'"

Here, then, we have the Governor's wicked, treasonable, and rebellious "defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States;" and it is "open!" Not secretly, as if the grace of shame, and some slight compunctious visitings of conscience, were left him; but "open" and exposed to the gaze of an astonished world, and the President of the United States. But this is not all, nor indeed the worst feature in this Topeka movement; for the Governor, under this constitution, not only "openly" defies the Constitution and laws," but they—that is, the Governor and his friends—"adhere" to it. The President says:

"This Topeka government, adhered to with such treasonable pertinacity, is a government in direct opposition to the existing government prescribed and recognized by Congress."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the President has made a discovery of one of two things—either a new kind of "treason," or of "pertinacity." To adhere to the Topeka government with some kind of "pertinacity," I suppose would not be incompatible with its running parallel with "the existing government prescribed and recognized by Congress;" but to adhere to it with such "treasonable pertinacity!" brings it into "direct opposition" to it. But what government has "Congress prescribed" for Kansas? I had thought that under the new, improved patent for governing the territories, they (the Territories) "were to be left perfectly free to form their own institutions;" that Congress had no prescriptions to make, and if they did, the patient was under no obligations to swallow them. So that these men are standing upon their reserved rights and the "organic law." They have simply taken the Government at its own words, and proceeded to "form their own institutions in their own way," and not in the way of any other men, or body of men. But the President argues in his message that their way is "illegal," "revolutionary," "rebellious," and "treasonable." I answer, if the people of the Territories are to be left "perfectly free," whose office is it to interfere to prevent them from exercising that "perfect freedom?" Such interference is a violation of the spirit and letter of the Kansas act, that was passed as a great "pacificatory measure," that was to bring peace to a distracted country! that was to be the harbinger of good will throughout the Republic! the angel of that political millennium that would bring healing upon his wings! And he who should intervene to arrest or disconcert the people in their freedom in "adjusting their institutions in their own way," would be held justly responsible for all the discord and ill feeling that might follow by that great party of patriots, sometimes known as the African Democracy of the country.

Sir, I am aware that the gentleman from Indiana, the other day, filed a caveat, on the principle of popular sovereignty—or upon his "improvement," and I hardly know which. The improvement, if that is what is intended, the committee will recollect, was, that the people of his State did not understand popular sovereignty till after the last presidential election. I question whether this is patentable, for I doubt both its novelty and utility; and I think he might have saved himself all trouble in the premises, so far as this side of the House is concerned, for I know of no one here who has any ambition to be the champion of such a monstrosity as this popular sovereignty has shown itself to be, as defined and illustrated by the Democratic party for the last four years. No, sir, we are none of us, I trust, "ambitious for ridicule," none of us "absolutely candidates for disgrace," as we should most assuredly attain, were we to attempt the championship of this hybrid. No, sir; but we propose to hold you to the letter and spirit of the bond. Give to these people what you promised, for the contract canceled in which they were to be benefited. "Give them the bond."

But, Mr. Chairman, the whole argument of the message seeks to establish the wickedness of the people of Kansas in resisting the usurpers of her government; but it attributes their wrongheadedness to their devotion to the Topeka constitution, and not to a fixed and settled determination not to submit to be ruled by a foreign, invading force. This drift of the message is easily accounted for by the fact that its author was ignorant of the history of events in the Territory prior to the Topeka convention. Had he been as well versed in that history as the members of this House, he would never have fallen into this "grave error;" but he would have seen in their action much to admire, and less to condemn. It has been suggested, by one who believes in "compromises," that the statute of limitation should, by common consent, be allowed to expire on the President's recollection of facts prior to the Topeka convention. But the President's remedy for the existing difficulties is not only a remedy, but a punishment, upon these offending citizens of Kansas; and, sir, I respectfully suggest that the punishment is vastly disproportionate to the crime alleged. To force upon an unwilling and patriotic people a constitution that they loathe and abhor in all its details, for the crime of loving another as much as they loathe this, is cruelty, is tyranny, is despotism.

Sir, the President does not seem to realize that he charges a whole people with crime. If it be true that the people of Kansas are rebels against the Constitution and laws of the United States, why has he not crushed it out? Has it been for want of a disposition? He has certainly shown a zeal worthy of a better cause, in sustaining the government of the usurpers. Has it been for want of means? He tells you himself that he has detained the United States troops in Kansas, as a posse comitatus, to put down rebellion, and we all know he has exposed a small number of the bravest men that ever bore arms to the frosts and famine of a Rocky Mountain winter, as well as to annihilation by the Mormons of Utah. He has not attempted it simply because he could find no circumstance upon which to hang a spectious justification of such action. Why does not the President bring them to trial for their treason? Sir, I am here reminded of a passage which occurs in the speech of Burke on the conciliation of the colonies, delivered in the British House of Commons, March 22, 1775. George III. made substantially the same complaint against the people of the colonies that the President now makes against the people of Kansas. One of the modes proposed by the Ministry, in the name of the King, to dispose of this spirit of rebellion, was, to prosecute it in its overt acts, as criminal. In answer to this proposition, Mr. Burke said:

"At this proposition I must pause a moment. The thing seems a great deal too big for my ideas of jurisprudence. I should seem, to my conceiving of such matters, that there is a very wide difference in reason and policy, between the mode of proceeding on the irregular conduct of scattered individuals, or even of bands of men, who disturb from time to time the State, and the civil dissensions which may, from time to time, on great questions, agitate the several communities which compose a great empire. It looks to me to be narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to this great contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people. I cannot insult and ridicule a whole people. I am not ripe to pass sentence on the gavel public bodies intrusted with magistracies of great authority and dignity, and charged with the safety of their fellow citizens upon the same title that I am. I really think that for wise men this is not judicious; for sober men, not decent; for minds tinctured with humanity, not mild and merciful."

Sir, I commend these views, so sound, so just, so patriotic, so statesmanlike, to the President and his advisers; to the great party with a hitherto invincible name, I commend these sentiments, and I warn them not to push these people till endurance shall cease to be a virtue. The people of Kansas are called rebels and traitors by those high in authority, with a readiness that seems to argue but slight obliquity of political action. So were the men of the colonial period, and they were attempted to be dragooned into submission. On the 1st of October, 1768, two regiments of British regulars were landed in Boston: to do what? To protect the royal Governor, to aid him in executing the laws. For two years, now, the regulars of the United States have been in Kansas to protect—not a royal Governor, but a presidential Governor; to aid him in executing the laws. What laws? In the first instance, the laws forced upon the colonies, against their consent, and without their representation, in the last laws passed by a usurping Legislature, elected by fraud and violence, and in which the people of the Territory were not represented.

Sir, the people of Kansas are termed a lawless, and order-hating people, because they refuse submission to the government of a foreign invader; but, to me, their quiet, their patience, their hoping on and hoping still, amid all their discouragements, are amazing. There is but a single instance in our country's history that affords a parallel, and that instance is found in the patience, endurance, fortitude, and indomitable courage, of the people of Boston, from the landing of the British soldiery in her streets to the firing of the first gun that ushered in the morning of the Revolution. The people of Kansas can well afford to be both patient and long-suffering in the cause of great constitutional and inalienable rights; for their fathers have covered their names with immortal glory in the same cause; and it is but right and natural that the children should imitate the parents and share their glory.

Sir, the national Administration has arrayed itself against the people, and with their invaders, usurpers, and tyrants. Against a people always patient, patriotic, and peaceful; and with their invaders always rapacious, domineering, and insolent. Not only has the Chief of this national Administration taken this ground in his recent message, but practically in his appointments to territorial offices. What man, sympathizing with the great mass of the citizens of Kansas, has ever received a commission at the hands of the Executive? Not one. What penalty has been meted out to the invaders of their soil, and that great palladium of popular liberty, the ballot-box? They, sir, have been the recipients of Executive favor and patronage! Their usurped authority and power have been confirmed by the Executive edict, enforced by the cannon and bayonets of the Federal troops: all this has been done on the soil yet wet with the blood of the martyrs of the Revolution—on the only soil consecrated to popular liberty, and sealed by the death of its heroes. And, sir, the President fully indorses and defends the shameless frauds against the people, by promptly discharging from office the men who expose them.

In a controversy of this character—involving, as it does, all that honest liberty-loving men hold dear—I plant myself on the side of the people, and join them in their "holy war" against this giant iniquity, against this high-handed wrong; on the side of a whole people; a people of free white men, highly intelligent, cultivated, and patriotic, going from all the States of the Union to plant the institutions of peace for themselves and their children, and desiring only to be secured in the simple enjoyments of peace and tranquility in their domestic pursuits. With these people I choose to cast my lot. I know that against me and them is arrayed the colossal power of the State; but I also know that had not the Chief of the Administration been smitten with a judicial blindness, this could not have occurred.

To propitiate the genius of slavery propaganda, the Government is now engaged in the hopeless and fruitless effort, not alone to fasten slavery upon an unwilling people, but in accomplishing this to strike out the very foundation stones from the edifice of republican liberty.

Sir, what is the President's argument upon which he relies, to meet and silence the actual existing facts, as touching the will of the people of the Territory; the returns of elections, and these returns made by whom? by whom? I ask you, sir, do you believe one word of their report? do they not stand before you perjured in the foulest manner? does the civilized world credit for a moment the atrociously fraudulent returns made by these men? Does the President believe it? Nay, sir, I will not do him this injustice; and yet upon these election returns he relies for a justification of the great wrong he is now pressing upon this House to consummate against this people. Nay, he is not even content with this, but demands that the people shall be made slaves, to it and by it; and sorry am I to say it, but it appears to me that his partisans in this House, are only too anxious to second the demand, and carry out the high behests of the President. Sir, the President knows—none better than he—that this whole base progeny was conceived in fraud and unscrupulous violence; that being shapen in sin, and brought forth in iniquity, the child justifies its parentage, though it does not justify the President in attempting to force its paternity upon a people whose rights have not only been violated but trampled under foot by this Executive bantling.

Sir, it is not true, as the President and his friends hold, that the ballot-box is more sacred than the rights it guards; it is not true, as the friends of the Administration would have us believe, that the formal papers, that place bad men in office—whether these papers are true or false, whether by usurpation or by fair dealing—are more sacred than the dearest and most cherished rights of man; and yet the President so reasons in his message. Nay, more; that obedience to these formal papers, whether true or false, is "law and order;" and disobedience and opposition he characterizes as "rebellion" and "treason against the Constitution and laws of the United States." A whole people to rebel: against what? Why, against themselves, the sovereigns, of course! Nine tenths of the people guilty of treason: treason against what? Why, treason against the government, of course. What government? Why the usurped government—a government of invaders and marauders, against which the people have always protested, and to which they never will yield obedience.

But, Mr. Chairman, the present aspect of the questions before the country to-day is significant in another point of view. The national Administration, by its present position, not only seeks to fasten slavery upon the Territory and future State of Kansas, but it also seeks to make slavery a permanent element in our national politics.

All understand that two different systems of labor prevail in this country, and that the division is entirely sectional—the South alone employing unpaid black slave labor, and the North employing paid white labor. Between these two systems there is a natural and eternal antagonism; and as labor is the source of all wealth—national and individual—each of these two systems is struggling for ascendancy, and for the fostering care of Government. It has been somewhat frequently observed of late, that “this Government was made for white men;” but, sir, there is a large number of persons in this land to-day that would like some better proof of this than naked assertion. So thoroughly has the African Democratic party committed itself to the interests of slave labor, and against free labor, that there has come to be a prevailing sentiment that no other interest can gain a respectful hearing, even at the hands of this Administration.

For what purpose has the President sanctioned the frauds and wrongs committed against the people of Kansas, but to force the institution of African slavery upon them? Why, but to give that vast domain to be tilled and cultivated by men possessed of “no rights that white men are bound to respect,” and with no motive, but one six feet long, with a cracker attached to the end of it? Sir, I dislike to arraign the motives of men, but upon no other hypothesis can I account for the action of this Administration. The white laborers of this country have an imperishable interest in this question; it is nothing less than whether the unoccupied territories of this country shall be given over for the benefit of a class of men who own the laborer and the fruits of his hands, or whether it shall be developed by the skill and toil of the free laborer, and shall be an inheritance to him, and his children after him, for an everlasting possession?

Nor is this all; for, involved in this issue, is the great question of the rights and dignity of labor, as a part of the political economy of the country and of the world. None better know than the present Administration, that the fastening of slavery upon Kansas would diminish the cash value of its real estate one half, and from this depression she would never recover; and that giving the people the rights guaranteed to them by the organic act, would double its value. Nor is this all. The wealth and power of any nation is measured by the value of its productive industry; and none can doubt, who has paid the slightest attention to the statistics on this subject, that free labor is more than twice as productive as slave labor. If any doubt this, I commend to them the statistics of the census returns of 1850.

Notwithstanding this array of reasons and facts, which should be a guide to prudent statesmen, we find this Administration fully committed to the policy of forcing the institution of slavery, with all its attendant evils, against the remonstrances of its people, against their direct vote at the ballot-box to the contrary, against all the forms of reputable supplication, even against the admonitions and warnings of those best qualified to judge in the matter, that civil war will follow the despotic act, and the plains and prairies of Kansas will smoke with the warm blood of our fellow-citizens, shed by their brothers' hands; in spite of all this, the Administration rushed madly upon this policy. What infatuation! What madness! What folly! And for what is all this to be hazarded? To give Kansas to slave labor, and thereby shut out free labor from the State. Is this an object worthy of a great statesman—one who has spent a large portion of a long life in the public service?

Does this Democratic party know that labor has rights which it is bound to protect? Does this party know that there is such a principle as a democracy of wealth, and that it is labor?

It was a remark of Samuel Adams, if it is not incendiary and sectional to quote him here, that “where private rights were infringed, there tyranny began.” By applying this rule to the treatment bestowed upon the people of Kansas by this Administration, some light may be thrown upon the character of the executive intervention. The Administration have systematically trampled upon every right of this people; and whenever and wherever its agents have refused to carry out its mandates, “the decree, remorseless as death, has gone forth, “off with his head;” so much for Reeder, so much for Shannon, so much for Geary, so much for Walker, and so much for Stanton; and unless this bill passes before the next session of Congress, I predict you will see General Denver trudging home with his head in a basket. Why, sir, Kansas has become a Golgotha of Democratic Governors; for the head of each of those sent there, is, without an exception, left to bleach and whiten on the plains of Kansas. To such an extent is this carried, and so true is it, that it has become the bourn from whence no political traveler returns; and for aught that appears to the contrary in the President's message, this may be one strong reason in his mind for urging the admission of Kansas—thus preventing the decimation of the party by destroying its Kansas Governors to such an extent that the Republicans will have an easy victory over it in 1860.

But, sir, this is foreign to my purpose; for the subject, in this free land, of arraying a great party, and that party the reigning one, against the free labor of the country, and fostering in its stead slave labor, thus rearing an hereditary aristocracy, is too serious in its consequences to be trifled with, but is one to be treated with solemnity commensurate with its importance. Its consequences are not confined to to-day, or to this generation of men; but they are to be far-reaching and absorbing, and in the end overwhelming. It is nothing less than to Africanize the Government in all its relations. Gentlemen who make wry faces at the Lecompton constitution, admitting it to be an atrocious outrage and fraud upon the people, but conclude to shut their eyes and swallow it, for the purpose of ending all further controversy, will have ample time for repentance before the agitation ends.

And now, I ask of the conservative men of the South if they are willing that the institution of slavery shall take this additional load upon itself, in this day and generation? Is it not enough that it has concentrated upon itself the world's unmitigated scorn, but it must needs take upon itself the additional burden of seconding the Administration in its crusade against the free labor of the country? Are you, the conservative slaveholders of the country, willing to allow the institutions of your section to become the cause and instrument of the further aggrandizement of this Administration—of building up and further extending the power and rule of the African Democracy of this country, who seek by their policy to Africanize the productive industry of the country? I tell gentlemen plainly, that while chivalry once had a name and a prestige, yet in these African-Democratic hands its gold has become dim and its luster is faded; and unless it is speedily rescued, its glory will have departed forever. Sir, the civilized world cannot, and will not, look on complacently, and see this great and monstrous wrong consummated upon this people; and their anathemas and execrations will be hurled against the institution in whose name and in whose behalf it is perpetrated.

The disposition of this and the past Administration has been clearly manifested in regard to the affairs in the Territory of Kansas, by the historical fact, shown by special messages and public documents, as well as its secret intrigues, that it has at all times taken sides with the usurpers of its Government, and against Governors of its own appointment. And, Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable fact, that every sober, decent man, who has gone out to Kansas in behalf of the Government, has been sustained by the people, and as uniformly destroyed by the national Executive. Look at another fact upon the very surface of the late message of the President. The complaints against the people by Governor Walker, on his arrival in the Territory, before he had had any opportunity to become acquainted with the disturbing causes in operation there, are all elaborately quoted by the President; while his maturer views, his riper judgment, made up against his prejudices and his preconceived opinions, but forced from him by stubborn facts, that transpired under his own vision—these are all suppressed; to these the President is oblivious.

But, sir, the President goes further in his efforts to sustain the usurpers of the government in Kansas, and in their aid to drive out the free laborers of that Territory, to make way for slave labor;

thus seeking to Africanize the Territories, and drive out the free man. Not satisfied with throwing the entire weight of his influence and patronage into the scale against the rights of the people, he invokes the aid of the Federal judiciary, hoping thereby to seal the conclusion and arrest the argument. The very manner with which he brings it forward in his message, reveals the inward satisfaction in which he indulges in having at his hand so potential an auxiliary. He says:

“It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States.”

And his feeble echoes here and through the country, have reiterated the same grave charge against the Supreme Court of the United States. Sir, I am no lawyer, but some of my constituents are; and with the argument of one of them, I reply that I utterly deny that any such question has ever been adjudicated by the Supreme Court. No such question has yet been presented to that court for its consideration; and I respectfully submit whether it is competent, nay, whether it is possible, for any tribunal to decide any question not presented; or is it possible and competent for a court of law to decide upon any question that may suggest itself to any of its members during its sittings, whether of law or politics? I take it, sir, and to my poor comprehension it is entirely clear, that the court will travel from its jurisdiction and functions when it attempts to consider or decide any other question than that presented by the case; and I respectfully submit that the existence of slavery in the Territories, by “virtue” of our Constitution, has never been presented to the court. I do not deny, nor doubt, but the court have given an opinion that such is the fact; but that opinion is not a decision, and is worth just as much—and no more, under the circumstances—as the opinion of the same number of respectable lawyers touching the same fact. The dictum of the court is a very different affair from a decision—the one is binding until it is reversed, the other simply an intimation of what their decision would be were the question before them in a legal condition to be adjudicated.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time the President has quoted this court to sustain him in his position, in taking sides with the usurpers against the people of Kansas. He refers to it in nearly the same language in his letter to some gentlemen in Connecticut, last September; and this, to me, constituted one of the characteristics of that remarkable letter, for I believe it is the first time in the history of the Government, when a President of the Republic has deemed it expedient to reply to a petition of the citizens, and to improve the occasion to deliver them a lecture on patriotism in general and their duties in particular. But de gustibus non est disputandum is as true now as when uttered for the first time.

The doctrine of the President, as drawn from his message, and I believe of the whole African Democratic party to-day is, that slavery exists in all our Territories until they are organized into States. This doctrine has the merit, at least, of being novel and entirely contrary to the views of all American statesmen till within a very recent period.

And, sir, I must be allowed to inquire by what law slavery exists in our Territories? and what consequences are to flow from this doctrine? Slavery is not an abstraction, but, as the logicians say, is a thing in the concrete. The institution exists in this country by virtue of local law. All its powers are given and all its features are molded by municipal law. The master has no power over his slave but what the law gives him. Slavery exists nowhere by the laws of Congress; and in our slave States the local laws confer but very limited powers upon this species of property. The general right of property in an animal implies the right to take its life for the convenience or luxury of its owner; but in none of the States of this country has the master of a slave the right to take his life for such reasons. In various other respects this right of property in the slave is limited by the local law. Nor do any two of the slaveholding States perfectly agree in this limitation; for in some, while the power of the master is nearly absolute, in others it is contracted, and the slave enjoys more freedom. Hence slavery is a very different thing in some of the States from what it is in others; and the Legislature of any State has power to make the difference still greater.

Property, or what the master claims as such in his slave, consists of the aggregate of the powers which the law of the State gives him over the slave.

If such is its nature, by what law does it exist in the Territories "by virtue of the Constitution?" Of course it does not by virtue of the territorial laws; for it is a part of this doctrine that the powers of the Territory have no control over it whatever. It cannot be interfered with till the Territory becomes a State; and, if the territorial authorities could interfere with it at all, they could abolish it altogether, and thus annul the Constitution! Nor, either, does it by virtue of any law of Congress; for it is another part of this doctrine that Congress has no power over it, and this is equally necessary to the principle or notion; for, if Congress can increase or diminish the aggregate of the master's powers over his slave, it may abolish them altogether; and then what becomes of the "virtue of the Constitution?"

The question, then, comes back, by what laws the relation of master and slave is established and regulated in the Territories? Does the President mean that, "by virtue of the Constitution" of the United States the laws of the several slaveholding States on this subject extend all over the public domain? Indeed, he can mean nothing else, for there is no other horn left to the dilemma. The doctrine of the President will be better understood and appreciated by stating a case. Suppose a slaveholder, say from South Carolina, removes with his slave to the Territory of Kansas. He there, in the exercise of the right over his slave given him by the law of the State from which he emigrated, whips his slave, and is prosecuted for assault and battery. If the trial takes place in Lawrence, most likely some northern man will preside upon the bench, and New England men will fill the jury panel. The whipping with a slave whip is admitted, and he makes his defense. He states no law of Congress, or of the Territory, that authorized him in this act; but he refers the court to the law of South Carolina.

By the President's theory this law of South Carolina is to prevail, for the reason that it is one of the constituent elements of his right of property; and it must follow him into the Territory, and be administered there. If he take the life of his slave he may be punished for it; but the reason is, not because of the prevalence of any territorial law, for that would be unconstitutional, but because the law of South Carolina does not confer this power upon a master. He may compel his slave, though a member of the Christian church, to live with him in open violation of a special command of the Decalogue; and yet no territorial law can prevent it. His slaves may live in open violation of the laws of Christian marriage in spite of the laws of the Territory—for, by the laws of his State, this institution is forbidden them, or practically denied them. Even Christian law-makers hold that that is a Christian law which takes away the rite of Christian marriage from members of the same church with themselves. And this is the complexion to which we have come at last; and judges and jurors from the free States are bound to administer these laws brought to the Territories from the slave States.

If a master from Maryland buys a slave of a master from Alabama, and he in turn sells to a man from Kentucky, the law of which State shall regulate his right of property in the Territory; and if, further, after the master left the State, the law is changed so as to abridge or otherwise alter his right of property in his slave, how would it affect his powers over him? Or is the will of the master the only limit of the master's power in the Territory? These questions might be multiplied, did time permit. The country will recollect that when the Territorial Legislature (so called) passed laws abridging the freedom of speech, it was approved here by the Democratic members of Congress. Possibly this doctrine of this "virtue of the Constitution" was then in process of incubation, and their instincts led them to the conclusion that this law was necessary for the protection of this species of property, and was carried there by virtue of the Constitution. The President is only explicit on the laws of slavery being carried into the Territory, and here he is gratuitously so. Whether the laws regulating the sale of lottery tickets in Maryland are also carried into the Territories, the President does not inform us; probably, however, it is only those relating to slavery.

But, sir, if this is true, then, in its most offensive sense, is it true that slavery is national and liberty sectional and local; for this doctrine goes beyond the Territories? It is the doctrine by which Virginia is to-day attempting to establish the right of her slave-traders to drive their chained gangs through the city of New York on their way to Texas; and she expects the court to establish that right. It is the doctrine on which Passmore Williamson was imprisoned in Pennsylvania for telling a slave woman, whom her master had brought into the State, that she was free. Under this doctrine slavery exists as much on the ocean as on the land. Wherever our flag floats there slavery is "by virtue of the Constitution." Under this doctrine of the President, the slave may be sent not only from Virginia to Texas by sea, by way of New York, but may be sent to any of the ports of the free States as a sailor, without impairing the rights of the master. And if this be so, why not import them direct from Cuba as well as Virginia? and why not from Africa as well as either? Give the master property in a slave on ship-board in any southern port, and, no matter where he came from, any law that should interfere with it would be as invalid as the Missouri compromise.

This I understand to be the practical working of the doctrine announced by the Administration; and to establish this absurdity, they are not only willing to trample under foot the rights of the people of Kansas, but to make them slaves to their despotic will. Nay, sir, to accomplish this he invokes the prompt and efficient aid of the faithful, backed by all the blandishments of official power and patronage, and threatened with excommunication from the pale of the Democratic party, in case of a refusal to comply. Who can hesitate under such circumstances? None, who can

"crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning."

But the President assures us that the admission of Kansas as a State, under the Lecompton constitution, will allay the agitation of the country! I did not understand that the question of "allaying the agitation" was the one on which we, as the Representatives of the people, were called upon to act. I had supposed that the question was, whether the people of Kansas should be allowed "to form their own institutions in their own way." And besides, I have not forgotten, nor has the country, that for this very purpose the Missouri compromise was repealed. We were told then, that after ninety days' clamor all would be peace and quiet; that this step only was needed to allay the storm of agitation and fanaticism that was sweeping over the North. This was the prophecy of 1854. Look at the facts. In 1852, the distinguished Senator of New Hampshire received some hundred thousand votes, more or less, for the Presidency; and at the inauguration of the man from New Hampshire, who was elected by an almost unprecedented unanimity, we were told that the questions that had so long agitated the public mind were happily put to rest, and that nothing should be tolerated, during his term of office, that should tend to rouse them into action. But what was the number of the vote that tells of agitation, as recorded in 1856? One and a half million. How wonderfully the prophesy is fulfilled! Verily, "he who ventures to prophesy should have an army at his command," if he intends to sustain the character of a prophet.

The President, in conclusion, invokes the admission of Kansas, because he fears a dissolution of the Union if this is refused. This, sir, has been so often threatened that it has lost its terrors, even to the "old ladies of both sexes." Why, sir, this warning falls "like a thrice-told tale upon the dull ear of a drowsy man;" there is no longer terror in these threats. Besides, if any portion of this Union feel so much aggrieved because the Congress of the United States refuses to force a Territory into the Union against the expressed wishes of a large majority of its inhabitants, and under a constitution that can never command popular respect—not popular obedience—then I, for one, say let them go. So far from allowing this menace to influence us in adjusting this question, I, for one, would insist upon its withdrawal; and, in case of a refusal, act in direct contravention of it. Sir, I can endure anything better than consent to act in my representative capacity under the influence of a menace. If the President fears these threats and menaces, it may be proper that he allow them to influence him; but the immediate Representatives of the people must occupy loftier ground.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, obtained the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the gentleman will give way for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I have made a promise to go on to-night, and, of course, I cannot violate my promise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are many gentlemen absent who, I am sure, would be glad to hear the gentleman from Mississippi, and I hope, therefore, he will not go on to-night.

Mr. BOCK. I believe, from certain indications and certain motions of the gentleman's head, that I am the individual to whom he alludes when he says he has made a promise to go on to-night, and, under the circumstances, I will not hold the gentleman to his promise, if he prefers to speak to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I will go on to-night, sir.

Mr. Chairman, when I was compelled to conclude my remarks the other day, by the expiration of the hour allowed me under the rules of this House, I was assuming that the real object the Free-Soil party have in view, was the destruction of the equilibrium in the balance of power between the free and slave States of this Union; and that, beyond that object, was another, far more objectionable to the South than the mere destruction of the balance of power—and that is, the unfair employment of the General Government ruinously to the South. I then said the New England and middle States made commerce, manufacturing, and the mechanic arts, the avocation of their people; all of which interest, they desired to advance by legislative aid, derived at the expense of that portion of our people now engaged in agriculture. I am sustained in this position by the ancient doctrines of the Whig party, by the recent opinions of Webster, and the still more recent demands, by all those States engaged in the pursuits above mentioned, for protection; the doctrines of the national Democratic party being directly adverse to this system of class legislation, and in favor of leaving every pursuit of man to its own intrinsic capability to sustain itself; denying to the Government any other rights than those expressly delegated in the Constitution, and leaving each State, by its own legislative action, to regulate, by law, all questions involving the interest of her people—and especially denying to Congress the right to impose, in any form and in any manner, upon the agricultural industry of the country, a tax in the nature of a bonus for the benefit of other pursuits. And the Free-Soil party, seeing that this party was composed of those mainly engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and that the slave States stood almost a unit, they have combined every party element in this country under the name of Black Republican, for the overthrow of the Democratic party. The most effectual manner to do this is, to prevent the expansion of slavery, and with it the agricultural interest, and restrict its quantum of power in the councils of the nation. Hence the doctrine of Free Soilism.

The first and main object of this party, as avowed by them, is to throw a cordon of free States around the slave States, and this they have well nigh effected—and should they, in the contest now pending in regard to Kansas, succeed, the work is done, the struggle is finished, the wall is erected, and we of the South lie bound at the foot of an avaricious and merciless oppressor; and although we are justly and fairly entitled to Kansas by the action of her people and the doctrine of popular sovereignty, yet captious objections are being interposed by bad men to defeat us, by bad men even of our own party; and when it is done, and the cordon is completed, then will immediately be put into execution the system of preferences—such as protection of American labor, as it is called. And this American labor, by Webster and others North, is denominated free labor, and is to be protected against the competition of European labor at the expense of slave labor.

The North tells us, openly and defiantly, that those engaged in manufacturing, in commerce, in mechanic arts, and maritime pursuits, must have wages, and high wages, that they may live well, and lay up something for old age, and they are even now demanding it. And from what source, what branch of industry are these wages to be obtained? Agriculture, of course. No other pursuit of man produces that which actually adds to the material and permanent wealth of a nation. It is the great foundation of all prosperity, and from it every other pursuit of man derives its support. This, I admit, is the necessary result of pursuits, and to it I do not object, if each is left to its intrinsic capabilities for success; but this will not be done when the Free Soilers and Abolitionists get the ascendancy—and therefore it is, that the struggle is conducted on their part with such untiring perseverance.

Never, in the past contest of parties, have they resorted to a strategy more indicative of success than their present opposition to the admission of Kansas, and the reason they give therefor. They see and know, if they can induce northern Democrats to agree with them upon this question, they succeed in the destruction of the nationality of that party and the completion of the cordon of free States; and with the Democratic party rent asunder, and the equilibrium between the free and slave labor destroyed, they will be able then to force their system of oppressive measures upon the country. I ask northern Democrats to-day, if they will allow the overthrow of our party by such strategy—if they will split with the South upon the question of Kansas? There are no good reasons why you should; and of this I shall endeavor to convince you in the course of my argument to-day.

Mr. Chairman, members say they cannot consent to force upon the people of Kansas a form of government to which they are opposed. Like them, sir, I would not force the people to accept a constitution prepared by Congress for the Territory, against their known wishes; but in a contest like this, when they are divided into two parties, each struggling for the ascendancy, and each resorting to strategy for success, I would not interfere against one and in favor of the other; and this is what those who oppose the admission of Kansas propose to do. It is said a majority, a large majority, of the people of Kansas condemn the present constitution, and invoke the aid of the Government to protect them. How has the majority been defeated, if such is the fact? This majority is composed of men who went to Kansas for the purpose of resisting its constituted legal authorities, and have been in rebellion to the territorial government from the commencement, and have allowed those who respected law and order to control matters in the Territory; while they, at every step, have been endeavoring to make that the ground of rebellion and war, and would have done so, only for the presence of United States troops in their midst; and now they come, with their past hideous conduct reeking upon their garments, and ask members upon this floor to become parties with them in resisting those who have acted in strict obedience to law, national and territorial. But, sir, what is it we force upon them? The admission of Kansas under her Lecompton constitution will effect no change in the present condition of interests in the Territory, or in the powers and sovereignty of the people of that Territory. Slavery exists there now, not by virtue of the Lecompton constitution; but by virtue of other laws. It existed there at the time we purchased the country from France, and has never been abolished. It exists there by virtue of the common law of the Territory. That common law is made up of the laws of all the other States in this Union, and has the sanction of the Constitution of the United States. The laws of the slave States and free States unite and blend, and mingle and commingle in the Territory of Kansas, and make the common law, in part, of the Territory. When a person moves from Mississippi to Kansas, he carries with him so much of her laws—not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States—as is necessary to determine his right to the property he takes with him. The same thing happens in the case of a citizen from Ohio. The Mississippian takes his negro to Kansas, and is entitled to his services there, he having a property right in him, vested by the laws of Mississippi, and not being inconsistent with any law in Kansas. The Constitution of the United States recognizes and respects his rights thus vested, and is bound to protect him in the enjoyment thereof.

I admit, no greater portion of the law of Mississippi follows the removed citizen than is necessary to establish and maintain his title to the property taken by him. The Constitution of the United States does not take property to any place, but protects it everywhere it may be found, not inconsistent with the local law.

Now, the Lecompton constitution does not take from the people of Kansas a single right that belongs to them as a people, nor does it deprive them of a single power they now have to regulate their own institutions in their own way. Although the State may be admitted into the Union, the right to regulate their institutions hereafter in their own way will not be taken from them, but really will be the best enabling act in the world, and will give them the absolute control over all their institutions, with full power to change, alter, and modify, in their own discretion, without interference by Congress, President, Governors, Missourians, or any one else. We simply say to the people, take the Territory absolutely, and regulate your own institutions, according to the will of the majority, in your own way. This localizes the question in dispute there, and restores harmony to this distracted country, and disperses the cloud, red with wrath, which now hangs over us.

But, sir, has there been any irregularity in the formation of the Lecompton constitution, for which this Government can interfere? To determine this question, we must first look to the powers of this Government. They are, at this day, by all classes of politicians, admitted to be limited to specific objects. Now, what may the General Government do in regard to Territories belonging to it? The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution authorizes Congress to admit into the Union new States. From this clause of the Constitution Congress cannot derive authority to create new States. The word admit limits the powers of Congress, and presupposes the already existence of a State created by competent power, which can only be an original, independent, and inherent sovereignty—a power only to be found with the people, and to be exercised by them, in their own way.

All the powers of Congress are legislative, and conferred by the States in the constitutional compact, and are, therefore, inferior to, and incapable of, performing the great sovereign act of making a State. The formation of a State constitutes and erection of a State, is a sovereign creative act, and can be exercised by the people only. It is the compact—agreement entered into by the people, creating a government and authorizing the exercise of legislative powers. The same article of the Constitution authorizes Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories of the United States. From this, authority to create cannot be derived; it only authorizes legislation. By this clause Congress is authorized to sell or give away the public lands, for the object had in view in creating the trust. Also, when a proper number of persons, forming a society sufficiently large to authorize it, have settled in the Territory, Congress may pass needful rules and regulations for their government; which rules and regulations must be such as emanate from its powers. Congress may adopt a “rule.” A rule is a law or regulation to be observed by the society to whom it is given, and its particular members. The word “regulation” in the Constitution, then, is embraced in the word “rule,” and restricts and limits the range of the word “rule” in this clause of the Constitution. Then Congress may enact a law, a regulation for the observance and convenience of the people who compose the society while it continues in that state. But, sir, these rules and regulations confer no independent sovereignty upon the people of the Territory. Congress itself possesses no such power. It only enacts laws for the benefit of the people. Mark, Mr. Chairman, Congress may pass needful rules and regulations for the government of the Territory. This clause authorizes Congress to pass the “rule,” as already stated. A question might arise as to whether it can delegate that power to the society occupying the Territory. However, the practice of the Government for sixty years sanctions it, and it need not now be controverted;

but, sir, when that power has been delegated, Congress no longer has any more control over the territory and people than she has over a State; because the right to legislate is blended with the original creative sovereignty inherent in the people, and to be exercised by them when the society becomes constitutionally competent to make a State.

The very act of the Government giving to the people of Kansas a charter, authorizing them to pass laws for themselves, enables them to do anything and everything necessary to make a State government, when their numbers will justify it. This being the case, the people of the Territory can only determine for themselves when it suits them to change their political status, and when they will exercise the full sovereign act of making a State. Having come to this determination, they can, for the first time, incorporate in the compact between themselves, an agreement as to what shall be property and what not; and they may also agree that certain things, recognized as property by other States in the Union, shall not exist with them as such, and can only be exercised in convention, by which the compact is made—because it is only in the exercise of the highest act of sovereignty that this decision can be made. It is the result of the agreement made by each of the members who compose the society, with each other—whereby everything held as property may be divested of that attribute, and invested with the elements of other property not previously so existing.

When the people have thus agreed, the legislative power cannot change the condition of things, or alter their decree in relation thereto. It is this reasoning which prohibits the Territorial Legislature from divesting anything, taken to the Territory as property, of that element. Congress, having no powers but legislative, cannot do it herself, and of course cannot authorize it to be done.

The people of the Territory, in a state of society, cannot determine whether slavery shall exist or not, as in that condition they cannot exercise any legal control over the rights of persons or things—nor can they do so in their legislative character, they having derived from the Government power only to enact rules and regulations, which is inferior to the power inherent in the people to form a compact between themselves. To my mind, then, it is most clear that the only period at which the question of slavery can be determined is in the convention.

But suppose, Mr. Chairman, in all this I am wrong, and that an enabling act by Congress is necessary. I shall now proceed to show the existence of such an act in the Nebraska-Kansas bill. The Nebraska-Kansas act of 1854 not only adopts the compromise act of 1850, but also declares “that when admitted as a State, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission;” and this is declared to conform to the cardinal principle of self-government. Now, the cardinal is, slavery shall or shall not exist, as their constitutions may prescribe at the time of their admission. From whom is this constitution to emanate? The people. Why? Self-government is the cardinal, and unless the people make the constitution, the cardinal is disregarded and abandoned.

Another portion of this act determines how the State is to be made, and the question of slavery settled, and is in this language:

Hence, self-government is the cardinal, in obedience to which the people of that and all other Territories are to form and regulate their domestic institutions, and in their own way, of which they of course must be the judges; and that way is subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Acting upon the authority thus conferred, the people of Kansas have formed their constitution in their own way; and “that way” has the sanction of all the past acts of this vast Government, State and National. Through the ballot-box they authorized the Legislature to make provisions for the election of delegates to a convention. This duty the Legislature performed. Delegates were elected, who met in convention as directed by law, and framed this Lecompton constitution. Now, all this, by the Kansas-Nebraska act, is subject "only to the Constitution of the United States;" and it in nowise invades that Constitution. Yet, in direct violation of the provisions of the act, it is, however, proposed to make it subject to our will. This course of reasoning certainly violates both the letter and spirit of the Kansas act, and shows a turbulent determination to dedicate it to free soil, and complete the cordon of free States around the slave States at the hazard of civil war, and in disregard of the asserted cardinal. But, sir, you have given them the power of self-government in express terms, which is an enabling act. More than that, sir. When you gave a political organization to that Territory, (authorizing the convention to pass all needful rules and regulations,) you parted with all the power you had over it, which you never can regain.

Your power, under the Constitution of the United States, extended only to passing rules and regulations. This power you have parted with, having transferred it to the people of the Territory; and all you can now do, is to subject their constitution to a comparison with that of the United States. Now, sir, how dare you, in the face of that act, interpose to prevent the people of the Territory from enjoying the work they have done in their "own way," by shutting out the State they have created; at the peril of the peace of this great nation, and the prostration of human liberty; at the peril of making it the theater on which American shall encounter American in deadly strife, and pour out the blood of freemen in deluge profusion, to gratify the ambition of the meanest and worst of mankind. In this view of the Kansas-Nebraska act I am entirely sustained by the world-wide-known "Little Giant." Hear him, ye Black Republicans and white; you, who sneeze when he takes snuff; you who, when you stand in his presence and catch the dropping of his distilled wisdom as it falls from his lips, and exclaim, "Mighty gods, do you hear that!" hear him:

"I say the construction put upon it has been this: by the sixth section of the Kansas-Nebraska act, we conferred on the Territorial Legislature authority to legislate upon all rightful subjects of legislation, not excepting slavery. Then, another clause declares it to be the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into the Territory, or to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States; therefore, all power which it is competent or possible to confer on the Territorial Legislature is conferred by that act."

This, sir, is strong language. Competent or possible. And these were the views of that gentleman, uttered at a time when no unhallowed ambition influenced his judgment; no dazzling crown played before his distempered imagination, luring him from the paths of patriotism; no White House, in the green room of which he shall stand and greet the vast throng of the passing multitude, and feel, beneath their gaze, "how mighty am I."

These views of Judge DOUGLAS show me to be right when I assume the Kansas-Nebraska act to be an enabling act, if one was necessary, which I have denied. And how he, without the most shameless effrontery, will now deny the validity of the act of the Legislature done under it, and by its authority, I cannot see. His language is, "all power which it is competent or possible to be conferred," has been done. And to-day he denies them all power, and repudiates their acts. "A second Daniel come to judgment!"

I fear he has determined to bring himself within the range of the severe and pungent criticism contained in another portion of the same speech from which I have made the extract. That is:

"When the time has arrived, and I think it now at hand, that the cardinal principles of self-government, non-intervention, and State equality, shall be recognized as irrevocable rules of action, binding on all good citizens who recognize and are willing to obey the Constitution as the supreme law of the land, there will be an end of the slavery controversy in Congress, and between the two sections of the Union. Then the occupation of political agitators, whose hope of position and promotion depend upon their capacity to disturb the peace of the country, will be gone."

Now, the operation of this rule of self-government has produced a constitution in Kansas, and, if received by Congress, will forever put an end to the slavery agitation. And this Judge DOUGLAS well knows; and, therefore, he himself becomes—what he has denounced so bitterly—the "agitator," as the only means of position and promotion with him; and many others are, in this hour of delusion, inclined to follow him in his wickedness.

Again, in his report made to the Senate, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, in 1855, he says:

"The compromise measures of 1850, which it will be remembered were made a part of the Kansas-Nebraska act, affirm and rest upon the following propositions: first, that all questions pertaining to slavery in the Territories, and in the new States to be formed therefrom, are to be left to the decision of the people therein, by their appropriate representatives, to be chosen by them for that purpose."

Then he thought, as I now think, that the question of slavery should be settled, not by a direct vote of the people, but by representatives chosen for that purpose. And who are the appropriate representatives? They are delegates chosen to a convention appointed to form a constitution. I think now I have established, by my argument, two propositions: first, that under the Constitution of the United States, and from the very nature of our institutions, the people of a Territory, after having once organized by authority of Congress, have the right to make a constitution without express authority of Congress; and secondly, if an enabling act is necessary, it is embraced in the Kansas-Nebraska law.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have now shown that the people of Kansas have advanced from a dependent to an independent political condition; that they have, in the exercise of due legal rights, ascended from a territorial to the highest political condition—a State—and all which has been done in the exercise of such powers as belonged to them of right; and having reached this position and taken their stand amidst the States in this Confederacy, panoplied with full sovereignty, she is now beyond the control of Congress, and must, by us, be received into this Union. And if that right is denied her, she can still exercise, out of the Union, full sovereign powers, and will exercise them in defiance of the Federal Government. And should the Government undertake, by force or otherwise, to reduce her again to a territorial condition, the whole South will interpose and forbid it—aye, prevent it by the sword, if necessary. Kansas is now a State, and of lawful birth, and that status she is determined to maintain, in the Union or out of it; and it is for Congress this day to decide which it shall be. Out of the Union all the affection of the South will be thrown around her. Her dignity will be defended with our arms. And, although repudiated by the mother, her sister southern States, adorned with the habiliments of sovereignty, and crowned by the glories they have won, in council and in battle, will receive her as not unworthy for companionship, and permit her to enjoy an equal share in their rich heritage of fame.

But, sir, what is the argument interposed to the just claims of Kansas for admission? It is, that her constitution, in all its parts, was not, by the convention which framed it, submitted to a vote of the people. This, certainly, is not necessary to the validity of the constitution. It is, on the contrary, in direct conflict with the practice of our States, and the nature of our political institutions, which are strictly representative. No instance has occurred in this country, where the people have assembled in mass and formed a constitution; nor has it ever been done through the ballot-box; nor yet would it be in accordance with our past practice. No case can be referred to, either in the States or the Federal Government, where political power may be exercised in any other mode than by representatives. The only act which our people ever perform, in their democratic character, is to petition for redress of grievances. But this is not the exercise of political power, but a mere incidental right. This being true, the people of Kansas could not make a constitution except by representatives in convention. And when they act in convention, they bind themselves, and impart absolute validity to the constitution thus formed; and the submission to the people afterwards has the effect simply to elicit an expression of satisfaction or dissatisfaction. If this is not the true doctrine, the people could meet in mass at any time and change their constitution every week, deranging the harmonious operations of their government, and reducing everything to anarchy. If this reasoning is not correct, then the Topeka constitution is valid, and the State should have been admitted under it. But the champion in opposition to the Lecompton constitution says the Topeka convention was an unlawful assembly, having for its object the subversion of the territorial government of Kansas; but that the Lecompton convention was lawful. Why? It must be because the Topeka convention was composed of persons not chosen in the usual mode known and recognized by our institutions, while the Lecompton convention was instituted in accordance with law and custom. But why the acts of the Lecompton convention are invalid, I cannot, myself, determine; nor have any arguments been furnished me which sustain that position. Both, the Topeka and Lecompton conventions, looked to the same object—the subversion of the territorial government, and if that could render the one an unlawful assembly, the other must have been so also.

But, sir, the Topeka was unlawful, because it was the act of the people in an unorganized state; and the Lecompton was lawful, having the sanction of usage, precedent, and law. Then, if the latter was lawfully organized, both in manner and object, its acts are bound to be valid, and are the true expressions of the will of the people, in the only legal mode known to us, and are obligatory upon this Government.

But, to avoid the force of this conclusion, it is said it was legal only for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a change from the territorial to a State government. This cannot be correct, because both the manner and the object of the call of the convention must be taken into consideration in determining its legality; and if either is found to be improper, then the convention would be illegal. Now, the object was to make a State, and not to petition Congress for a change of government. And with the admission that it was legal, how can you pronounce against the acts done? But, if the Legislature of Kansas could not authorize a constitution to be made by its people without an enabling act from Congress, how could the Lecompton convention be valid, having been called by a body which had no power to do so? I insist that it was valid, and was rendered so by virtue of inherent power in the people, and also by authority conferred by the Kansas-Nebraska act. The Kansas Legislature did not call the convention to petition Congress for a change of government, but to make a State; and if it had not the power to call the convention for this purpose, the act was void, and so the convention, and both the Topeka and Lecompton stand upon the same footing. But Judge DOUGLAS says, for the purpose of petitioning it was legal. That was not its object, and that it did not do. That the people of Kansas had the right to petition is not questioned; but, then, in the act of petitioning they only exercise an incidental and not a sovereign right. A petition binds nobody, while a constitution does. Desperate diseases, it is said, require desperate remedies, and in this instance has called forth this monstrous heresy, that when the petition of the convention is presented, Congress may or may not grant the prayer of the petitioners. That is, they may change that which is now a mere petition into a constitution, thus making a State with all the powers and attributes of sovereignty.

Who, then, according to this doctrine, makes the State—the people of the Territory, or Congress? The Constitution of the United States confers no power on Congress to make it. But, if Congress can do it, then the people of the Territory cannot, because the jurisdiction is not concurrent. Now, admit the power in Congress to make a State, then you must admit in it full power over every subject and object of the constitution, and it alone can determine the subject of slavery. Thus have I traced this non-intervention Democrat to the support of doctrines worse than any put forth by the oldest Abolitionist in the nation.

But how do these views of the gentleman compare with his vaunted doctrines of non-intervention? The Cincinnati platform is—

"That we recognize the right of all the people of the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and, whenever the number of their inhabitants justify it, to form a constitution with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

And this is non-intervention, and applies to the question of slavery, and to no other part of the constitution. It leaves the people to decide for themselves whether slavery shall exist or not; and they did decide in the first election of delegates, and again when the slavery clause was referred, by the election on the 21st of December. It authorizes the people, by their Legislature, when they have the requisite number of inhabitants, to form a State government without further aid; and when required, that it shall be submitted in whole or in part to a vote of the people for ratification. Yes, sir, the question of slavery is to be determined at the time and in the act of making a constitution, and by those who frame it. It is the only time and place when it can be decided, because it is then that the people agree and contract with each other; then it is that they can mutually consent that the elements of property may or may not exist in certain things with them. And when this agreement is reduced to what we call a constitution, it becomes complete, and binds the whole people of the Territory, until annulled by another convention of equal dignity. But, sir, how absurd is that other proposition, that "to make a constitution valid it must be referred to the people!" What additional sanctity does it derive from that act? They are not more sovereign at the ballot-box than when assembled in convention. Through the ballot-box they only consent to meet in convention to make a compact in the nature of a constitutional agreement. And until they meet in convention, no act is done which is in the nature of a contract, or which decides any question of property. How circumstances change the opinions of men! During his whole life, Judge DOUGLAS has been the advocate of popular sovereignty, the pretended champion of the people. But now he repudiates his former doctrines by denying to the people of Kansas the sovereign power to make a State for themselves. If the people cannot frame a constitution, then they can do no act of sovereignty. To petition is not such an act. It is the exercise of a mere incidental right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Now the doctrine of Mr. DOUGLAS, and which is to convulse this country, is, "that the people may petition and Congress grant." In this case, who exercises the act of sovereignty—those who petition, or Congress, who grants? This is the doctrine of monarchy, and is derived from the practice of Great Britain in the settlement of her colonies. One or more persons petition the King; he grants a charter, which represents somewhat our State constitutions. The King there is the fountain of power, not the petitioners. Very like to this is the doctrine that the people of Kansas can call a convention, which can petition Congress to become a State, and their prayer may be granted. Now, where before was this absurd doctrine advanced? When before was the power to create a State, and then receive it into the Union, claimed for this Government? This doctrine, sir, does degrade the people of this great nation from sovereigns to slaves. The great Pitt was more liberal in his sentiments when he asserted that Great Britain could not interfere with the internal affairs of her American colonies, her power only extending to matters external. Yet Judge DOUGLAS claims the right to keep the people of the Territory always in a state of vassalage—to direct them what they shall and shall not do, and ultimately dictate their charter of liberty. The assertion of these doctrines in Europe, at this day, would bring the head of the most powerful potentate to the block.

Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect of the rejection of Kansas? Can any good to the country result from it? Suppose it has been procured in part by fraud: will its rejection prevent frauds hereafter, and will not the same complaint be made next winter which we have now? But who makes the charge of fraud? Men who were sent to Kansas as hired myrmidons, are maintained there as rebels, scorning and defying your territorial law, and resisting your Government, and who, with the blood of innocent men and women on their hands, come to you this day invoking your aid in their treasurable conduct. And against whom is this aid invoked? Those who have respected your laws, territorial and national; those whose whole course has been in conformity to our free institutions, and have been worthy and obedient citizens; and this you know.

These men you are called on by rebels to punish and rebuke, that those very rebels may enjoy the fruits of their rebellion. Do it, sir, and you encourage treason, and discountenance obedience to your laws. Do it, sir, and you dedicate Kansas to blood and to vengeance—it will become the fated spot on which the eyes of all nations will be turned in melancholy gaze, as the fiery spirits of the South shall encounter the steady coldness of the North—the spot over which the eagle of liberty shall rest upon her spread wings, and gaze with shivering emotion, until the first drop of blood shall be shed, when shall go forth her scream—the wail of the nation's fall. And is human liberty so valueless that we shall thus carelessly peril it? Sir, I appeal to members on this floor, by the remembrances of the past, the deeds of northern and southern men in the memorable conflict of the Revolution, in which was won the imperishable monuments of glory everywhere erected to their memory; by our present greatness as a nation; by the bright and green wreaths, civic and military, interwoven by beams plucked from the North and West, South and East—which hang so gracefully on our country's brow, to pause and contemplate, and by their votes save the country, and rely upon the justice of the people, and anticipate the thanks of generations unborn. The equilibrium in the balance of power is already lost—the scepter is already transferred; reject Kansas and the cordon is then completed, and the South forever degraded, and that by the act of this House and not the people of Kansas. Against this final act of degradation I believe the South will resist—resist with arms—resist to the dis severing of the last tie that binds these States together—resist to the pulling down this grand political fabric of ours to its foundation. And I believe this from the general excitement felt and expressed over the whole South, which burns now, suppressed, but will, the moment Kansas is rejected, break forth in a flame that no power in this Government can subdue. Gentlemen may think this a fancy sketch—would to God I could believe it. From what I have learned from the history of man writhing under the influence of conscious wrong—and from what I know of the state of public opinion at home, and from the indignant emotions I feel in my own bosom, I am bound to believe the danger imminent. He who will trouble himself to look impartially, for a moment, at the political heavens, may see the indignation of the South as it flashes above the southern horizon—even hear her murmurs like the muttering of thunder afar off. But receive her, and our honor is saved; the pledge contained in the Cincinnati platform is redeemed, and the national Democracy is cemented by renewed confidence, and will stand intact when the sun shall rest upon her bed of cloud for the last time on the western horizon, witnessing the flag of our country still floating without one star exiled or one stripe rent.

In the course of Mr. DAVIS's speech,

Mr. MORGAN said: I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that there is not a quorum in the House, and that we cannot proceed with business without a quorum.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is no evidence of the fact that there is not a quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. No question of that character can arise. No vote can be taken while the gentleman from Mississippi is upon the floor, and the fact that there is no quorum here cannot, therefore, be ascertained.

Mr. MORGAN. I think this thing is all wrong, and I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. The gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I have not yielded it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The floor can always be taken for a question of order.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw the question of order. It can only compel the committee to have a call of the roll.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, then resumed and concluded his speech.

Mr. FENTON obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman will give way for that purpose, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FENTON. I understand that a privileged question will probably occupy the attention of the House to-morrow, and I therefore prefer to go on this evening.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well, sir.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, a little over four years ago, it was proposed in the national councils to destroy the line limiting the northward tread of slavery, and inaugurate measures of pacification upon the issues growing out of the slavery question, which had, at intervals, all along our country's history, distracted its peace and embittered its councils. It was said that this measure of abrogation was not only necessary to carry out the principles of non-intervention and popular sovereignty, embraced in the legislation of 1850, but was supremely a measure of adjustment, settlement, harmony, and peace; that in this respect it would have the magic power of the sage, who stretched his body across the frightful chasm that interposed against the progress of the Oriental gods, and that we, like them, should behold the abyss close up, presenting a beautiful valley, enchanting and lovely; and yet, years have passed, and we have not peace; the angry conflict has not only tenure in this Hall of the nation's Representatives, but it rages with unabated violence upon the plains of Kansas; and the allies of the combatants upon that bloody field fill with civil dissension, arising from cause of quarrel common to the whole people, the entire circuit of our land.

I was one of those who believed the measure fraught with all the mischief which has flowed from it, and declared my convictions from my place in the Thirty-Third Congress that it was "the true intent and meaning" of that act to carry slavery not only to Kansas, but to open the door for its introduction into all the other territory of the United States. How far subsequent events have verified this view, let the flame of civil war and the martyr blood crying from the ground once dedicated to freedom, and shed in defense of its birthright, the barbarous doctrine of the Dred Scott decision, the servility to slave extension by the President, and the tyranny of usurped power in Kansas, answer!

So rapid, so startling, and so unblushing, have been these assaults upon freedom, that some who joined in the attack are now seen rallying with patriotic zeal upon the outposts, for its preservation and defense. I hope the succor is so timely and powerful, that the calamity with which our country is threatened may be averted.

The present crisis, whatever may be the result, will be referred to hereafter as one of the greatest magnitude that could possibly have arisen in the Republic. It is not merely a struggle of the slave power for the extension and perpetuation of negro slavery, but for dominion, with premeditated determination to array one section of the Confederacy against the other in unmitigable hostility—a contest which involves the principles of our Government, the integrity of the Union, and the undisputed sacredness of the Constitution.

Underlying this slavery question, the assumption of its advocates that the Congress cannot, or shall not, determine upon matters needful and proper for the government of the Territories stands forth prominently—false in theory and untrue in fact, tested by the light of constitutional history. Our fathers wisely understood that slave labor and free labor could not flourish side by side upon the same soil, that they were antagonistic; hence they adopted a line of separation; and, while condemning the former as repugnant to the spirit of liberty, and an invasion of the rights of man, made provision, as it was then hoped, for its gradual circumscription and extinguishment.

Through the legislation culminating in the repeal of the Missouri compromise, this principle, solemnly inaugurated by our fathers, was overthrown, and these two elements of labor and settlement were invited to an encounter upon the same soil—elements so opposed that their contact was strife, bloodshed, recession of one or the other, or extinction of one or the other. This you have witnessed in all its fearful horror, running through four years of eventful and mournful history. The chilled blood of patriotism calls for the remedy. How and when are you to find it? Our early statesmen clearly noted the necessary prescription, and even at the threshold of the Constitution defined the boundaries of slavery by saying that freedom should have what slavery then had not; and I may safely allege, that the effort to produce a Constitution was imperiled in the convention of its framers, and was only rescued and brought forth, clothed with the garments of liberty, after this decree of freedom had been made for the Territories by the Congress of the Confederation, then in session in the city of New York.

In 1820 this principle was reaffirmed, notwithstanding slavery had, from 1803 up to this period, insidiously extended itself over large fields of the Louisiana purchase, while the people of the free States were in the quiet of repose upon this question, or were engaged in the conflict of arms with a foreign Power. I say the principle was then reaffirmed; and the only remedy, in my judgment, for the present alarming condition of affairs, is to return to this principle, decreeing for all the Territories freedom now, freedom forever.

I need not trace arguments in support of its constitutional authority; it is sufficient to remark that the very proposition, separate and distinct from others in relation to territory, was submitted to the committee on details in the constitutional convention, by Mr. Madison, but was supplanted by the general proposition of Gouverneur Morris, that the Congress have power to make all needful rules, &c., embracing, as was supposed, the whole ground in relation to Territories. Even if this was otherwise, which I do not concede, the power under the Constitution to acquire territory involves a corresponding power to govern, and the duty to govern in such manner as would conduce in the greatest degree to the welfare and happiness of the people—the decision in the Dred Scott case to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, to return: I said it was the design of this repudiation and abrogation scheme to extend the dominion of human slavery. I do not say that all who participated, or were known as supporters, had such a purpose in view; but that the slave power which mainly controls and directs a large party in this country—now being made less through its monstrous and revolting exactions—did then and do now, is clear to my mind. It was not in defense of an abstract principle, as then insisted, about which they did not then, and do not now, agree. No, sir, the hazard to the peace of the country, and the permanence of political organization was too great for such cause. The purpose is ingeniously set forth in the following article in the New Orleans Delta, a leading advocate of the election of Mr. Buchanan:

"We have wanted Kansas for the South, and have contributed men and money to the object of securing it. So far, we have failed. It is true the constitution of that Territory is not decided, and it is possible that it may admit of slavery, and if so, a step will have been gained; for if, under such a constitution, the Territory be admitted as a State, it will give two Senators to the South, and will hold the door still open for the admission of slaves into that country."

"The foreign slave trade, therefore, will add directly to the population of the South; it will give a wider basis to slavery, and thus add indirectly to the population of the South. Ten thousand slaves would take Kansas with her seventy thousand people; ten thousand more would take another State in Texas; ten thousand more, a State in New Mexico; ten thousand more, a State in Lower California; while one or two thousand more would embrace the States of Delaware, Maryland, Western Virginia, and Missouri, to the firmest possible fidelity to the peculiar features of the South. Under the influence of such a measure, therefore, there can be no question as to the ultimate preponderance of political power between the sections—and the foreign slave trade is the certain road to power for the South, and the only road to power within the Union."

Did time and investigation permit I might multiply extracts from their journals, and the sayings of their leading men, in support of my declaration. But the tragic scenes of fraud, usurpation, and tyranny in Kansas, are vivid with proof. If not for this, why was the territorial government usurped by invading, violence, and fraud at the first legislative election in March, 1855, and why did the government thus usurped become the instrument of oppression, iniquity, and wrong, such as slaves only could be expected to endure? Why were test oaths imposed, and laws framed to facilitate and give license to fraud and violence? For what other reason have men been chased from the soil of Kansas, incarcerated in prisons, assassinated by day, murdered by night, and their property pillaged, destroyed, or confiscated, under the strong arm of the slave power, made stronger by the criminal support of the Federal authority? Man has fled from man as from the savage beasts of that frontier region, and the rights of the many have been wrested from them by the strong arm of invasion and usurpation, and for what? Because, battling for the rights of man; for breathing out the inspiration of an education in the pure air of freedom; for sustaining the principles evolved from the Constitution; ay, for all this, and to plant upon the ruins and in the waste, trackless by freemen, the institution of human bondage. They had no apology to be found in the Constitution, or in precedent; none, sir, in patriotism, in justice, or in humanity. They arrayed themselves against all these, and volunteered to become the instruments of aggression against the long conceded rights and vital interests of the freemen of this country. They prostituted themselves to the promotion of the schemes of slavery, pointing to the Territory which had been surrendered, and seizing it from the possession of those to whom it had been given over by the terms of formal compact, and for a consideration, which the slave-power had received in full. This soil was the heritage of free labor—for the men who go forth at the call of their country to uphold its standard and vindicate its honor; the pioneer of civilization and settlement, who goes out to contest for the supremacy with the wild beast and the savage, and prepare it as the home of civilization and the heart of empire.

You propose now to force upon this people a constitution against their will—a constitution with slavery—with the poor chance of power to change short of revolution. It is obnoxious to them; they have already destroyed it by an emphatic popular verdict; it truly has no legal life; it has no vitality. Congress cannot galvanize it into healthful being; it is beyond the skillful mendacity of the Executive, with all his unfairly exercised power, to give it peaceful reign. The people say they will not have it. They mean what they say; and they will have the sympathy and aid of three-fourths of the people of this Confederacy in resisting so foul an oppression. Will Congress attempt to force it upon them? The responsibility is great; and it seems to me that the people of the North will hold their agents, who mock at their entreaty, to a strict and fearful account.

You are told by the organ of the Administration in this city, that nearly all the nationalities of the Republic have disappeared, one by one. The great religious denominations and religious cleemosynary and charitable societies, which once flourished under national organizations and bound our people together in bonds more endearing, if less strong than a common constitution, common laws and common institutions, a common language and history, have almost all been sundered in twain. Why is this? Is it not because the aggressions of the slave power are at war with the pure spirit of Christianity, and its civilizing and elevating tendencies? You have driven them off, and your line of policy will drive off and unite the great body of the American people against you.

Our forbearance has been remarkable in times past. It is within the recollection of gentlemen present, how the people, after being outraged and excited over the legislation of 1850, laid down to quiet and repose upon the solemn assurances of peace made in 1852, at Baltimore, and throughout the country; and yet the promise turned to ashes upon the lips of those who made it, and the people awoke as from a dream, just in time to see their cherished hopes swallowed up in wanton agitation and renewed aggression—like the "Arabian shepherd who, in wandering into the wilderness, caught a glimpse of the gardens of Iram, and then lost them again forever." Mr. Chairman, I hope the people have not forever lost the peace and the quiet our fathers sought to establish, and which is the just fruit of free institutions.

Will it not be said, however, not only by the North, but by all good people throughout the civilized world, that by consummating this act the responsible parties were madly intent on extending the empire of slavery at whatever hazard to the peace of the country; that they forged the weapons of fratricidal strife and civil war; and in this light hold them accountable for every drop of blood that is shed in the clash that may quickly follow? Sir, I should deeply lament a renewal of strife in Kansas. I am for peace, not war; yet I would not have peace purchased at the expense of the rights of man and the liberties of my country. Such peace—the peace of Hungary, powerless and bleeding under the heel of Austrian despotism—is not the peace for me, or those I represent.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us that if the Lecompton constitution is not indorsed by Congress the Union will be dissolved. As much as I love the Union and cherish its hallowed recollections; as much as I reverence the memory of its founders and their living and last wish for its perpetuation; as much as I hope from its mission in the field of liberty, I would try the experiment, if I had the power, to defeat this usurpation, this cheat, this fraud upon the rights of the people of Kansas. But, sir, I have no fear of a dissolution from this cause. I scarcely believe there are fifty thousand men in all the South that would rally under the black standard of dissolution. The Union is not to be dissolved. I fear vastly more in the consummation of this great wrong—commotion, strife, and bloodshed, and a reproach, if not a blot, upon the great experiment of self-government.

To avert this I appeal to gentlemen upon this floor. I expect nothing from him who asserts that Kansas is as much a slave State to-day as Georgia or South Carolina. The language of the President's message before us gives us to expect from him no liberation to liberty for those who bleed in her cause.

"You may as well go stand upon the beach,
And bid the main flood bate his usual height;
You may as well use question with the wolf,
Why he hath made the ewe bleat for the lamb;
You may as well forbid the mountain pines
To wag their high tops, and to make no noise,
When they are fretted with the gusts of heaven;"

as to expect, from one thus committed, any abatement of his purposes. I know very well that many in the North who gave Mr. Buchanan their support, will witness with pain this subversion of expectation and promise, and turn away with indignation and disgust.

The career of many great men furnishes painful evidence of an inglorious termination. Cæsar was assassinated for attempting to overthrow the liberties of Rome; Brutus fell on his sword when unable to attain power by its means; and Bonaparte, not content with binding his temples with the chaplets wrenched from the many thrones of Europe, sought to climb still higher the heights of unchastened ambition, and thus cast himself, a lonely, forsaken exile, upon a sea-begirt and desolate island.

Nor is the history of our own country wanting in memorable examples of men of supposed incorruptible statesmanship, wrecking their own fame, and disappointing the hopes of a confiding people; and from causes, if possible, less justifiable than has worked the overthrow of heroes and statesmen of ancient and modern times, in countries beyond the sea. There is a power in our midst, which—in the graphic description of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is unable through its violence to now occupy his seat—may be likened to the black magnetic mountain upon the face of the deep, mentioned in the Arabian story, which drew, one by one, the strong iron bolts of the stately ship, until she fell a disjoined wreck. So with this. The principles of earlier years instilled in the land of freedom, with too many of our public men, as they approach this power, one by one are withdrawn until they fall a disjoined wreck. And it would seem that this power was grateful for no service, except as the basis of increased exactions, and is reckless of the number or standing of the victims.

Not only this, sir, but the method of accomplishing these purposes is full of warning and shame. To the doubting and timid, hope of reward is promised; while the courageous and bold are cast off at pleasure. In proof of the latter, I need but to call the attention of gentlemen to the action of the late Cincinnati Democratic National Convention, in selecting for its standard-bearer one who had been in no sense an advocate and defender of the great doctrine for which others had periled so much; and, in support of the former allegation, I subjoin from the Washington Union, the organ of President Pierce's administration, the following article, which made its appearance pending the struggle upon the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and which is, in substance, repeated in a late number of the same paper upon the eve of this great contest upon the Lecompton constitution, and at a time when a few more votes seem as important to the success of this measure, as they were deemed then important to the success of that:

"If a Democratic member of Congress is led by his judgment and his conscience to vote for the bill, as we hope all Democrats will be led to do, and he returns to his constituents to encounter the clamor of Whigs and Abolitionists, together with disaffected men of his own party, no sensible man, at least no man who understands and appreciates the character of the Executive, will believe that the President will allow such factious men to wield public patronage to overthrow him."

If the promise was sacredly kept, others will defend its good faith.

Thus it is, sir, that we have come to have two parties in this country with interests, feelings, and purposes diametrically opposed—I might say almost geographically divided—the one now wielding the power of the Government for the extension and perpetuation of slavery, whether this be accomplished by the support of the dogma (as applied) of popular sovereignty, or in defiance of it; whether, with regard to the rights of the States and the security and welfare of the people of the Territories, or in utter violation thereof, with the monstrous intention of carrying slavery with the marching banner of our country's expanse. The other, the Republican party, committed to the support of freedom, and sworn to its defense in whatever form and from whatever quarter attacked. The first, sir, are subject to the charge of guilty complicity in the atrocities that fill every page of the history of Kansas, and are now engaged, in violation of all rules known to self-government and in utter disregard of the usages and rights of civilized people, in forcing a constitution with the perpetual imposition of slavery upon an unwilling community.

But, sir, the issue has wider range—this is only the theater of its present rioting, its immediate, pressing aspect. Beyond this, I have just reason to charge not only upon this party the purpose of overriding all the anti-slavery covenants of the people, and all the anti-slavery guaranties of the Constitution, to break down and crush out the anti-slavery sentiment of the North, and to plant slavery in the Territories; but to reopen the foreign slave trade, and ultimately to carry slavery into the States where it is not, in defiance of the powers of Congress or of the States to prevent it. The object of the repeal of the Missouri compromise is proclaimed, by one of its supporters, to have been—

"To put the slavery question upon some common ground where a party could be rallied strong enough to administer the Government justly upon other than purely sectional ideas; to remove the ban under which the domestic institutions of the South had been placed by Federal legislation; and, although not all the South was entitled to, it was a great advance upon the old order of things, because it removed an unjust and odious discrimination against her domestic institutions from the statute-book—a moral triumph which was of vast importance to the South, and to the institution of slavery itself."

The present purposes of the slave power are frankly disclosed in the following article, which appeared in the Union of the 17th of November last:

"The Constitution declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.' Every citizen of one State coming into another State has, therefore, a right to the protection of his person, and that property which is recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States, any law of a State to the contrary notwithstanding. So far from any State having a right to deprive him of this property, it is its bounden duty to protect him in its possession.

"If these views are correct—and we believe it would be difficult to invalidate them—it follows that all State laws, whether organic or otherwise, which prohibit a citizen of one State from settling in another, and bringing his slave property with him, and most especially declaring it forfeited, are direct violations of the original intention of a Government which, as before stated, is the protection of person and property, and of the Constitution of the United States, which recognizes property in slaves, and declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' among the most essential of which is the protection of person and property."

And this but corroborates the evidence daily swarming around us, of the design of this power to subjugate the country to the sway of African barbarism. Not only shall slavery be carried to the Territories, under the protecting folds of the Constitution; that it shall be protected there by the power of the Federal Government; but that no power, not even the Congress nor the people of the Territories, can prevent or remove it, and not even State sovereignty is a barrier to the blighting curse.

To this have we come; and do you, sir, and gentlemen, think that the people of the North will submit? You might as well expect the hand, with fiendish malevolence, to pluck from the body all that is vital and lovely, as well, I was about to say, expect Heaven to cast off the redeemed and give place to the damned.

To this, sir, have the Democracy come—that party so successful in its achievements, under a Jefferson and a Jackson, that its trophies embellish the political history of our country. But, sir, it is not the Democracy of past days—it is the Administration Democracy, the Democracy of the slave power, or whatever you please to call it—that, it was not. True Democracy—the Democracy of earlier and better days—would not engage in ravaging the sacred interests of freedom.

The doctrine of the Supreme Court, that slavery is above all laws, all constitutions, and all power to dislodge it, and that black men have no rights that white men are bound to respect, is to be, it is feared, if it is not already, made their basis of action and the rule of faith. And in paving the way, gentlemen are impelled to resort, with impotent sophistry, in defense of this institution they thus seek to extend, and to invest with political umirage over a free people, to the superseded practices of early Bible record, forgetting the Divine injunction, the duration of which is as the universe of God, saying that "whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." The Bible teaches the heaven-born equality of man, the great fundamental principles of justice and morality that underlie all law that dictates the formation of the jurisprudence of any great and just nation; and upon this basis our people and all other people must plant themselves, that hope and expect to advance the cause of right, and elevate the character and condition of man.

Suppose our land with no human being upon its wide-extended surface, and suddenly thereon should arise twenty-five million of blacks and three hundred and fifty thousand of white men, the black men possessing, as they would, the physical power to make the others their bondmen—I suppose the scriptural argument of gentlemen would not be deemed pertinent, for I believe their doctrine is founded on the right of the stronger to subject and enslave the weaker, rather than upon the alleged inferiority of the black race, or a special designation of omnipotent law that the black man in our midst is doomed to perpetual bondage.

I do not rise, however, to discuss the merits of slavery in the abstract, nor its suitableness or adaptation to the local communities where it exists by peaceably enacted law, but to speak of it in another character, a different field, where it affects us as a political community, our welfare and happiness, the durability of our institutions; whether these cherished hopes and privileges of our people shall be brief and volatile, the charm of a day, or whether they shall remain firm in the hearts and political action of this great people for all time to come.

I need not speak of the invidious discrimination that this power makes to favor its purposes in nearly every measure of general legislation and of executive action; of the appointment to offices of power and trust of no person under your Government who is not orthodox upon the question of slavery; of the large appropriations made for objects of doubtful expediency in the South, while the same class North are rejected wholly or supported meagerly—as instanced in the improvement of Cape Fear river, while, at the same time, an appropriation for St. Clair flats was rejected—the latter having more tonnage and shipping pass its channels and ways in a year than the former in a generation of men; and the expenditure at Richmond, Virginia, of a quarter of a million dollars for a custom-house, with comparatively little commerce, while the port of Buffalo, with more than quadruple the commerce (see Com. and Nav. Rep., 1857) is turned away with about an equal sum for like purposes. Yes, sir, the latter, with a foreign and home shipping and tonnage that the former, however much she may strive to emulate, will never be likely to attain. These are instances; the investigation might be pursued, exhibiting equal intolerance in politics and unfairness of governmental protection.

But it is not for this we now complain; it is in behalf of order, justice, and freedom. We appeal to the love of right and the patriotism of our opponents, and ask them to join us in maintaining those principles which are the law of national virtue and peace and the basis of liberty. In vain do we arrange in this way or that way for the financial depletion of the Treasury; that we adopt this or that mode of foreign policy; that we build ships of war sufficient to repel upon the ocean the combined naval armament of the world, or multiply our military forces upon land garrisoned at every point of accessible attack; while we misunderstand, or, if understood, misapply the great principles of republican freedom.

All other questions sink into insignificance beside the paramount question of human rights and the inalienable political equality of man, the substratum upon which the whole fabric of American independence was reared. Disturb the superstructure, and the edifice is imperiled; remove it, and the whole of its beautiful proportions, reared by the patriotism and cemented by the blood of our fathers, will fall a shapeless ruin.

If you resist this appeal, made by the people of Kansas and the popular heart of the North through their presses, their immense assemblages, and their Representatives in Congress, and its thousand other ways, too plain to be misunderstood, may not this people with whom you have broken the bond of common humanity and brotherhood and again trampled under foot the honor and justice they had a right to expect at your hands, demand redress? They will say, they now say, that that "one blood," of which God has created all the people that dwell upon the face of the earth, demands an audience at the court of power, where they may not plead as heretofore, but declare in the name of the Congress and the people, that no more soil shall be given over to slavery; that the Government shall be administered so as to secure the ends of liberty and justice, instead of despotism and wrong. Here they will take their stand, and while aiming with steady purpose to effect these objects with peaceful means, within constitutional limits, yet should these fail, effect them they will. They propose no innovation upon the established policy of the Government; they only insist upon following in the path illumined by Jefferson and Madison and their compeers in the earlier and better days of the Republic; they claim that this Government shall be marched in the forefront of civilization and Christianity, like the pillar of cloud by day and fire by night before the Israelites, leading our people to prosperity, greatness, and peace. This is the law of American duty; it was taught by our pilgrim fathers, enjoined by the heroes of the Revolution, and the immortal authors of our independence and constitutional Union; it is commanded by the noblest system of civil and religious freedom that man has ever founded, by the voice of patriotism and the genius of liberty.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee then obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. MAYNARD, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 5) making appropriations for the service of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various tribes of Indians, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. COMINS, (at fifteen minutes to six o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. H. N. SIPES.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating copies of two maps to accompany the report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham, transmitted to the Senate on the 10th instant, in compliance with the resolutions of the 4th, 5th, and 20th of January; and, on motion of Mr. STUART, the letter and accompanying maps were referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN. I am requested to present the petition of Robert A. Wainwright, a captain in the ordnance department of the Army, for the reimbursement of a sum of public money which was stolen from him in Boston, while acting as commandant of the arsenal at Watertown, Massachusetts, for which he has accounted to the United States. It was designed that my colleague should introduce this memorial, for the reason that he is more familiar with the usages of the Government in matters of this kind than myself; but he being detained from his seat by indisposition, I introduce it; and when he comes back into the Senate, he will take charge of it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented a petition of citizens of Woodbury, New Jersey, praying for the adoption of some measure by which the southern States shall receive a fair compensation out of the public Treasury or public domain for their slaves, when they shall think proper to emancipate them; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GREEN presented the memorial of J. & R. H. Porter, praying for remuneration for losses sustained while transporting merchandise to Great Salt Lake City, in consequence of orders of the commander of the United States troops in the Territory of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the petition of Jacob Washington Morse, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of John M. Chase and others, owners of the bark Attica, reported a bill (S. No. 167) for the relief of the owners of the bark Attica, of Portland, Maine; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 19) to extend the limitations of the act entitled "An act for the relief of citizens of towns upon lands of the United States, under certain circumstances," approved March 23, 1844, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the papers relating to the claim of B. E. Edwards, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Corporation of Georgetown in relation to the expenses of county roads in Washington county, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 168) to relieve the Corporation of Georgetown from the expense of making and repairing roads west of Rock Creek. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Anthony S. Robinson, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed to accompany Senate bill No. 158.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POLK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 169) relating to conflicting land claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 81) to amend "An act for the relief of Whitmarsh B. Seabrook and others;" which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

NAVAL HISTORICAL RECORDS.

Mr. MASON. I offer the following resolution; and, as it is one of inquiry, I ask that it may be considered now:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the Senate, in tabular form, a statement showing the names, force, and other appropriate description of all vessels of the Navy of the United States which have been captured, lost, or destroyed, since its organization or restoration in 1798; who commanded them at the time; for what cause they were so captured, lost, or destroyed; when and where it occurred; whether the causes which produced these results were ascertained by investigations by courts-martial, courts of inquiry, or otherwise; the finding of such courts-martial, and the opinions of such courts of inquiry, (if either or any were held,) in each case; how far those findings and opinions were carried into effect by those on whom devolved the duty of executing them: and, further, to state the name, character, and force, of all prizes of enemies' vessels-of-war captured by the United States Navy, which were retaken by said enemies in neutral ports, by which the captors were deprived of a right to property therein, which right was conferred upon them by the law regulating the apportionment and distribution of prize money arising from captures made by equal or inferior forces; whether prizes so retaken have been reclaimed from the enemy or from any neutral Power, which has thus, in violation of international law, permitted prizes so situated to be carried from its port or ports by our enemy; and, further, how, or whether, the said captors have been compensated, or sustained in their right to property thus acquired; and, so far as the records of his Department may not supply the information, that he cause the same to be compiled from other sources, (if such there be,) worthy, in his judgment, of reliance, distinguishing, in such cases, the one source from the other.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the Senate a statement giving the names, character, and force of any and all ships of war, or other armed vessels, captured by our Navy, and subsequently taken into the service of the United States, failing a condemnation by our courts, or without a just or regular valuation of them having been made; and whether in such cases, if any, a fair or equitable remuneration has been made to the captors for the transfer of their prizes to the Government; and further, where any merchant vessel has been justly captured by the United States Navy, which has not been sent home for judicial examination or condemnation, but which has, from motives dictated by State policy, been taken from the captors and restored to previous owners, whether any, and if any, a fair and equitable remuneration has been made to the captors for restoration thus made.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish to the Senate copies of any and all correspondence which may have occurred with any foreign Government relative to prize vessels belonging to the Navy of the United States, which have been taken from their ports by the enemy, for reclamation of them, or their value; and also copies of any reports or correspondence of and with the captors of such vessels as have been taken from them in neutral ports.

I will only say that the resolutions, as their tenor imports, are intended to draw from the Navy Department materials for correct history in reference to the career of the American Navy for many years past, and at the same time to do justice, if it shall appear that injustice has been done, to the officers of the Navy making captures during the late war. I have presented them after a good deal of conference and consultation, and at the suggestion of one of the oldest and most distinguished officers of the Navy.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHRISTINE BARNARD.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill which I moved to take up yesterday. It is a bill on its third reading, and it will not take any time, I presume. It is the bill (S. No. 91) to continue a pension of Christine Barnard, of the United States Army, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, of the United States Army.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] who is a member of the Committee on Pensions, signified yesterday that he expected to make some opposition to this bill. I do not see him in his seat now, and I hope the Senator from Georgia will waive this motion until he comes into the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I suggest that if we have leisure to take up this private bill, even if there were no objection to it, I do not see why we might not as well take up the Army bill. It has been upwards of a month under consideration, and it ought certainly to be concluded to-day. It has been often at its conclusion hitherto, but yet seems far from its end. In fact, for one, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I would beg leave to say that I shall never cast a vote here for an adjournment again, and I trust a majority may be of the same opinion, until we have disposed of that bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I move that we proceed to the consideration of the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Before that is done, I wish to make to the Senate a motion relating to a subject peculiarly and indisputably one of privilege in this House, which I suppose is entitled to precedence; if so, I will proceed with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have received, Mr. President, a letter from my friend General Shields, who claims in that letter a right to a seat in this body, and has felt it his duty to his constituents, as well as to himself, to press that claim upon the attention of the Senate. The letter contains a brief and very perspicuous exposition of his claim, and the reason upon which it rests. I beg that that letter may be read, as affording as brief a view as can be presented of the merits of the case. I shall conclude with a motion that the oath of office be administered to him, and that he be admitted to take his seat; of which I trust the Senate will approve. I desire that the Secretary will read that letter to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1858.

SIR: I beg leave to offer a few reasons to show that Minnesota is one of the sovereign States of this Union. My first proposition is, that there are only two forms of political organization under which a community of American citizens can legitimately exist within the jurisdiction and under the Constitution of the United States. The one is the organization of a Territory of the Union; the other, that of a State of the Union. These are the only determinate shapes into which political communities can be molded under our Constitution. Each has its appropriate place in our federal system. A community of American citizens living under a territorial organization is in direct and legitimate connection with the Federal Government. That same community, transformed into a State, is also in direct legitimate connection with the Federal Government. In the transition from a Territory to a State, there is no point of time at which this connection can by any possibility be broken. The territorial government continues in full force until it is superseded by a State government; and whenever the people constitute themselves lawfully into a State, it is, eo instanti, a State of the Union. There is no such political anomaly as a State out of the Union, or not yet in the Union. These erroneous terms have been applied so vaguely to communities whose condition is not easily determined, that the public begin to think there must be some intermediate provisional, probationary state, in which communities are sometimes kept on their passage from the condition of Territories to that of sovereign States of the Union. California was denominated, not many years ago, a State out of the Union. Minnesota is, I suppose, at present considered by some a State not yet in the Union, or, perhaps, a provisional State. Certainly the representatives of Minnesota are at present in a provisional dilemma, not knowing whether they represent a State in the Union or out of the Union.

I now beg leave to refer you to the law of 1857, authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government. The first section contains the following language: "The inhabitants of Minnesota are hereby authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of Minnesota, and to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, according to the Federal Constitution." Here the authority is absolute and unconditional—first, to form a constitution and State government; secondly, to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Authority to make a State and authority to come into the Union. No language could be more positive; no authority could be more plenary; no act could be more determinate. The people have performed their engagements in good faith, and they have a right to expect a like compliance on the part of Congress. These engagements, too, affect the most sacred of all political rights—the constitutional rights of a sovereign State. The third section of the Minnesota enabling act strengthens and corroborates this position. It provides that a convention of delegates shall assemble at the capital of said Territory on the second Monday of July next, (1857,) and first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union "at that time." Mark the language: not thereafter; not upon the happening of any future contingency; but "at that time," to wit: on the second Monday in July, 1857; "and if so," that is, if they shall so determine, "shall proceed to form a constitution, and to take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State."

Here two things are to be specially observed: first, the determination to become a State at that time; not the determination at that time to become a State, but a State at that time. Second, the submission to the approval and ratification of the people. When was Minnesota to become a State? At that time. How was her constitution to be ratified? By submission to the people. She has complied with every requirement. She entered the Union at the time prescribed; her constitution is ratified in the manner prescribed; and yet she is now as completely postponed and ignored as if she had disregarded all her obligations. Permit me to cite two precedents, which, I hope, will prove conclusive in this case. In 1802, an enabling act was passed for Ohio, somewhat similar to, but not so decisive as, the Minnesota act. The authority given was to form a constitution and State government; and then follows this language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union on the same footing with the original States." This was then considered an authorized admission of the State, and the only act of admission that ever took place in the case of Ohio; and that State is now in the Union under and by virtue of the authority of that enabling act.

The enabling act in the case of Indiana contains the following language: "The State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union." Mark the difference in the two acts. In the case of Minnesota, authority is given to come in at the present time. In the case of Indiana, a promise is given for her admission at some future time; under the law, Indiana adopted a constitution and elected representatives, as Minnesota has done.

On the 2d December, 1816, Mr. Hendricks, Representative from the new State, presented his credentials in the House of Representatives, was sworn in, was appointed on a committee, and was allowed to vote and act as a member of that body; and yet it was not until ten days afterwards (on the 12th of the same month) that a joint resolution was passed by both branches of Congress, formally admitting Indiana. This kind of resolution was then considered form—nothing but mere form—something which Congress has the power to observe or omit at pleasure, but something with which the State has no concern, and which cannot affect its right. This was then the opinion of John C. Calhoun, at that time a member of the other House; and this, we may fairly presume, would be his opinion if he were a member of the Senate now. When the precedent was established, Daniel Webster was also a member of the House, and gave it the weight of his authority. But Minnesota stands upon far stronger grounds than Ohio or Indiana—the ground of congressional authority. If this authority is good, Minnesota cannot fail. This is a great question—a question of constitutional right, of national faith. Congressional faith, I sincerely hope, will be held sacred and inviolate in the case of Minnesota by the prompt admission of her representatives. My sense of duty to my constituents compels me, through you, to make this appeal to the Senate.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JAMES SHIELDS,
Senator from Minnesota.

HON. JOHN J. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President—
Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I think I ought to raise a question of order on this subject, though certainly with every respect to the Senator from Kentucky; and I therefore make the point of order, that this is not a question of privilege. If not a question of privilege, it does not supersede the motion which has already been made by me. There is no such State recognized in this body as the State of Minnesota. Upon our records here there is no evidence of the existence of such a State, and consequently no foundation whatever upon which the applicant for a seat here, by this method, can stand. I raise the question of order, and I do it so that the public business may be carried on, and that we may escape irrelevant and immaterial issues upon these subjects.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am perfectly satisfied that the decision of the Chair shall be given on the question of order. I wish to state, furthermore, that I intended to show that the records of this country do show that there is such a State as Minnesota, and that I will present the credentials of General Shields.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will make a statement in reference to the question of order. The Senator from Kentucky rose to what he deemed a question of privilege, and presented the evidence to the Senate upon which he based the question of privilege. The Chair thought it proper that the evidence so presented should be read, in order that the Senate may determine whether the case is one of privilege. The Senate have now the grounds before them on which to determine the question; and, under the authority conferred on the Chair by your rules, he will submit to the Senate the question whether they will take up this subject as a question of privilege. That is the question which the Chair will submit to the Senate. Will the Senate take up this subject as a question of privilege?

Mr. MASON. I understand the exact posture of the question to be this: The Senator from Arkansas moved to take up the Army bill; which motion was pending, when the Senator from Kentucky interposed, and claimed that his motion would have precedence as a question of privilege. If it be not a question of privilege, it cannot take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to have the question fully presented to the Senate. I desire, therefore, that the paper I now present to the Senate may be read. It is the official evidence of the election of General Shields as a Senator.

The Secretary read as follows:

HALL HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA, December 19, 1857.
This is to certify that, at an election held in the Capitol of the State of Minnesota, at St. Paul, by the Senate and House of Representatives of said State, in joint convention on the 19th day of December, 1857, James Shields was duly elected to represent the State of Minnesota in the United States Senate.

R. G. MURPHY,
President pro tempore, Senate.
J. S. WATROUS,
Speaker House of Representatives, State of Minnesota.
S. MEDARY, Governor.
Attest: A. C. DUNN, Secretary of the Senate.
[L. S.] A. F. CHAMBLIN,
Chief Clerk House Representatives, State of Minnesota.

Mr. HUNTER. Do I understand the President of the Senate to submit it to the Senate to decide whether this be a question of privilege or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question, whether it will suspend the motion made to take up the Army bill with a view to take up this question on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky as a question of privilege. The Senate will decide whether it is a question of privilege which supersedes the pending business.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will not decide that this is a question of privilege which shall override all others. I am willing to admit that a question may be made out of it. There have been cases on such applications as this when those claiming to be Senators have been admitted to take seats on the floor by courtesy. I believe there was something of that sort in the case of Michigan, on motion of Mr. Benton, but they have never been admitted as Senators; and I believe there is no decision of the Senate which would go to the length of admitting that they could claim any right to raise a question of privilege. There can be no right to a seat in the Senate until the State is admitted, and none can raise this question of privilege except those who are members from some State. It cannot, therefore, be a question of privilege. I admit that a question in some shape may be raised. That is, they may submit a motion to receive this gentleman by courtesy, as was done in the case of Michigan, and I believe in the case of Tennessee; but I apprehend that there can be no question of privilege, unless it is raised by some member of the Senate, or by some person who has a prima facie claim to membership. There can be no prima facie claim to membership of a Senator from a State which is not admitted; from a Territory, for instance. If the object be to take up the application, to allow them seats by courtesy, I should have nothing to say; but I object to receiving this petition as one which has precedence over all other business, on the score of privilege; and I hope the Senate will not so decide.

Mr. PUGH. I understand it is proposed to submit the question to the Senate, whether the application of General Shields, to be sworn in as a Senator on these credentials, be, or be not, a question of privilege. If it be a question of privilege, it does take precedence of everything else, whether we like it or not. My opinion is, that it is a question of privilege. It is undoubtedly true, as General Shields has stated, that the first enabling act, which was passed by Congress in the case of Ohio, was an act of admission; there never was any other. After the constitution had been formed, when the Senators from that State, or rather the agents from the State, presented the constitution to the Senate, it was referred to a select committee to consider what further steps were necessary; and a very able committee it was. I believe one of the predecessors of my honorable friend, the Senator from Kentucky, (your namesake, sir,) was chairman of that committee. After very full consideration, the committee reported to the Senate that nothing more was necessary for the reception of Ohio into the Union, except the establishment of a district court; and a bill was passed to establish a district court, to extend the laws of the United States into the State of Ohio, as a State. There never was any resolution of admission, or any law at all on the subject, and her Senators were sworn in on the presentation of their credentials. I need not go into any other case. There are other cases which illustrate the principle, but that is the first enabling act ever passed by Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Does he mean to maintain that, by virtue of the enabling act, Minnesota is already a State in the Union?

Mr. PUGH. I shall come to that question by and by. I shall have occasion, when I come to speak of the Kansas question, to elaborate it. I say that an enabling act was justified when it was first proposed, on the ground that it was an act of admission, a conditional act of admission, and when the State to be formed complied with the conditions, she was in the Union without anything else. That is the beginning of all the enabling acts; and that is the only excuse Congress ever had for passing one. That is one reason why, in my judgment, it is not necessary for Kansas, or any other new State, when she presents herself, to have any enabling act. Nothing is requisite but an act of admission.

But cases have arisen where both Houses of Congress have been obliged to consider whether the proposed State has complied with the conditions in the previous act of admission; and that is the question in relation to Minnesota. I have read the report of the Committee on Territories with very great care, and examined the documents submitted with that report; and, although I acknowledge there is no error which we may not heal by a joint resolution of admission, I do not think Minnesota has complied with the terms of the enabling act. I do not think she ever held a convention of delegates as required by that law. I do not consider the breach healed by the subsequent vote that was taken in October. If we object to the form of the vote that was taken in Kansas on the 21st of December, the form of the vote that was taken in Minnesota is just as objectionable; but I agree that these are not fatal defects. They are defects which we can heal by a joint resolution, or a subsequent act of Congress. Therefore, whilst I do believe that this is a question of privilege, that when this gentleman presents himself here, and claims to be a Senator from a State which we have so far recognized as to authorize her to become one on the performance of certain conditions, his claim is a question of privilege. I do not agree that Minnesota has so far complied with the terms of admission as to entitle her Senators and Representatives to be sworn without some waiver by Congress, in the shape of a joint resolution. Therefore, whilst I shall vote to consider it a question of privilege, I cannot, on the facts stated by the Committee on Territories, vote that Minnesota is entitled to have her Representatives and Senators here.

Mr. MASON. I think that the position taken by my colleague is one that is impregnable. This is presented only as a question of privilege. Now, what is a question of privilege? Does a privilege on this floor belong to any other than a Senator? There can be but one answer to that. If he be not a Senator, what privilege can he have as a Senator? Now, is the gentleman who writes the letter which has been presented by the honorable Senator from Kentucky a Senator? Has he taken the oath of office? Is he endowed with one single power conferred on a Senator by the Constitution? Can he exercise any power conferred on a Senator by the Constitution until he has taken the oath to support the Constitution in the presence of the Senate? Is he a Senator to any intent whatever? I do not now speak of his right to become a Senator. That is another and totally different question. Is he one? If he be not one, what possible privilege can he have on this floor other than that of any other American citizen? I have said not a word about his right to become one; but until he is one de facto, and not de jure only, which he claims; but until he is one de facto by taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution, he is endowed with not one single power conferred on a Senator by the Constitution.

Now, one word as to his right. In the letter addressed to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which was read at the table, there is quoted, and I have no doubt correctly quoted, the act authorizing Minnesota to form a constitution and State government. The first section of the act authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a State government contains the following language:

"The inhabitants of the Territory of Minnesota are hereby authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to come into the Union on an equal footing with the original States according to the Federal Constitution."

They are authorized to form a State government, and to come into the Union on a footing with the original States according to the Federal Constitution. Now, what does the Constitution say? In section three of article four, we find:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

The law says they shall have authority to form a State constitution, and to come into the Union according to the Federal Constitution. What does the Federal Constitution prescribe? That they shall come into the Union when admitted by Congress. It may be, but it is not necessary to go into that question, that in the instance of Ohio, cited by the honorable Senator, Congress, in the law giving power to the people of the Territory to erect themselves into a State, at the same time by anticipation, declared that they should be admitted into the Union when their constitution should be formed. It might have given its assent in advance. I have not examined that law. I should think it would be a very improvident exercise of the power of Congress to do it, but that is not the case here. Here authority is given to them to come into the Union according to the Federal Constitution, remitting them in express language to the power conferred by the Constitution on Congress to admit, and requiring an act of admission. Then as to the right set up as a Senator de jure; if he were a Senator de jure; if this were like the law to erect Ohio into a State, and if the assent had been given in advance; still the question of privilege remains behind. He is not a Senator; he is endowed with no power, immunity, or franchise of a Senator until he has taken the oath to support the Constitution, and is thus admitted as a member of the body. A question of privilege, I say, clearly, cannot attach to one standing in the condition in which the honorable gentleman is.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, it seems to me that my friend from Virginia has very hastily adopted inconsiderate opinions on this subject. He says the person in whose behalf this application is made, must be a Senator before any question of privilege can arise respecting his rights, and he seems to suppose that taking the oath is essential to the constitution of his character as a Senator.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Can the alleged Senator who has written the letter exercise any power upon this floor until he has taken the oath to support the Constitution? Until he is endowed with the authority conferred by the Constitution is he a Senator of the United States?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will say this to my honorable friend, that although it may be exceedingly right and proper, and he is required by law to take the oath before he acts, yet it constitutes no part of his senatorial character. If he acts without taking the oath, I would ask the Senator if his acts are not valid? If a judge goes upon the bench without taking the oath of office, and sentences a man to death, is not the sentence valid, and is it not pronounced by a judge? That judge, to be sure, has failed to perform one of the conditions which the commission under the law imposes on him, which is to take an oath. Was not my honorable friend from Virginia a Senator by the election of the State that sent him here before he took an oath? If he was not a Senator before, could your administering any oath to him make him a Senator? No, sir. That authority which constitutes him a Senator, and confers upon him its privileges, is one thing, and the oath required by the United States, as a further sanction and security for his fidelity, is an additional safeguard; that is all.

But suppose I came here, or my honorable friend from Virginia came here, as he has done, with his credentials, and presented them, and you refused to administer to him the oath, can you imagine a more flagrant breach of privilege than that would be? Suppose he stood here now, with the credentials of another election in his hand, demanding to be sworn in, and that you refused to do it, I ask him if that would not be a question of privilege—the highest possible question of privilege? I think he will, on further consideration, agree with me that it is; and this answers completely the reply of my other honorable friend from Virginia, his colleague. It does not seem to me that there is anything in the argument. I am entitled to my seat as a Senator; you refuse to administer to me the oath required by the Constitution, and you therefore exclude me from my seat. If this is not a breach of privilege I am unable to comprehend what it is.

Sir, this is not a new question. We are told that the Senators from the State of Ohio were permitted to take their seats, and did act here without any regular formal act of admission on the record. Now, what does the Constitution say? The gentleman has told us that its provision is, that new States may be admitted into the Union by the Congress; that is all. It is in these general terms, leaving so much to the discretion of Congress, that this whole power is given. These are the general terms of the grant of power. Will the gentleman undertake to prescribe the only mode in which this power shall be exercised? Are not the modes various in which it may be exercised? The Constitution, in general terms, has given the power, but the Constitution has not prescribed the particular modes of action in which you are to exercise that power.

New States may be admitted into the Union by Congress. How? By acts subsequent, or by acts previous, or by acts cotemporaneous. Is there any restriction as to the one mode or the other? May it not be done by a previous act as well as by a subsequent act? Is not Congress competent to say to the people of a Territory do thus and so; make a republican constitution, and having done that you shall be regarded at once as a member of the Confederacy, as a member of the Union? Would not that be an admission of the State? Would that contradict anything in the Constitution? Would it be any extension of the powers granted by the Constitution, or any encroachment upon the Constitution to say beforehand, comply with such and such conditions; place that acceptance of those conditions in your constitution, and you shall thereby and from that instant be a member of the Union and an independent State? May not Congress say that? I do not see why they may not. They may reserve the question if they please. The Constitution having prescribed and limited no particular mode, Congress might, for convenience and expediency's sake, prescribe a mode in which the power shall be exercised; but Congress having made no prescription of that sort as a general law, we are at full liberty as a Senate to act on the subject and to judge of the condition of that population whether it is still a State or Territory. We may by a previous act, as well as by a subsequent one, if I can understand the subject, exercise the power vested by the Constitution in the Senate.

This is not without precedent. But let me remark first, before I come to that, that there is scarcely any of the enabling acts, as they are called, authorizing Territories to convert themselves into States, that are exactly alike. In the case of Louisiana, the act of Congress authorizing them to establish a State government and form for themselves a constitution, provided that that constitution should be sent to Congress and submitted here, and that thereafter it was to become a State if Congress did not disapprove of it. Was that a constitutional act? Louisiana was authorized to make a constitution, to submit that constitution to Congress, and if Congress did not disapprove of it at the next session after its reception, then the State was declared by law to be admitted as a member of the Union. According to that act, she could not become a State until her constitution had been submitted; but no act of admission was necessary for her according to the law: but if Congress did not positively disapprove, she was to become a State.

What becomes, then, of the gentleman's doctrine that after a State is formed, and her constitution presented, we must act upon a view of the constitution, and pass an act of admission? In no other enabling act that I know of does this provision occur. The language of some would induce us to believe that Congress intended by that act to enable the people of the Territory to convert themselves into a State at once, and Congress has so considered it. The case of Indiana, though not quite so strong in the language of its act as this case is, presents a remarkable precedent on this subject. It was in the year 1816, and in the summer of that year, that the people of the Territory of Indiana, acting under an enabling act, authorizing them to form a constitution and State government for themselves, did so. They elected Representatives to Congress before there had been any meeting of Congress, or they had been admitted into the Union. Those Representatives appeared at the beginning of the next session of the Congress to which they were elected, and were received without any act being passed admitting the State into the Union.

Again, sir, it happened that in that fall there was a presidential election. They elected electors for President and Vice President. Their election, as we all know, took place before the meeting of Congress. When the votes were counted in the following February, the question was at once made in the House of Representatives whether those votes could be counted. It was said that States alone had a right to participate in the election of a President of the United States, through the agency of electors, and that Indiana was not a State, for she had not been formally admitted by an act of Congress until after the time she had chosen electors. But the vote of her electors was counted, after a discussion and consideration of the subject, and attention particularly drawn to it in the House of Representatives. The Senate retired from the joint conference, then holding, in order to enable the House of Representatives to settle the question.

There was Mr. Calhoun, and there were various other men whose names have since become eminent, and particularly eminent as constitutional lawyers. Mr. Calhoun said the votes were proper, and ought to be counted; yet they were the votes of electors who had been elected between the time when the people had formed a State government, and the time of the formal admission of the State by Congress. If William Hendricks could be admitted there to take his seat in Congress before any act of formal admission subsequent to the formation of the constitution of Indiana; if electors could have their votes entitled to be counted for that State before any formal admission of her by Congress, why not the Senators elected to this body from Minnesota be permitted to take their seats and act before the formal admission?

The point that is made on the part of the individual applying to take his seat as a Senator is, that Minnesota is a State in virtue of the enabling act; that that act enabled her on certain terms and conditions to be at once a State, and to come into the Union as such under the Federal Constitution. She has performed those conditions. She has become a State, according to his view and his argument, and is entitled to be represented on this floor as a State. As Mr. Hendricks was permitted in the other House to take his seat, and to vote, and the votes of electors for President and Vice President were allowed to be counted, although they were elected before any formal admission by Congress, I see no reason why the gentleman in question has not a just, constitutional, and lawful privilege to take his seat here; and, if it be denied to him, to appeal to you and to this body as upon a question of privilege to maintain and vindicate his right.

The allowing him to take his seat here is one thing, and a formal admission of the State another. There may be, and are, certain purposes for which it is very convenient to pass an act of formal admission into the Union. That may be done; but it does not follow because that may be done that the Senator shall not be permitted, before this formal act be done, to take his seat and represent his State. You know that the constitution has been made; you know, and the Senate know, that that constitution is of the character required by the enabling law, and by the Constitution of the United States we know the capacity of the principal to appoint such representatives; we know, however, that in transactions of such consequence as the admission of States, it may be well enough for us to adhere to the principle of giving a subsequent consent, and admitting the State by subsequent act. We can retain that; but where is the reason why this State shall be unrepresented in either House, until you can have passed that act? The forms require delay. Here is a State entitled to admission; and if it is entitled to admission, it is entitled to representatives on this floor. It is the privilege of the State to require it; it is the privilege of the person she elects to represent her to require it, and that is all that is done.

The first question required by the enabling act, in respect to Minnesota in forming her constitution, tion, to be decided, is whether the people of the Territory described, desire to be formed and admitted as a State into the Union at once? That question was put, and that question was decided in the affirmative. The people of Minnesota said, "We desire to be admitted at once; it is not now our wish hereafter to be admitted, but it is our desire, our determination, to be admitted now, at once, into the Union." That is the question which Congress directed to be put. That is the question which was decided, and every other condition required by Congress was fully complied with, as the constitution now before you shows.

What evasion then is it, Mr. President, to decline to receive her representatives on this floor on an equal footing with those of the other States of this Union. I confess it seems to me they have as perfect a right as I have to a seat here, and if I might come from my State, with all the legally required authentications of my right, and present them to you, and from negligence, from apathy, from opposition; or from any other cause, you were to refuse to administer to me the oath, the argument of the gentleman from Virginia would apply—"Oh, this is no breach of privilege; you are not a Senator; your State has certified you to be a Senator; the Legislature has declared you to be a Senator; but the Federal authorities require you to take an oath, and that oath is necessary to make you a Senator." No, sir; I am as much a Senator before I take the oath as I am afterwards. It contributes nothing to make me a Senator. If I fail to take that oath, and presume to act without it, I am guilty of an offense; but I am a Senator before. Can you treat any gentleman elected to this body in this manner—refuse to administer to him the oath, and then tell him, "For that cause I have annulled you as a Senator, and you can make no question of privilege in regard to it? one must be a Senator before a question of privilege can attach to him; you are not one, because I have not sworn you; and I will not swear you, because I do not intend that you shall act as a Senator." If that is not a breach of privilege, it is utterly incomprehensible to me what can be. It is a breach of privilege—a flagrant one; and it is not less a breach of privilege because there is the power in those who commit it to avoid responsibility for it.

It is not my wish to trespass on the Senate a moment longer than the necessity of this case seems to require.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It must be apparent that, if this subject is to be considered, to-day will certainly be consumed by it. I do not believe that the Senator from Kentucky himself has a doubt in regard to that. It is plain that this discussion must carry us through the whole Kansas and Nebraska affair. It is kindred to that; and if it is to be discussed, I am sure there is in the Senate a vast amount of metaphysical, legal, and ancient lore on all this subject, certainly sufficient to carry us through the whole of this day.

In this direction the Senate has already gone. My honorable friend, who meets me with a smile, [Mr. PUGH,] was the first to open it in that direction, and to announce questions which would come up in the discussion of the Kansas matter, as to the admission of States into the Union. I see no limit to the field now before us. I know that for a month we have been considering the Army bill, and that we have often felt that we were at the very point of taking the final vote on the question, either granting relief to the Government or rejecting it altogether; but still for some petty question, or petty irritation, or petty courtesy if you please, it has been laid over and deferred, until now we have the most serious question of the session pressing right upon us. I think it is desirable to dispose of the Army bill.

I cannot but feel that the honorable Senator from Kentucky must know that the question which he has presented is in a great measure an irrelevant issue. It seems so to me. I will not go into a discussion of the merits of the case. The whole subject must come up at no distant day; and I believe, in fact, that the bill for the admission of Minnesota was made the special order for to-day. It is certainly contemplated to take up the whole subject on Monday next. There is but little time left us to dispose of the Army bill; and the public exigency calling for its passage has been urged upon us as imminent, important, and almost vital.

I would appeal to the Senator, in this view of the facts, to withdraw his present motion, or to postpone it. I make this appeal to him now without saying anything more; for I do not believe that he wishes to impede the public business, or delay the disposition of the Army bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky, believing that he does not wish to impede the public business, and that the question which he has raised is irrelevant, and can result in no immediate action, to withdraw his proposition, which it must be palpable to him will consume the whole day.

Mr. HUNTER. Will my friend allow me to suggest that we agree to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary at once. We can do that without debate, if the Senator from Kentucky will consent to it, I imagine.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. That would be sending it a long ways off—sending it to the grave, rather.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would not embarrass the Senator from Kentucky by making any unreasonable request of him. Certainly with no disrespect to him, I move to lay the question on the table. I think that will end the discussion. I have said nothing in a spirit which could provoke reply, and I must insist on my motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal to the honorable Senator to allow me to say one word in explanation of my vote?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator knows so well that I would do almost anything to oblige him, that I am sure he will not take it unkind if I decline to withdraw the motion.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to suggest that perhaps the Senator from Kentucky is prepared on the subject; and as he seems to have examined it thoroughly, he may cast some important light on it; and I was in hopes he would be permitted to proceed without interruption, and that the matter would rest there, without any further discussion. I am anxious to hear his views. I really think we should permit him to go on.

Several Senators. He has concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I must raise a question of order. I declined to withdraw my motion for the Senator from New York, and I certainly cannot withdraw the motion now for any one else.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say that, at the request of my colleague, [Mr. BIGLER,] who has been called away, I have paired off with him on this question.

Mr. STUART. I should like to inquire of the Chair what it is proposed to lay on the table? As I understand it, the Presiding Officer has submitted to the Senate, for decision, this point: "Is this a question of privilege?" If that is the pending question, I should like to be informed how you can lay that on the table.

Mr. HUNTER. This question grows out of the memorial; and if we lay that on the table, everything connected with it goes on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It does not grow out of a memorial. I informed the Senate that I intended to make a motion in relation to a subject peculiarly one of privilege. I desired, as the ground of the motion I intended to make, that the letter be read. I presented another document afterwards, and I had some remarks with which to follow it up, and to conclude with a motion.

Mr. SEWARD. It seems that everybody else has a right to speak on this question except myself. I desire now either to have a vote taken upon it, or else that I may be heard. The point of order is raised by the Senator from Michigan, whether this is a question that can be laid on the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is correct, and the Chair will state the question. The Senator from Kentucky submitted the application of James Shields to be now sworn in as a Senator from Minnesota, accompanied with his credentials, which he desired to be read, and brought it to the attention of the Senate as a question of privilege. The Chair submitted to the Senate the determination of the point, whether it be a question of privilege. The Senator from Arkansas moves to lay the whole subject on the table. The Chair supposes he must entertain that motion. Upon this question the Senator from Georgia asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall vote "nay" out of courtesy to the Senator from New York, whose remarks I wish to hear.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator will not put it on any such ground.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask a question. What will be the effect of laying this matter on the table? Cannot the Senator from Kentucky, the moment he gets the floor, call it up again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think it proper for him, at this time, to enter into any suggestions on that subject.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, resulted—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—26.

So the Senate refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask what the question before Senate now is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is whether the Senate will take up this subject as a question of privilege.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. I understand that the President, when he stated the question, said that by an express provision of the rules, he would submit this matter to the Senate. I suppose he referred to the 6th rule, the last part of which is:

"And every question of order shall be decided by the President, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order."

I take it that means that a question of order is to be decided, without debate, by the Chair; and if the Chair takes the sense of the Senate on it that does not open a license to debate, but the prohibition against debate still continues.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not act on that rule. When a proposition is made by any Senator to take up a question as a matter of privilege, the Chair thinks it is hardly a question of order; but it is for the Senate to determine whether the question is one of privilege under the general parliamentary law. The Chair thinks that properly he can put that question to the Senate without any regard to the written rules of the body.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Chair, but my ear may have deceived me, to say that he referred it to the Senate, and that he did so under an express rule of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may have said so; but if he did say so, it was an error.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I regard this question as addressing itself to our considerations, in the first place on the ground of expediency; and in the next place to our judgment upon the nature or character of the question involved. I am quite desirous for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union as soon as it can be done. I have on every occasion voted to take up the bill for that purpose and to pass it. In giving a vote against this motion, I might seem to be unwilling to favor an occasion for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union. Whatever may be the condition of Minnesota now, whatever may be her character, whatever stage she may have arrived at in her growth from a Territory towards that of a State, I am very clear in one thing: that if the Senate of the United States, after all that has been done here, and all that has been done in the Territory of Minnesota, should admit the applicant, General Shields, and his associate to be Senators on this floor, and if the House of Representatives should also admit one or more Representatives from Minnesota, on the floor of the House of Representatives as Representatives of that State, I think the act of the admission of Minnesota would thereby be completed and finished. If there is no other way in which this can be done, no more formal or technical manner, I am willing to admit the State in this way, and to do it now, and anxious to do it now.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 55.

But the proceeding instituted by the petitioner requires explanation, which I should be glad to hear; and that is, why he alone of two Senators makes an application to be admitted to the Senate, when the State is entitled to two Senators, and we are informed unofficially that two have been appointed; whether the other person who has been elected a Senator accepts the trust, or whether he disclaims or renounces it; and whether he proposes to bring the State into the Union in this way; or whether he proposes to stay out, and so leave the community half Territory and half State? I assume this application, however, to be an act in good faith on the part of both the Senators who have been elected from that State. I suppose there is a concert between them, and that this is merely an accidental omission to which I have called the attention of the Senate. I will very cheerfully vote for taking up this question, because it affords one way in which proceedings may be adopted by which the State of Minnesota can be brought into the Union legally, constitutionally, and properly.

Then, as to the other point, I think that it is clearly a question of privilege; and I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio on that subject. The rule which has been given out to us by the Senator from Virginia seems to me too narrow in its range to embrace all the questions of privilege which must necessarily arise. He says that a person must be not merely elected a Senator, and his term of service have commenced, but also that he must have been qualified to act as a Senator by the Chair, or by some competent authority, before he can claim or exercise the privilege of a Senator on this floor, or before any question of privilege can be raised by him, or in his behalf. I think not, sir. I think a Senator appointed by his State, when his term of service has begun, is a Senator in Congress; and if he shall come into this Hall, he is entitled to be here against everybody that may be in or out; and that while he stands here and asks that you will administer to him the oath, he is a Senator; and that he exercises the privilege of his office in claiming to be sworn; and that you award to him the oath on the ground of his privilege as a member of this body.

If that be so, then this is a question of privilege, if the Territory or State of Minnesota stands in such a relation to send a Senator here to claim a seat or to ask to be recognized by the Senate of the United States. There, again, the question, whether Minnesota is a State or Territory, involves the whole question. Privilege is merged in the greater question, whether Minnesota is a State or not, which has been presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, and that greater question necessarily involves the question of privilege. On that question I am willing to be instructed; I am willing to be enlightened; and I see no such peremptory conclusion against the claim set up for Minnesota, namely, that she is actually a State in the Union now. That has been announced by the Senator from Virginia, as his deduction from the premises.

The Constitution of the United States says that new States may be admitted by Congress. There is no form, no method, no rule, no system of practice, no formula, by which the admission of a State must be conducted. It may be done in one way, or it may be in another. It requires but two things independent of the qualifications of a State in its constitution; one is, that the State shall consent to come in; and the other is, that Congress shall admit her in. Whatever form Congress shall adopt is sufficient, if the State is in a position to entitle her to admission. I admit that this letter of General Shields may be fairly read as a petition on the part of Minnesota, saying, "we have complied with the conditions which were prescribed to us; we have organized ourselves as a State; we are here, and we ask you to admit us by swearing in our Senators." As I said before, if you will only swear the Senators and Representatives, the State will then be here beyond all manner of doubt. It is on this ground that I shall vote.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my friend allow me to make an inquiry of him? Suppose the Senate should, on examination of the matter, conclude to administer the oath of office to the Senators elect, and the House of Representatives should refuse to admit the members: what then?

Mr. SEWARD. I have already anticipated that, by saying that I found that difficulty in the case, and I wanted an explanation why it is the other Senator did not ask to be sworn in? because the State would not be but half admitted if only one Senator should be sworn; and if the Representatives were not admitted into the House of Representatives it would be less than that; nevertheless, I am willing to take the question up, and consider it, trusting that the other Senator from Minnesota and the Representatives may unite in the movement. But I propose to go no further now in this debate than to take the subject up as a matter of privilege. That is the question, and the only question, before the Senate; to that question, and no further, shall I speak.

Mr. STUART. I desire to say a very few words directly to the point propounded to the Senate by the President—is this a question of privilege? The claimant contends that Minnesota is a State in the Union without any other action of Congress whatever; and that, being in that condition, he is entitled to his seat on this floor. Whether he is entitled or not is a question for our determination; but the only point to be considered, as now presented to the Senate by the Presiding Officer, is, is that matter a question of privilege? Well, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that it is; and if the Senate decide that it is, they do not decide that the claimant is entitled to his seat. They may consider the subject and decide against him. They may determine that the ground on which he predicates this claim is wrong; that it is unfounded; that it requires subsequent legislation before Minnesota is a State in the Union; but whether that legislation be necessary, or whether he is now entitled to his seat without any further act of Congress, is certainly a question of privilege—a question of whether he has the privilege of a seat on this floor or not. He claims that he has. To say that because a Senator thinks the ground on which the claimant presents his claim is unfounded, therefore it is not a question of privilege, is to beg the whole question. We decide here, almost every session, that a Senator is not entitled to his seat; but is it not a question of privilege whether he is or not? I never heard it doubted before.

The Senator from Virginia argues that Minnesota is not in a condition to entitle her Senators to take seats on this floor, and therefore it is not a question of privilege! The Senator from Ohio says, that if she had pursued precisely the course laid down in the enabling act, she would have been in that condition; but he thinks she has not pursued it. Are not both of these matters of opinion? The Senator who sends the memorial here takes the ground that Minnesota is in the Union in virtue of the enabling act, without any other legislation on the part of Congress; and being thus in the Union, he asks to be sworn in, and to take his seat as a Senator. Whether he has a right to make that demand or not, is a question of privilege. How I may decide on a consideration of this question of privilege, is quite another subject. I may come to the conclusion that the basis upon which this memorial is founded is wrong. I may come to the conclusion that further legislation is necessary on the part of Congress, before the Senators elected by the State of Minnesota are entitled to their seats, and thus refuse to grant the privilege which is presented by this Senator; but that does not strip it of its character as a question of privilege. Whenever a Senator, elected by a State, comes here and claims a seat on this floor, it is a question of privilege. That is its character. If it is not that, what is it? It seems to me that, viewed in this light, it is of no consequence what the ultimate judgment of the Senate on the subject may be, in order to decide the character of this question. If you admit the claim of the memorialist, if you say that he is right, then I take it everybody will concede that it is a question of privilege.

Now the point is, is he right? That is the question presented; and it is a question of privilege. Why? Because the right of any gentleman to a seat on this floor is a question of privilege. It affects the organization of the body, and falls within that class of cases denominated, under parliamentary law, questions of privilege. In my humble judgment, that is the only question to be decided at present, upon the suggestion that has been made from the Chair—is it a question of privilege? The Senate say "yes." Having said that, they can postpone it; they can do with it what they can with any other question.

I did not vote at all on the motion to lay this subject on the table, because I submitted, and I certainly think that the question as propounded by the Chair—will the Senate take this up and consider it as a question of privilege?—is not a subject which can be laid on the table. But, being regarded as such a question, it is before the Senate; and then it may be postponed for the Army bill; it may be laid on the table; it may be disposed of like any other question which is before the Senate; and that, in my humble judgment, (I say it with respect to all others,) is the best way to get rid of this subject. When the preliminary point is once decided, we can lay it on the table, and go on with the Army bill, or do anything else that a majority of the Senate choose.

But, sir, I shall not detain the Senate, but shall conclude by a simple restatement. Here is an individual elected by the State of Minnesota in virtue of an act of Congress, as he claims; and he claims that, in virtue of that act of Congress and of his election, he is entitled now to take his seat in this body. It is not necessary to decide that he is entitled to it in order to say that this is a question of privilege. The Senate may decide against his claim, but it is no less a question of privilege, and it falls within that class of parliamentary questions denominated questions of privilege.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely desire to state the point I took in relation to this matter. I say that, to make it a question of privilege, it must be necessary for the petitioner to show at least a prima facie right or title to a seat. Suppose some one should come here and claim to be a Senator from Arizona: would that be a question of privilege which we should have to consider in preference to all other business? Clearly not; because it would be manifest he had no prima facie title to a seat. I say there can be no such title, because, in order that there may be a Senator, it is necessary that there should be a State to elect him. It is obvious that Minnesota is not a State. There can be no dispute about that.

The Senator from Ohio says it may be brought in under an enabling act. Clearly not. The enabling act is only passed to allow the Territory to form a constitution, and present its constitution preliminary to admission. You cannot admit it beforehand, because Congress has to judge whether the constitution is republican. To make it a State requires the assent of both parties. This case stands a little different from the ordinary case of contested elections, and the questions of privilege which arise out of them. This is a case in which you have to decide the preliminary question as to the admission of the State. To say that this is a matter of privilege, would be to allow any petitioner to come here and claim a seat, and to decide that you must give precedence to that question.

Mr. STUART. The Senator will allow me to present to him a supposed state of things. The Senator from Virginia is endeavoring to show that Minnesota is not in a condition to entitle this gentleman to a seat here as her Senator. The Senator from Kentucky, who presented the credentials, contends that it is. Now, sir, it is not a case of common consent like Arizona, or Kamtschatka, or some other case where the application would be a mere sham. The Senator will see that, taking his own position and that of the Senator from Kentucky, it is a question.

Mr. HUNTER. Senators may make a question of anything. It is for the Senate to say whether it is a question. It seems to me to be no more of a question than the case I have supposed of Arizona. It is sought to be made a question on the ground that this petitioner has made the question by claiming to be a Senator. I say if that be admitted, we should have to allow a petitioner who claimed to be Senator from Arizona, to raise such a question; for, clearly, no State can be brought into the Union until there is an assent by both parties—until the Territory claiming to be admitted, and the Congress which acts for the Federal Government, agree to its admission. To claim otherwise would be to say that this is a State at any rate, and that if we did not admit her, she is a State out of the Union—an entirely anomalous relation, for which our constitution has not provided. But, I believe, to settle this question, it would be better to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am willing to have it inquired into. All I object to is admitting it to be a question of privilege which is to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think that the gentlemen who have spoken have argued this question very well, and that we all understand it; and I propose to dispose of it in a way which I think will meet their views. I concur with the Senator from New York, and other gentlemen, that this question depends entirely on whether Minnesota be or be not a State in this Union. Under the Constitution Congress admits new States. Has Congress admitted this new State of Minnesota? I simply want to make that inquiry, and therefore I propose this resolution to dispose of the case:

Resolved, That the question of the admission of James Shields to a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws.

That covers the whole question. If she is a State, this is a privileged question, unquestionably. The privilege of a Senator, for many purposes, commences from the time of his election, and not from the time of his induction here. Senators have privileges given in the Constitution, to be free from arrest in coming to, and returning from, here. If he was arrested on the wayside for debt, and pleaded privilege, the exhibition of his commission would be a sufficient answer to the action; and, therefore, swearing him in in this body is not at all necessary to his character of Senator. In this case, the whole matter is dependent on the question, whether Minnesota is a State of the Union, or not?

In 1802, when Ohio, under an enabling act, had made a constitution, and went on, under the regular forms, to constitute a State government, a committee of this body was appointed. You will not find it in the printed Journals, but it is now in manuscript in the Secretary's office. The committee were to inquire whether or not Ohio was a State. They said Congress had passed an enabling act, that Ohio had complied with the conditions, and that nothing else was necessary, but to extend the laws of the United States over her. They did that, and swore in the members. They decided that she had complied with all the conditions, and was a State. Now, if it be decided that Minnesota is a State without further legislation, this is a question of privilege, and the gentleman ought to be admitted to his seat. If she is not a State, he ought not to be admitted. The consequences to which the Senator from New York very properly referred cannot exist, because we can never presume that the other House would do wrong. If she be a State, we are bound to presume that the House of Representatives will admit her Representatives to take their seats at once; if she is not a State, it is our province to admit her in the terms of the Constitution, and until that is done, she cannot be represented here.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a very few minutes. This is, to some extent, a new subject, well worthy the consideration of the Senate, and more consideration, perhaps, than I have been able to bestow on it in forming my own opinions. But it seems to me that, in transforming the people of a Territory into a State, there are various stages of progress, and there are various effects resulting in the course of that progress. You regard the Territory, long before its admission, in many respects, as a State. It has, in obedience to your law enabling it to become a State, formed a government for itself. It is not yet formally admitted by Congress, but Congress always recognizes various acts, done by it before admission, which none but a State could do. For instance, if the State were admitted, I presume no gentleman here would hesitate to receive the Senators already elected; but yet, in a very technical and strict sense, none but States can elect Senators. If she is not a State until a formal act of admission is passed and put on record here, then her election of Senators is null; yet, by the constant practice of the Senate, from the moment her constitution has been formed, and her Legislature have assembled who are competent to elect a Senator, you recognize the validity of her election of a Senator. The other House, in the presidential election of Mr. Monroe, recognized Indiana, before her admission as a State, so far as was necessary to enable her to elect electors of President and Vice President. This was not done without a reason.

So, sir, you recognize her as a State in her election of a State Legislature, whose powers are to come from her own constitution, and not from your organic law. You recognize her as a State in her election of Governor, under the contemplated State organization. In all the preliminary acts you recognize her as a State, though she has not been admitted. You recognize her election of Senators as a valid one, unless the State be afterwards rejected. If you recognize their election as valid, how can you refuse them seats here? Can you say it is because she is not yet formally admitted? The same argument, if it avails against their right to take seats, avails against her right to elect them. You recognize the principle, and you refuse the necessary consequence—so it seems to me.

After all these preliminary acts which are partial recognitions (they are recognitions in these particulars of it as a State) to cover all, to be more comprehensive, to embrace all, you put upon the record, in the most formal manner, as you ought to do, a formal admission of the State into the United States. All that you have done before, in those acts to which I have alluded, is a partial recognition. The House of Representatives, with the concurrence of the Senate, did it in the case of the electors of Indiana, to which I have alluded, because there the vote was counted after attention had been called to it, after objection had been made, and Mr. Calhoun and others, strict guardians of the Constitution, said "right;" and that same Congress permitted William Hendricks to be sworn in and take his seat as a member from Indiana, before the formal admission of the State. It seems to me that, notwithstanding these imperfect—as I consider them—and partial recognitions of it as a State, it would be competent for Congress, when the great comprehensive question of admission as a State came up to be decided, if they discovered any insuperable objections on grounds of constitution or otherwise, to say, "This State is rejected; its constitution is not accepted; the State is not admitted." That would put an end, to be sure, to all the partial and preliminary recognitions which had been made.

That has been the course of Congress; that is the convenient course; that, it seems to me, is the sensible course. It leaves everything in the power of Congress. It gives due effect to every step taken in the progress of a Territory towards the official consummation of her becoming a State. The formal admission afterwards makes assurance doubly sure; rejection annuls it because all that preceded it were but partial and imperfect recognitions. So it is with the recognition of the validity of this election of Senators, if you will esteem it as such, whenever the State is admitted. You have, in various other instances, regarded such an election as valid and admitted the Senators after the formal admission of the State, thus acknowledging the validity of an election made before; and it seems to me inconsistent to say that the validity of the election is not disputed, but the right to take a seat here under that election is no question of privilege and no right at all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I quite concur with the Senator from Georgia that this whole question turns on the point whether Minnesota is a State of the Union. If she is, then it was clearly the right of the Senator from Kentucky this morning to move, as he did, to swear in her Senators, as much so as it would be the privilege of the Senator from Texas to rise to-morrow morning and move to swear in his absent colleague who has not yet taken the oath. It is not technically a question of privilege; it is rather what we call, in parliamentary law, a privileged question. The distinction is not worth drawing here, perhaps, but still there is a distinction.

Now, is Minnesota a State of the Union? I shall vote for the resolution proposed by the Senator from Georgia; but I do it in deference to the judgment of other gentlemen, and to get clear of the question now, and not because there is one single shade of a shadow of doubt on my mind on the subject. Minnesota is not a State of the Union. If she is, she must have been made so by the enabling act. There is no pretense that she has become a State in any other way. Who knows? How has it been congressionally ascertained that she has complied with the enabling act? Where is the judgment on that subject? How has it been ascertained that her constitution does not infringe or violate the Constitution of the United States? When was it ascertained, and put upon the record, that her constitution is republican in its form? All these things may be true, but they have not been ascertained. There is nothing on the record to show that they are true. Where is the evidence, that in fixing her boundaries, she has not run into the adjoining States, and cut off a part of Iowa and Wisconsin? Has it been ascertained that that is not true? Suppose, without inquiry, just by virtue of the enabling act, she is now in the Union, and it turns out that her constitution is not republican in form, that her boundaries violate the boundaries of the adjoining States, that she has in other respects violated the Constitution of the United States: then what? Is she out of the Union? Do you break up the Union by turning her out to-morrow as soon as you ascertain that these things are true? If she is in the Union, she is in from the day her constitution was passed by the members of the convention which made it, for you have done nothing to give sanction to it since that. If she is in by virtue of the enabling act, she is in from the very hour when the convention made the constitution; and then I suppose the very instant you find out that her constitution is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, she goes out. That is an act of dissolution.

I speak of these matters simply to show what strikes me to be the absurdity of declaring a State in the Union in this sort of informal way. If she cannot be in the Union with a constitution anti-republican; if she cannot be in with boundaries which infringe the boundaries of other States; if she cannot be in because her constitution provides for orders of nobility, stars, and garters, and all that; if she cannot be in for any one of the hundred reasons which I could name, then there must be a necessity for ascertaining that these objections do not exist before she is in at all. Who has ascertained it? It is the duty of Congress under the clause of the Constitution, which authorizes it to admit new States, to ascertain all these points. When they have done it, and put that ascertainment in the form of a judgment on the records, the State is in, and not till then. About this I have no doubt, and I am astonished to find that anybody else has; but still in deference to the opinion of other gentlemen, and to get clear of the question, I will vote for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to make a few inquiries before I vote on this question, if there is any question to be voted upon. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he has examined this question, as I suppose he has, whether the admission of a State into the Union, as he understands it, cannot be made by an act of Congress to depend on a future act of that State, complying with certain conditions; and whether, if they are complied with, the State is not in from the time they are complied with? I think Minnesota is a little nearer in the Union than Rhode Island was from the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted until we accepted that Constitution and adopted it ourselves. Rhode Island, from 1787 to 1791, was without the jurisdiction of the United States. You could enforce no law upon them, and collect no revenue from them. They kept without the Union for four years. The condition of their coming into this Union was, that they should have a convention and accept the constitution of the United States. They did accept it, and they were in. They not only did not elect a new Legislature, but the Legislature that was chosen before they were within the Union elected Senators and sent them here, and they took their seats, and had a right to take them, in my opinion.

I say that it does not depend on any particular form of admission. If they agree according to the Constitution and according to the law of the United States and comply with all its provisions, they are in the Union practically. Suppose, as the Senator from Mississippi says, their constitution does not conform to the Constitution of the United States; then it is invalid from the outset, it is good for nothing from the beginning; but it is said you must go through the form. The first Senators from Rhode Island would have thought it very singular, and I dare say the first Senators from North Carolina would, for they did not come in for three years, if they should be questioned whether their Legislature was elected after the adoption of the constitution or before. They came in according to the provisions of the Constitution, and a State can come in to-day according to the provisions of the Constitution and the provisions of a law of Congress.

This Territory has been within the jurisdiction of the United States ever since the Constitution was formed. We can prescribe, as I understand, the mode of their coming here and the mode of their making preparation for admission. I hold that that is a very different thing from what it is for a Territorial Legislature to undertake to usurp authority and send Senators here. We have given them authority to become a State; and the question is, are they a State? I agree there must be steps in this proceeding; there must be step after step, but does anybody contend that any validity could be given to this election, and to the credentials of the Senators which are presented, by anything we can do here formally admitting Minnesota as a State? If it was not a State when they were elected, their election is good for nothing. In the routine of business, it is not so material which point you take up first.

The Senator from Kentucky says Louisiana was admitted in the same way; that they were authorized to frame a constitution, and that they had a right to send members here. Did I so understand?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Louisiana was authorized to form a constitution, and did so; and was required by the same act to send her constitution here, and if that constitution was not rejected by Congress, she was declared by the enabling act to be a State of the Union, without any vote of admission.

Mr. SIMMONS. There was no vote of admission; that is what I understand. It was perfectly competent, then, for Congress to have said so in regard to Minnesota. If they did not say so, it does not follow that the people of Minnesota must go back and elect their Legislature over again, and that we must exclude them because we did not think of that, and turn them adrift with no territorial or State government. In my opinion we must recognize these things as having taken place. I believe the Senator from Minnesota comes here with his credentials; I did not happen to be in the Chamber when they were presented; but it seems to me this question, if properly made, is as much a question of privilege, as if I or any other Senator in this body were to present credentials, and our taking a seat should be resisted.

I think there is no such practical difficulty as the Senator from Virginia imagines. He seems to suppose that you have to go into all the matters from the foundation, and that this State, if we do not admit her, would exist as a State out of the Union. There is no such thing. Our jurisdiction extends over Minnesota now as much as over any State of the Union.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator should not understand me as saying that it is a State out of the Union. I say that seems to me to be the legitimate consequence of the doctrine on the other side.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the answer of the Senator from Virginia to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky that, if we admitted the Senators from Minnesota and afterwards turned them out, if there was any informality in the proceedings, they would be a State out of the Union. I cannot so understand it. I think they would be in the Union anyhow. I do not believe they can get out of it. I do not believe there is so much facility in getting out of the Union as some do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is, whether the application of James Shields is a question of privilege. The Senator from Georgia proposes to refer that question by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the question of the admission of James Shields to a seat in this body, as a Senator from the State of Minnesota, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire whether or not Minnesota is a State of the Union under the Constitution and laws.

The resolution was adopted.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SIMMONS to amend the substitute offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, by striking out in the first section the words, "four thousand," and inserting, "three regiments, or thirty companies."

Mr. SIMMONS. The object of the amendment is to leave it optional with the President to muster into service three regiments, or thirty companies of volunteers. I propose this as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, to raise volunteers instead of regulars. Objection was made a week ago, when we had this bill up, that four thousand volunteers would cost more than the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, for three regiments of regulars. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was objected to on the ground that it called for more men, and, therefore, it would be more expensive. I propose to raise the same number of companies suggested by the Senator from Virginia, and to give the President authority to accept them by regiments or companies, as the public service may require. I think myself that if volunteers are accepted, it may be more convenient for the Government to employ them in companies than in regiments; but that will depend on their mode of organizing them. I think, if I understood the Senator from Tennessee, he was willing to accept this modification, and put it down to the same number proposed by the Senator from Virginia; and then the question will come up simply in the preference between the two kinds of forces—regulars or volunteers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think by a reference to the first section of my substitute the Senator will find it proposes to raise them in regiments, battalions, or companies. All that it will be necessary for the Senator to do will be to move to strike out "four thousand" and insert "three regiments."

Mr. SIMMONS. They must be raised by companies. Thirty companies make three regiments.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Perhaps the Senator does not understand me. I will state again that the first section of the substitute authorizes the President to receive into the service of the United States companies, battalions, or regiments of volunteers to any extent not exceeding four thousand men. The Senator will attain his object by striking out "four" and inserting "three."

Mr. SIMMONS. Three regiments would be about two thousand two hundred men.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. But say three thousand men, and that would bring it within the proper limit.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I want is to bring the amendment down, so that no man who is for restricting the bill can say that volunteers cost more than regulars. I want to have a fair question between regulars and volunteers. The objection I have heard urged is, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee authorizes the President to employ a great many more men, and would require, therefore, a greater outlay than the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. I want to reduce it down to the same number of men that would be contained in three regiments of regulars; and if that can be done, my object will be attained.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think striking out the word "four," and inserting "three," will accomplish the idea of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one circumstance. If that is the purpose of this bill, I will say that the President be authorized to accept two thousand two hundred and twenty men. That is just the number of thirty companies, or three regiments, as now authorized by law. There are seventy-four men in a company, and thirty companies would be two thousand two hundred and twenty men; or, say not exceeding two thousand five hundred men. I do not care about the exact number, so that I am within a reasonable range. I modify my amendment, so as to move to strike out "four thousand" in the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee, and insert "two thousand five hundred."

Mr. PUGH. I propose "three thousand." These companies are larger when they serve in the field than according to the peace establishment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection. I will accept that modification, if it be satisfactory. I move to strike out "four thousand," and insert "three thousand."

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish to discuss this question particularly, but I desire, in this connection, to make a very brief explanation. I find that I was represented in the western newspapers, through the telegraphic reports, as having, on a former occasion when this question was up, used this language:

"Mr. Brown said that if volunteers were sent to Utah, they would follow Brigham Young, and would not fight unless forced to."

Now, sir, Mr. Brown did not say any such thing, nor anything which even approximated to that; yet I can see how by an awkward telegraph sentence, awkwardly punctuated in the printing, I am made to say precisely what I did not say. What I did say was, that if volunteers were sent to Utah, war would follow, and that Brigham Young would not fight unless he was forced to; yet this telegraphic dispatch represents me as saying that if you sent volunteers to the Utah war they would follow Brigham Young, and that they would not fight unless they were forced to do so. See what havoc was made of my poor little speech.

That is not the worst of it. There is not a volunteer soldier, past or to come, who would not feel that he was grossly insulted by such a declaration here, that his country sends him out to fight these Mormons, and instead of doing it he follows their chief; and then when he follows the chief he is not going to fight unless you force him to it. I said the other day, that I would not vote for volunteer troops for this service for the reason I then assigned. I wanted then, and now, to impress upon the Senate that if you send volunteers there, you will have war. If you send volunteers from Missouri and Illinois, from which two States they are more likely to come than anywhere else, as I said then, and I tried to impress that idea on the Senate, (and I hope if anybody hereafter telegraphs anything I say, he will, at least, get somewhere in the neighborhood of the truth,) they will go to wreak vengeance on the Mormons, and they will bring on a war. If you send regular troops, and make a proper demonstration, I have never believed, and do not now believe that Brigham Young will fight; but I would take all the necessary steps to be prepared for battle, if you must have it. I do not seek it; I would avoid it by all fair and honorable means. There never has been an American musket fired against the bosom of an American citizen by order of the Government, or under the sanction of law. I shall deplore the hour when the first blood is shed in a fratricidal war. These Mormons are all wrong. That they must be required to obey the laws of the country, I am as ready to admit as anybody else; but I would send no volunteer force there, that would go to wreak vengeance for past wrongs, and thus precipitate you into a conflict whether you would or not.

Sir, if you had an actual existing war with a foreign Government, with the Indians, with the Mormons, or with anybody else, I would prefer volunteers to all other kinds of force. Why? Because when the war is on hand they will pitch in and fight it out more valorously, more daringly, than any other troops. They fight by the job; they fight quick, with a design to end the contest as soon as possible. There is where my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON], the other day was mistaken in his eulogy on volunteers. Volunteers have never been called into service to garrison posts. You do not want to place them in barracks to rub up muskets and to perform the mere duties of the camp. They would not volunteer for any such service; but when war breaks out, if it must break out, and you want to fight it to a conclusion, then take volunteers. If, however, you want peace, I think you had better stick to the regular troops. When the Mexican war actually commenced, you took volunteers and sent them there; and they did good service. When the Indian war was going on in Florida, you called for volunteers and sent them there, and they did good service. They do good service in any actual existing war; but my opinion is that they will always do mischief when there is no war, because they volunteer, as I said before, not to garrison posts, not to perform camp duty, but to fight, and if there is no fight on hand, they will be confoundedly apt to get up one.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Tennessee is willing to accept my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) At this stage of the proceedings, it is not competent for him to accept a modification of his amendment. It has already been modified and can be further modified only by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will accept it by the general consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I have not taken much part in this discussion. I said a few words when the bill was first brought up, under the expectation that a vote would be immediately taken—

Mr. PUGH. With the permission of my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, I wish to offer one or two amendments, which I hope will be accepted by the other Senator from Tennessee, and after we have perfected the substitute, then, if gentlemen wish to speak to the question at large, it would be better. If they speak to the question at large now, and we then go on to perfect the substitute, we shall debate it to the end of time. I will suggest to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] the same amendment which I suggested to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] He requires the President to employ these troops alone in the Territory of Utah. I do not think we have any power, by act of Congress, to limit his authority as Commander-in-Chief, and I propose to the Senator to strike out of the substitute the provision restricting these troops to service in Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again state to the Senator from Ohio that when a proposition is before the Senate, offered by any member, it is competent for the mover of it to accept any modification before it has been amended by the Senate; but after it has been amended by the Senate, it is no longer competent for the mover to accept a modification. The Senator from Ohio can offer his proposition by way of amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I move, then, as an amendment, to strike out of the substitute the words "the citizens on," the words "in the Territory of Utah, and to be employed in said Territory," and to insert "to the Pacific coast," so that the clause will read:

"That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States, and protecting the routes of emigration to the Pacific coast, be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for," &c.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PUGH. I move, after the word "infantry," in the first section, to insert:

"And one regiment of mounted rangers or cavalry."

The substitute now provides only for infantry; but I understand it is desirable to have one regiment of mounted rangers or cavalry to protect the frontier of Texas. I understand the Committee on Military Affairs, in the House of Representatives, have come to the conclusion that it is advisable to station a mounted regiment there—I may be in error as to that—and let the troops now there be sent on the expedition to Utah; and I think it would be a better disposition of the force.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it proposed to add a regiment of cavalry, so as to provide for four regiments altogether; or is it intended to have two of infantry and one of cavalry?

Mr. PUGH. It will make four regiments—three of infantry and one of cavalry.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] in place of the original bill.

The substitute, as amended, is as follows:

That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States and protecting the citizens on the routes of emigration in the Territory of Utah, and to be employed in said Territory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding in all three thousand officers and men, who may offer their services as infantry to serve for and during the pending difficulties with the Mormons in said Territory, and no longer; and that the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, or regiments; and that each company shall consist of the same number of officers and men as now prescribed by law for the infantry arm of the Army; and that the companies, battalions, and regiments, shall be each respectively authorized to elect their own officers, and when so elected shall be commissioned by the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers, when mustered into the service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and, until discharged therefrom, be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be organized in the same manner and shall receive the same pay and allowances as the infantry arm of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred upon persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be disbanded at the termination of the pending difficulties with the Mormons in the Territory of Utah, and in no case shall the force created by this act continue in service more than two years.

Mr. BELL. I understand that the original bill in its present shape, according to the amendments which have been made to it, provides for the raising of three regiments of regulars.

Mr. SIMMONS. Thirty companies.

Mr. BELL. I thought the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] had been agreed to, providing for three regiments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Virginia has not yet been offered for the action of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. It will make very little difference when I submit my remarks, as my only wish is to put myself right on the whole subject. In the unpremeditated remarks which I made on a former day, when I understood that the bill was to be passed through immediately, on the first or second day when it was pending in the Senate, I said that I thought twenty thousand regular troops were not too many to be authorized as the nominal military force of the United States. I think so still. The present organization of the Army seldom furnishes an effective strength of more than fifteen thousand rank and file, although nominally the number of troops is eighteen thousand, when all the companies and regiments are full. If we were to provide a regular military force of twenty thousand men, I should think it would not be too great a number for the extent of the territory and dominions of the United States. I have not the least fear or alarm of any danger to which our liberties would be subjected by such a force. I concur entirely in many of the sentiments expressed on that point by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I also concur in the sentiment that standing armies may be justly feared in a republic when enlarged beyond that extent which is necessary, and must always be necessary in every country for the protection of its principal fortifications and frontier defenses on its borders, where it is exposed to attacks from Powers that may become inimical. In this country it is necessary to have an army to guard the fortifications on our extensive Pacific and Atlantic coast, and our double line of frontiers in the interior, where we are liable to be assailed by hostile tribes of Indians.

I have no objection on that ground to some increase of the Army; but when I addressed the Senate on this subject before, I stated that, in the present circumstances of the country, I thought there was no necessity for an increase of the regular military force of the United States. When the bill was first presented, not having examined it thoroughly myself, I supposed that perhaps it would be proper to make the increase called for by the Secretary of War, and by the President; but after hearing the arguments on both sides of the Chamber, and particularly what was said by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I came to the conclusion there was no necessity for this increase now. Our military force, which in ordinary times, perhaps, ought not to be rated at more than twelve thousand effective men, rank and file, may now, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the times, be properly rated at fifteen thousand; and from this fact I inferred that not only was there an ample regular force authorized by law, but that there was an effective force, estimating it by the present strength of the regiments of the regular Army, to answer all the exigencies of the time in relation to what is called the Mormon war. So believing, I stated that in my view the proposed increase could properly be deferred until a subsequent period, when we could consider it with more deliberation, and when the finances of the country would be in a better condition to justify an expenditure for this purpose. I made up my mind on this ground to vote against this bill for an increase of the Army.

It has been urged that the increase is necessary to be made for the prosecution of the Mormon war, as it is called. I have heard nothing yet to satisfy me that the three regiments proposed to be raised by the Senator from Virginia can be available to answer the purposes of the prosecution of that war, if war there be, within the time when it will be necessary for the troops under Colonel Johnston to move upon the Mormons. I do not believe they can be raised and organized in due time for that purpose.

What, then, is the exigency, or the pressure of the circumstances, under which we are asked to vote this increase now? I have great respect for the views of the honorable Senator from Virginia; and I trust that whatever passages we may sometimes have, he will always understand me as entertaining the greatest respect for his views and opinions. He thinks there is an exigency at the present moment for raising three regiments; but can they be organized in time to answer the purposes of that exigency, even if it exists? The force now employed against the Mormons cannot wait for the organization of these three regiments. Then, again, look at the expense attending the recruiting of three regiments; the time that will be lost; the extra expense that will be incurred by moving them from various points in the Atlantic States and concentrating them on the frontier, so as to send them to the relief of Colonel Johnston, and then, probably, they will fail in effecting a union with him. Will the great expense that will be incurred be justified by the utility of raising these regiments, seeing that they are likely to fail to be an effective force, in addition to that now employed against the Mormons? Besides, they are only to be employed for two years, which I understand is the condition upon which my honorable friend (if he will allow me to call him so) from Virginia proposes that they shall belong to the regular Army.

Under these circumstances, would it not be better to pass no bill at all, either for volunteers or regular forces, than to adopt this measure at this time, when it will involve great expense, and when it will probably fail altogether to answer the present exigencies? And besides, the force is to be disbanded in two years. I have no idea that the Senator from Virginia means to take this step with a view to increase the Army permanently. His proposition is to add three regiments to the Army for two years. If any Senator thinks it is important to increase the Army permanently to this extent, it is of course parliamentary for him to take the first step by getting it now for two years, with a view on his part to make it permanent at the end of two years. I make no such insinuation in regard to the Senator from Virginia; but for myself, I hardly think I should object at that time to making this permanent addition to the Army. I understand that the recruiting service is more successful now than is apt to be the case in times of prosperity, when every branch of business is active and flourishing. If we had a regular Army with twenty thousand as the authorized maximum number, I do not think that in ordinary times of prosperity and peace, (or I will say prosperity, whether there were peace or not,) it would furnish us an effective force of more than fifteen thousand of rank and file. That is my judgment; from my observation and consideration of the subject. If the Senate should now adopt this proposition to add three regiments to the Army as a temporary measure, I do not know but that I should rather be disposed to make it permanent if the finances of the country justified it, particularly if there be a military necessity for such an accession of force.

The whole question now presented to us is whether we shall provide for raising volunteers or regulars. If the service is to be a temporary one; if it is the Mormon war that creates the necessity for an increased force, would it not be cheaper and better resort than to attempt the raising of three regiments of regulars? They can be more readily raised and organized; and in times like these particularly, you will soon have them swarming to your standard on the frontier, and in the interior too. You will have volunteers flocking to your standard from my own State of Tennessee, sometimes called, I believe, emphatically, the volunteer State; and I think she is entitled to that sobriquet. So it is with Kentucky, standing alongside of us. I think the most convenient and ready organization would be obtained on the western frontiers of Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas, and perhaps above all in California.

The objection is made, however, that the volunteer forces are not subject to regular discipline, and that they might create mischief in an invasion of the Mormons, or that they might not be sufficiently under control to enable us to avail ourselves of the disposition of the Mormons to submit to the regular authority of the Government, if there should be such a disposition on their part. It is said that the use of volunteers might lead to thwarting the Government in a sound and humane policy in reference to the Mormons. In answer to that, I say that if you send out volunteers, there will be nearly or quite as large a force of the regular Army, commanded by veteran and experienced officers; and it seems to me they would have it in their power to restrain any of those excesses to which volunteer forces, suddenly raised, without time for discipline or learning the habits of war and obedience to superior officers that regular forces have, might be inclined.

I do not want to talk about the militia of the country being a proper resort in any war with disciplined veteran forces. The history of the country furnishes the proper conclusion in regard to all questions of that sort. But in the outset of every war we know that we have to depend mainly on the militia. They must be our main dependence in the first instance. Even if we were engaged in a war with Great Britain, we could not suddenly recruit a force sufficient to encounter the legions whom we should have to meet. We must depend on the volunteer spirit, in the outset particularly; but when we come into competition in regular warfare, under distinguished military leaders, we know that nothing will be so efficient to encounter them as veteran disciplined forces on the other side. But still this is no disparagement to volunteers. We must depend upon volunteers. In the last war with Great Britain we know how it was. I need not go into an explanation of that.

My friend from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] if he will allow me to call him so, made some very hard hits at the volunteer system, and he thought volunteers should never be resorted to when we could get any other force for purposes of war, defensive or offensive. I understood him finally, however, to withdraw any declaration which he made as to the want of gallantry in the volunteers of any State.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to say a word in explanation?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator says I withdrew the imputations. I did not withdraw them. I simply disclaimed having made any.

Mr. BELL. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. IVERSON. I made no imputation on the courage of the volunteers of Tennessee. I have been charged, in a paper of this city, with having made an apology. I made no apology. I made a disclaimer.

Mr. BELL. I understood the honorable Senator to disclaim the design to make any such imputation; and with the estimate I have of his good sense and judgment, I could not, from anything that he said, draw the conclusion that he really felt any disposition to disparage the volunteers of Tennessee, or any other State. He spoke, however, of the rapid retreat of a volunteer regiment at the battle of Cerro Gordo. I thought that was the most disparaging remark which he used, and he made use of another expression which I shall not mention in the Senate, but will call to his attention privately.

As I understand the orders of General Scott, and the programme of the battle of Cerro Gordo, the force to which the Senator from Georgia alluded was sent to the position of which he spoke to hold in check a formidable line of defense of the Mexicans. It was the route which our Army would naturally have taken to turn the flank of the Mexican position on our left. The Mexicans had a considerable wall built up of stone, wood, and logs, with an immense battery, and a formidable force in the rear in order to defend it effectively. General Scott's policy was to send a sufficient force to keep in check the men who were stationed in the rear of that battery, and to prevent them from being added to the force which he expected to encounter in other positions under the command of Santa Anna. Every one understands that that battle was concluded in an effective and successful manner, by making a detour that was not expected by the enemy, and taking them by the flank. The Tennessee volunteers were sent forward for the purpose of holding in check the forces of Santa Anna behind the line of defense of which I have spoken, so as to show them the necessity of maintaining their position, and not changing it in any event that might occur. As gallant a man as ever lived led that regiment—General William B. Campbell of Tennessee. Nobody, who has ever heard of his character or who has ever known him, will doubt his courage. He was the man who led the charge against the black battery of Monterey in an open plain, when his men were armed only with muskets and bayonets, under a well-directed fire of a well-managed Mexican battery, for several hundred yards where there was not a tree or a shrub to protect them. His column marched on, though mowed down as it proceeded. He went on in company with General Anderson. Colonel Campbell was the leader, riding in front of them, and telling them: "Boys, this is the fate of war when your comrades fall by your side; march on, and show yourselves to be Tennesseans." They marched up under a discharge of grape and ball that was sweeping down their comrades and dear friends by their side.

That was the sort of men who commanded one of those regiments at the place alluded to by the Senator from Georgia. Colonel Haskell was the commander of the regiment who took the initiative in marching up in front of such a battery as I have described without a single cannon—not even a four-pounder—to storm the most formidable battery that Santa Anna had provided for the check of General Scott's advance. I do not know who gave that order, but according to my present recollection, when the attempt was made to make this advance at a distance of three or four hundred yards, our troops were subjected to the sweep of the direct and cross-fire of all the Mexican guns mounted in that long line of defense. It is a wonder that any of them escaped. Can that be said to be a manifestation of any unusual timidity? It was impossible for men to reach the wall they were to storm with muskets and bayonets alone, without, I believe, even a single fascine to protect them.

I have said this much in explanation and defense of those gallant gentlemen—as gallant as ever were created—the late Governor Campbell himself leading the regiment. Where the fault was for making such a charge I do not pretend to say, or make any controversy about.

As to the efficiency of volunteers, I do not care to go over the grounds which were stated by my colleague the other day when the subject was under consideration. The views presented by him do not require any addition from me. I remember the battle of New Orleans, though I was but a youth at the time. New Orleans would have been taken, and sacked and burned, or laid under contribution, but for the volunteers who were suddenly raised in Tennessee and Kentucky, and descended the river in a few weeks from the time the call was made. I have not had time to look into the history of the battle of New Orleans; but I believe there was not more than a regiment and a half or two regiments of regulars engaged on that occasion. They were undoubtedly very useful and essential in directing the artillery; but the main body of the force was rapidly assembled without any means of discipline except what they got descending the Mississippi river on the flat-boats. The efficiency of Tennessee volunteers was displayed on that occasion. I believe that, in the celebrated battle of the 23d of December, 1814, there was not a single company of regulars; and perhaps the British received on that occasion their most important check.

I shall not, however, go into that subject now. I only mean to say, and I wish to say it distinctly, that I think we ought to defer any increase of the Army at this time, on account of the peculiar circumstances in which the country is placed, and the embarrassed condition of its finances. It may be proper enough to authorize the President to accept the services of a volunteer regiment or two, or even three regiments, if, contrary to our expectations, there should arise an exigency demanding it, so that the country may not be without an adequate defense; but beyond this I cannot consent to go at this time. If the Mormon war, as it is called, should create any real difficulty, that might be proper. I wish, however, at the same time, to have it distinctly understood that, under other circumstances, if the finances of the country and the condition of our people were different, I would not object to a permanent increase of the Army to the extent proposed by the honorable Senator from Virginia. Having had at one time some reason to inquire into the military necessities of the Government, my opinion is that twenty thousand regular troops would not exceed what we ought to have, because we do not know what year, what half year, what month, we may not be involved in a foreign war that might call for some more effective force than we have.

Now I desire to say a word or two with regard to the Mormon difficulties. I notice that some of my friends with whom I have had communication, have supposed that I entertained very different ideas on this subject from those which I really possess. I think the policy of this Government in relation to the Mormons has been wholly erroneous and mistaken—the most unfortunate and impolitic that could have been adopted. It is lamentable that it should have been pursued. I do not wish to boast of any sagacity of my own, for I desire above all things not to be considered egotistical; but in 1850, when the compromise measures were proposed and adopted, it became us to consider what should be done in regard to Utah, not only for the purpose of answering the then existing exigency, but as to what might be the consequences in the future. I said then, as I say now, that that people ought not to have a separate organized Government of their own under our authority. My propositions, made in 1850 on that subject, are on record. I stated then that I regarded these people as fanatics, standing in pretty much the same character in which I regard the Abolitionists of the North. I do not see a great deal of difference in principle between them, and I would no more vote to confer on them the powers of separate government than I would vote to organize an assembly of Abolitionists as a Territory, finally to become a State of the Union. My opinion was, that being led away by a religious imposture which was extremely fanatical, and one of the most preposterous that had arisen in modern times, if we would let them alone, divisions would arise amongst them; they would be dispersed in different detachments, and offer no formidable resistance to this Government. I said then, however, that if you placed them in a Territory and gave them a separate organized Government, the chances were that we should either have to exterminate them or drive them out of the limits of the Union. Upon that ground I voted against that one of the compromise measures of 1850, and, I believe, the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] voted against it, too, on what grounds I do not know, but I suppose on the same ground which actuated me. Our course then was thought very strange, but I think subsequent events have shown its correctness.

Again: I think it was a capital error ever to have appointed Brigham Young Governor of the Territory, though it is probable I voted for his confirmation. It was contrary to my original ideas and views in regard to the proper treatment of that people, to give them a separate government, and then appoint their own leaders officers of the Territory, particularly the Governor. This was well calculated to inspire them with the ambition of building up a great community there. Even persons who were not fanatics would be inspired, under such circumstances, with such a desire to obtain power. It was a dangerous policy, which ought not to have been adopted.

Next, let me inquire what has the legislation of this country inculcated for the past four years? I have seen it unequivocally and boldly announced, even in the Charleston Mercury, that, under the principles recognized by the Congress of the United States, the Mormons had as much right to form a constitution, and demand admission into the Union, as the people of any other Territory. What Congress has done has not been hidden under a bushel. These are not smothered lights. They are circulated among the Mormons. Some of them are exceedingly learned and able men. They are perfectly aware of the principles which have been inculcated in this country, if they have not been actually established, which give them the power to control their own domestic institutions; and they have been led to understand that, whatever prejudice might exist against them, Congress had no right to undertake to prescribe their domestic institutions or their religion. Why, sir, the attempt of the American party to proscribe freedom of opinion in matters of religion, as it was said they did, was proclaimed throughout the country to be inconsistent and incompatible with the maintenance of free government. Do you suppose these sentiments and doctrines have not gone forth? I do not speak this with any reference to party. I do not know that the American party, who were charged with having sustained such a sentiment, ever did entertain such a principle. At any rate, if they did once entertain it, they have abandoned it under the more enlightened and more deliberate counsels of those who have succeeded the persons who organized that party originally. I do not feel warranted in stating anything on this point; but I can easily see how the Mormons might have been misled. Their leaders are not ignorant, but the masses are profoundly so, though honest and fanatical.

Under these teachings, what could we expect? What have they been taught to demand of us by our avowed principles of legislation? Gentlemen may suppose that what I am now saying is an attack upon the Administration. Not at all. When we trace back the original error, it was first the adoption of the territorial bill for Utah in 1850, and next the appointment of Brigham Young; and that was done by the head of the party to which I belonged, and an Administration which had a great degree of my confidence. I will say here, that I have not unlimited confidence in any Administration. I did not, however perceive in that policy an error so great as to induce me to take a stand against an Administration to which in the main I adhered. I do not mean to impute any willful error of course to the present Administration in the views they have recently taken on this subject, but I think the idea of a Mormon war is monstrous. We may have an internal war, a domestic war, but it will come, I trust, only after every means have been exhausted to prevent it. To make a war upon the Mormons, and denominate it a Mormon war, I say, is horrible to my feelings.

It is said, however, that in order to enforce the execution of the laws, it is necessary to send a large and expensive army to Utah. I have no desire to speak of the circumstance under which that army was dispatched. I said before, when I expressed some sentiments on this subject, that I thought the time at which that advance was directed, and those gallant men were ordered to go to Utah, was entirely too late; and that the prospect was extremely hazardous from the experience we have of the difficulty of the passages in the mountains through which they would have to make their way. It ought not to have been considered a practicable project. They ought to have waited until another season, and employed the meantime in negotiations to see whether these people could not be brought to their senses, whether we could not convince them that it would be better for them not to engage in a resistance to the power of this Government. I think that movement was a very erroneous one, costing millions of money to the Government; and Colonel Johnston and his forces are this day practically no nearer to Salt Lake than they would be if they were stationed in the city of New York.

But I pass over all the errors that may have been committed, supposing them to have been committed under such circumstances as would naturally impel any Secretary of War, or any Administration to commit them. Now, is it likely that there will be any serious war in Utah? I have received information on this subject from various gentlemen with whom I have spoken, and who seem to have some knowledge of that community; I have conversed with gentlemen from California and others, who know something of Utah and its people; and I am told that there is no disposition among them to come into hostile collision with the forces of the United States. I have been induced to favor a policy of peace. I am inclined to think that it would have been sufficient to send Governor Cumming alone with a small escort, without making any public declarations or proclamations of a hostile disposition. I have great confidence in Governor Cumming; and from what I have heard of Colonel Johnston, I should suppose he would be a proper associate in such an expedition. I think there need not have been $100,000 expended for this purpose. The leaders of the Mormons have enough intelligence to know that they cannot resist the power of the United States. I am told they would be ready to go to any island which might be assigned them in the Pacific ocean, rather than do that. But what does history teach us as to the consequences of demanding absolute submission from men possessed of fanatical feelings and determination? If they were like some of our Puritan ancestors, what should we expect to be the consequence? Perhaps I may speak of my own ancestors, as they were of that order, and not of the Cavaliers in the civil wars in England. They would die first, without much fanaticism either. They would die for their opinion, a great deal less preposterous and absurd than these; and I have observed that, in these enlightened days, the more absurd and more preposterous are the new doctrines started up, like those of the Mormons, the more likely they are to have multitudes of followers. Nobody can comprehend them; and for that reason people embrace them, particularly if they contain things that strike their fancy and imagination. I think anybody, who has noticed the history of the progress of religious impostures and religious fanaticisms, will have seen that that is very apt to be the case. The greater the absurdity the more likely they are to succeed, if they involve certain principles and ideas which strike the imagination.

This is an attempt to force such a people to absolute submission, to make them take judges, governors, and other officers from us, to compel them to have their laws administered in the spirit of our institutions. I do not think the masses there can be made to do that. I hope there will be no actual collision.

I know it is said that the Mormons have instigated the Indians on their frontiers to mischief upon emigrants and other American citizens passing through that country. I doubt that very much. I do not give full confidence to the reports we receive on that subject; but even if that were true, I have indulged the hope that all could be calmed and mitigated by negotiation.

Sir, I do not wish to continue this discussion. On the whole, I merely wish to say that my mind inclines me to vote in favor of allowing the President to call out volunteers if he thinks them necessary, so that the Government may not be left without the proper support which ought to be given to the force now marching on Utah. If the question cannot be peaceably settled, I think it better to raise a volunteer force because they can be more speedily and promptly organized than the regular regiments proposed to be formed. I do not believe there will be any demand for them. I do not think there will be any necessity for calling out volunteers, but I am willing to give authority to allow them to be raised.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Mr. President, it has not been my habit to consume the time of the Senate; but I desire, on this occasion, to say a few words in explanation of the vote I shall give. I have listened to the speech which has just been delivered by the Senator from Tennessee, and I believe it represents quite fairly the opposition which has hitherto been made to the passage of this bill. Some gentlemen base their opposition on the conviction that there will be no Mormon war. He goes still further, and is quite severe in his comments on the Administration. He has made remarks which, to me, clearly imply that he is of opinion that they have determined to force a war.

Mr. BELL. I did not say that. Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Senator will review his remarks to-morrow, I think he will find that that is the natural conclusion from what he has said.

Mr. BELL. I tried to guard against that. I said that if an error had been committed by this Administration, the circumstances were such that any other Administration might have committed it, and that I did not impute it to any purpose on their part to have a war. I thought it could be avoided by the adoption of pacific measures, and that is the hope I expressed. I did not say they were determined to wage a war whether it was necessary or not. I disclaim that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The sincerity of the Senator from Tennessee, which I believe I may say is time-honored, will never be questioned by me; and I have no doubt, from what he now says, that it was not his intention to make any imputation of that character. He said, however, that he did not believe there would be any Mormon war, and, as a consequence, he does not believe that these troops will be really necessary. There are considerations beyond these, which it seems to me ought to address themselves to the consideration of the Senate on this occasion; and some of them I feel very sensibly myself. The impression of the Senator from Tennessee evidently is, that there will be no war or no serious difficulty with the Mormons.

Mr. BELL. I said I hoped there would be none.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the Senator now, if he believes there will be no contest with them?

Mr. BELL. I do not think there will be any such contest as will make it necessary to call out volunteers or additional troops; but, nevertheless, I would provide them, for fear it might be so.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I suggest to the Senator that he should admit at once that the Administration sincerely believe the contrary.

Mr. BELL. I should not hesitate to admit that. I do not feel myself called upon to say that I do not think they are sincere. I think they are.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The declarations of the Administration, which are before us in the message of the President and in the reports of the proper Departments, can leave no doubt on our minds that it is their earnest conviction that we shall have serious difficulties in Utah; and, if I may use the term as applicable within the limits of the United States, a war there. If they believe so, the Senator from Tennessee will of course admit, that in the discharge of the functions which have been confided to them, it is their duty to use all the powers they may have at their command to achieve the object they have in view in Utah; and we have their declaration that the force they can now use for that purpose, the existing Army of the United States, is very limited.

I am free to say that, in my opinion, the force which this Government has already transmitted, and is about to transmit, to Utah, will prove itself sufficient to give us peace in that Territory; but I do not believe that peace will be secured without a battle and bloodshed. I was not here when the Committee on Military Affairs reported this bill, and I have not taken part in the debates upon it; but I must confess that my course in regard to it is not influenced by the Mormon war so much as by a regard for the consequences to ourselves at home. I have not been so much affected by the apprehension of a Mormon war as by the fact that, in order to send troops to Utah, the Government has been compelled to withdraw them from our fortifications and frontier defenses. If the Administration do not take the Army of the United States to those points where the greatest danger exists, of course they do not discharge their duty, which they are sworn to discharge, and which, we must believe, they are willing and anxious to discharge.

Mr. BELL. They have an effective force of fifteen thousand men now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not dispute that; but I say that the War Department has withdrawn the forces from the Indian frontier west of the Mississippi. Troops have been withdrawn from stations west of Missouri, in consequence of the belief of the Administration that the danger in Utah is much greater than to be apprehended from the Indians immediately west of Arkansas. In the country west of my State five forts have been abandoned. I believe there are not ten soldiers left upon that whole frontier.

Mr. BELL. I ask my friend if he fears anything there?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. BELL. From the Choctaws and Cherokees?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I apprehend that consequences may result there which will be of very serious import, and which may be very expensive to this Government. I believe that the result of the withdrawal of the troops there may be to inflict on that region not only present evils, but evils which will last for many years to come. I believe this Government has hitherto guarded against them; but those evils may now be the consequence of the withdrawal of the troops. Senators undoubtedly are familiar with the history of the Creeks, the Seminoles, the Cherokees, and the Choctaws. They are savages, barbarians. Remove the troops from amongst them, and you give them an opportunity to go to war with each other; you will have no power to compel them to keep the peace, or to apprehend those who violate the peace. Let this be known, and discord will be the result. Habits of disobedience are easily acquired. This Government has felt the power of these Indians. When they formerly occupied the States of Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, they were engaged in long-continued wars, which cost the Government a great deal of money. No Senator is better aware than the honorable Senator from Tennessee, of the bravery, the courage, the desperation manifested by these Indians throughout those wars. These powerful tribes have been transplanted to the country west of Arkansas. You have peace in the old States which they formerly occupied, and you have cast these tribes on the frontiers of Texas and Arkansas. They have been for twenty-five years past kept in peace and obedience and good order by the presence of troops among them, and the maintenance of military posts. The Indian governments themselves have been sustained in some measure by your troops; schools have been established amongst them; and they have become in some measure civilized. They have been partially trained to habits of obedience; but yet it is not to be denied, and the executive department of this Government know, if Senators here do not, that in each of these Indian nations there are bad men, and not a few of them. The records of our courts show the difficulty which has been experienced in apprehending and subjecting to punishment men who are still prowling about amongst these Indians, breeding difficulties and engendering private feuds, leading to bloodshed and to violations of the laws of the United States in many respects.

At present there is no great difficulty in enforcing our intercourse laws with these Indians. The marshal is now able with a few men to go through these nations and apprehend offenders; but even at the present time, occasionally, prisoners who are apprehended are rescued by force, and battles take place among the Indians in which men are injured and the law set at defiance. Heretofore, however, in consequence of the system of this Government in keeping up forts, and having an armed force close by, the damage has never been great, the wrong has never been extensive, but it has been early righted, and penalty has been early imposed.

All these Indians, having some twenty-five thousand warriors, are located west of my State; and immediately beyond them are the genuine wild savage tribes, who live by incursions on the more peaceful Indians, and by every species of predatory warfare, and particularly by robberies committed upon white men wherever they may find them, and especially emigrants crossing the continent. They have been partly restrained and kept back heretofore by our troops; but the Government has been compelled to withdraw them, and in that region, occupying many thousands of miles, I believe the Government has now only a hundred men, and they are stationed at Fort Belknap, in Texas. We established an Indian agency some two or three years ago in that region, and sent an agent there; but he cannot live among them; he cannot stay there with any safety; he must lose his life if he remains there, unless the troops of the United States are near by.

That being the state of the case, what is to be the consequence of the withdrawal of these troops? Suppose a war should once be commenced with these Indians, what is to be the cost of it? It will undoubtedly be very great—much greater than the expense of affording proper protection to your citizens. We have a right to claim that this Government shall give us on that frontier the security which they have disturbed by putting those Indians there. Certainly gentlemen will not deny that if this Government is compelled by its convictions of duty to take away the troops located there and send them to Utah, it ought to put others in their place, if they can be obtained by this bill. I do not believe there is any doubt that the troops which may be raised under this bill will be placed on that frontier.

I have referred to the frontier of the State of Arkansas because I am more familiar with that; but I know that our frontier forts and defenses generally are abandoned. My object in rising, was to present to the Senate the necessity for an increase of the military force, in order to furnish men to replace those who have been taken away from the defenses of our frontiers. I will say to Senators now, that petitions and remonstrances are constantly transmitted to us here and to the Department against the removal of the military force on that frontier.

Mr. BELL. I will ask my friend whether, if there was any appearance of difficulty with the Creeks, Cherokees, or Choctaws, it is possible anything could take place before the Government would have time to call out the militia?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. At present, the intercourse laws are respected, and they are but seldom violated, comparatively speaking; but whilst I am now addressing the Senate, I have no doubt that men are carrying whisky into the Indian territory contrary to the laws of the United States, and to the disturbance and destruction of the peace of those Indians and the security of the whites. They are carrying whisky and other forbidden articles into the Indian nation, and there is no efficient means to arrest them. The officers of the courts can do nothing unless they are supported, and you have taken away the troops on which they have heretofore relied for support.

One of the main objects that has dictated the establishment of forts in the Indian country, has been to preserve peace within their own nations; to enable the arm of the law to be rigidly and effectively enforced. Their governments are but weak. They are not very well organized and they need support; the Choctaws I believe are the best; and I think it is unjust to them to leave no troops there.

After we have been attempting to establish the habit of obedience on their part to the laws of the United States, by a long course of care and guardianship, which has been effected mainly through the Army of the United States, I do not think it is wise or just for us now to throw away at once what it has taken twenty-five or thirty years to establish. I am satisfied that we ought to have troops on the frontier, and I am free to say further that if the Senate conclude to give us volunteers in place of regulars, it will be an error. The volunteers will not answer our purpose. If you place volunteers on that frontier now, all they will have to do will be to occupy the forts, and then their duty becomes nothing more than the routine duty of an ordinary soldier. They will not stand it. They are an irregular class of men at best. They are inclined under such circumstances to a good deal of dissipation and wildness. They are not trained; and if you transmit even a detachment of them to aid the officers of the law, they will almost invariably commit some violence which will lead to consequences far from good, and sometimes to the saddest and most unfortunate consequences. I do not believe volunteers to be the proper force to accomplish an object of this kind. This is not the kind of service which I would have them do.

It is said that there will be a difficulty in raising these troops in time to do any good in Utah. That may be a very good reason for voting against the bill, on the part of those gentlemen who believe there can be no other object in view than the transmission to Utah of the troops which may now be raised by act of Congress; and if I thought there was no other object, I should not care if the entire bill failed. But, sir, in my judgment the objects are other and widely different. I know that our frontiers are not protected. I know that the peace and good order which have heretofore existed there are liable to be broken up, and I know that when once broken up, it will be most difficult to reestablish them.

I do not think the three additional regiments now asked for ought to be denied. I have no idea that there is any real, well-founded apprehension to be entertained of standing armies in the United States, particularly when they are limited to so small a number as our present Army, even with the addition of the little increase we now propose to make, if it were to become permanent. I hardly think that gentlemen here can possibly have any serious apprehension on such a ground. I am satisfied that the Administration is not wrong in recommending even a permanent increase of the Army by the addition of four or five regiments. I sincerely believe they are necessary. Certainly we ought not to abandon all the good we have done among the Indians. We ought not to ignore the fact that the Government, in the discharge of its duty, endangers the peace by taking away the troops from our frontiers. I say to the Senate now, that so far as the frontier of Arkansas is concerned, I know the troops have been withdrawn. Only a few days ago I saw in the newspapers, under such circumstances that I could not doubt its correctness, a statement of an incursion made by Indians upon the territory of Texas, when five men were killed, and the settlements were driven into the forts. The capital was communicated with at once, and the Legislature of Texas appropriated as much as $75,000 to raise volunteers to repel those incursions. Texas will not sit still and see her borders thus ravaged, and make no effort to protect them. Texas will appropriate the money needful; and the same thing will take place in Arkansas, if it shall become necessary to protect our frontier. Who is to pay them? The Government of the United States must refund to Texas the amount she thus expends, because it is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect her, and place ample means there for that purpose. Is it better for the Government to undertake the expense in which it may thus be involved, or to station the requisite number of men to insure protection to the frontier? I know now, as I have said, of only about a hundred men stationed on that whole frontier, and they are at a single fort. That is not the only frontier that has been deserted. Troops are withdrawn in every direction. I believe the frontiers of California, and Oregon and Washington Territories, are in as bad a condition, or indeed in a worse condition, than the borders of the States immediately west of the Mississippi, and in a worse condition even than Texas.

Upon these grounds I shall support this bill; and I think the opposition to it can scarcely be considered proper.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. President, the debate on this subject is about to close, I presume, and all, or very nearly all, the arguments, pro and con., must have been adduced. I have listened to the debate, knowing very little about military matters, with a sincere wish, from motives of economy, to be convinced that there is no necessity for placing at the disposal of the Executive an increase of our land forces. Thus far that wish has not been gratified; and there is yet one view of the subject

I have expected would be presented, to which no allusion, or but a slight one, has been made.

The discussion thus far, relative to the necessity and object of the Army increase asked for, has been limited to a domestic view of the matter; it has been limited to our domestic relations, our relations to each other, and to the Indians within our borders. All, or nearly all, essential to this view, has been said, and in my estimation well said, by those favoring the measure; and if I were disposed to look not beyond the reasons within ourselves, I should vote for the increase in some shape. Our difficulty with Utah is an existing fact; it is one before us—a difficulty which those who have charge of the executive department of our Government deem one of such serious character as to require more troops than have yet gone to that Territory to bring it to an honorable adjustment.

There is another difficulty which, if not present, is as much a fact, in my estimation, prospectively, as the existing one in Utah. That difficulty is one to occur next summer with our western Indians. It is known that Mormon emissaries, red and white, have been among those Indians. They have, within three or four weeks, been as far east as the Dacotah territory. They have been seeking to "smoke" that powerful tribe, the Sioux, into an alliance with them, and induce them to lift the tomahawk against us next spring. This is the case throughout our western, and especially our northwestern tribes. Efforts are making to induce them, if not to combined, to simultaneous hostilities against our people. We cannot, it is manifest from the Indian character, know what the success of these efforts will be, until the moment for action arrives. If they determine to strike, the first intimation we will have of their determination will be the blow.

But, sir, as I have already said, there is another aspect of this subject—one more comprehensive, one not looking simply to the enforcement of some domestic law, however important that may be; not looking simply to the prevention or suppression of some local riot, to the punishment of some local rebellion, or the protection of some frontier settlement; yet a view intimately connected with the honor and prosperity of our country, and indeed with the interests of our people. I have no respect for the "manifest destiny" doctrine, which has been but a pretense for armed forays from our country into the territories of other nations, with whom we are at peace. But if there is any one tradition of our people more cherished than another, it is that we are to become Americans in the most enlarged sense of the term; that this entire continent is to be, if not under one Government, and that Government our own, yet controlled in a measure by our enterprise and our institutions; that it is to be united to us by a community of interest and feeling, and a common opposition to European interference with our affairs. If there is any one policy of our Government more firmly fixed than another, relative to other nations, it is that while we will not create causes of quarrel with neighboring nations, neither will we permit difficulties within themselves, or between them and European Powers, to result in the transfer of their territory to any Government inimical to ours, or to the interest of our people.

This policy is not a mere selfish desire to enlarge our boundaries, and by adding new fields of enterprise to add to our individual and national wealth. It is, in my estimation, a wise policy of self-preservation. We cannot forget, and we ought not to forget, that we are in a position of political antagonism to most of the world. It is true, there are other nations on this hemisphere who are seeking to imitate the example of our institutions; but the often recurring struggles within themselves, between freedom on the one part, and centralization or arbitrary power upon the other, results as frequently in the triumph of the latter as of the former; and wherever that power exists, and under whatever shape it exists, our progress under our institutions is watched by it with a jealous eye.

Should we not be equally watchful and equally jealous of its approach to us? Events are at this moment transpiring, and others rapidly approaching, having a direct bearing on this policy. Since our war with Mexico, during which Santa Anna was our most active and inveterate foe, that country has been gradually approximating anarchy.

The last step in its downward progress is about to be taken. It must either very soon crumble to pieces, and a considerable portion of it, like over-ripe fruit, fall into our hands, if we are prepared to avail ourselves of the opportunity to receive it, or its government must undergo a radical change, and, under new auspices, become a more powerful and a more permanent one, although that change may make it anything but desirable to us as a neighbor. It has recently banished one President, and has now at least two, with divided authority. Pronunciamientos are put forth on all sides, each one adverse to all others; each backed by a body of armed men. Santa Anna is in the distance, ready to combine and direct these armed movements for the overthrow of the power of any other man, with the purpose of reestablishing his own.

And Spain evinces no unwillingness to invade that country. For what purpose? The declared object is to collect a debt, or receive satisfaction for some affront. Neither of those objects can be attained, as any person acquainted with the present and past condition of Mexico knows, while such a condition continues. The invasion by Spain, therefore, must contemplate possession of the country, either by placing Santa Anna in power, and ruling Mexico through him, or by creating a monarchy and putting one of its own royal family on the throne.

Under these circumstances, may not the future of Mexico attract our most earnest attention? If Santa Anna is again to become its ruler, with or without the aid of Spain, he can overcome the northern States of that Republic, and force them into submission to a central government, from which they are at this moment evincing a disposition to separate, and form an independent North Mexican Republic. His power would then be brought in direct proximity to our territory. Is this a desirable result? If he is to be established again at the head of the Mexican nation, and possesses any active power for aggression, we cannot expect a long continued peace with him; and I do not know that we should desire it. He deems us his natural enemy. He has many disasters, from San Jacinto to his hasty and narrow escape from General Lane, to avenge against us. Even if he has no powers for active aggression, if placed in position by Spain, he will have power to maintain himself in a position toward us of jealousy, antagonism, and non-intercourse. And if a monarchy is to be established, we know too well the jealousy upon the part of such Governments toward our own; and we know too well their mutual sympathy and mutual aid against a free people, or a people aspiring to freedom, to expect any long peace with one in our immediate neighborhood, or to expect any future contest between us and monarchical Mexico will be long confined to us and that country. We would soon find ourselves engaged with more or less of monarchical Europe, and Mexico be but the avenue through which its armies would reach us.

I have said that the northern States of the Mexican Republic are evincing a disposition to create an independent North Mexican Republic. Averse as they manifest themselves to being brought under the control of Central Mexico, and desirous of establishing an independent Republic, interposed between us and that center, will it be sound policy on our part to permit them to be coerced into submission to that central Power? If independent of Central Mexico, they will become dependent upon us, and almost entirely dependent upon us for the men and munitions to maintain themselves in a condition of independence from that Power.

Let us look beyond Mexico to another country, which prospective events are very likely to connect with it. It is said that Cuba, as we know from its geographical position, and from its ownership, must be the case, is about to be the point from which armed expeditions will start for the invasion of Mexican territory contiguous to ours, the freedom of which is essential to our freedom. If this be the case, it may well become a question of grave debate for us whether some expedition other than a filibustering one shall not visit that island from our shores. I am opposed to individual filibustering. I desire its prevention, its suppression, its punishment; and would, if necessary, give the Executive greater powers than he now possesses for this purpose; but if the Government, when a good reason for it exists, and an occasion offers, will undertake some filibustering on national account, I will cheerfully vote the call for volunteers and the necessary supplies for the enterprise. The purchase or annexation of any portion of Mexico I should not deem desirable, with a condition that every class of its multi-colored population should become our fellow-citizens. We can cheerfully welcome its intelligent white population, but not its colored masses of ignorance and depravity. Yet it may be desirable to prevent these masses from being used by some other Power as an instrument against us, and to our injury. If, to prevent such use, we find it necessary to take possession of any portion of the Mexican territory, we should segregate its Indian and negro population, as we have our Indians.

How other than by an increase of our regular Army are the difficulties from passing and prospective events, to which I have alluded, to be met and overcome? If to be met and overcome only by bodies of armed men, we have them not now in an organized form for that, and scarcely for any other purpose. Our Government cannot now, nor within six months, nor within a year, remove from positions where danger or necessity has placed them, to concentrate on our southwestern frontier a solitary brigade of our Army, however necessary such a movement might become. Then let us increase the skeleton of that Army—I am not particular as to the form of increase—let us increase the skeleton, leaving to the martial spirit of our countrymen to fill it up on call.

I would favor no such increase as could make that Army, in the ordinary signification of the word, a standing army. We do not desire it. An increase to any such extent I should oppose and regret. But we can, at least, so increase the skeleton as to make it a nucleus around which our volunteers, if the necessity for calling them into the field exists, can rally. If the increase, to the fullest extent asked by any of the propositions before us, was granted, the Army would still not be large enough for active field operations. We should still be dependent on volunteers whenever such operations became necessary.

The events I have mentioned are palpable. No one can be ignorant of them.

We may be told that no difficulty to us can arise from these events. Who of any sagacity would be willing to stake his reputation on any statement of that kind? That difficulty to us may not arise from them, is quite true; but that no difficulty can arise, no man dare say. When the events are traced, not merely to their possible, but their very probable result, the manner in which the difficulty can occur is easily seen. Even if no difficulty, an opportunity may be presented by these events, for great benefit to us, if we are prepared to avail ourselves of it. Shall we, then, take our risk, run our chance of the approach and advent of the difficulty or the opportunity, finding us unprepared? Chance is but a poor general, and a worse statesman. Incidents may be left to chance; results never! We may be told, it will be time enough to meet the difficulty, or avail ourselves of the opportunity, when it occurs. When the atmosphere is calm and the sky clear, not to prepare for a storm is only to be careless; but when the clouds and the lightning are seen, a want of preparation becomes folly. Like an individual, the nation which will not prepare for a storm when its approach is seen, merely because of a listless hope that it will pass by, deserves, and too often suffers, disasters. We should keep the fact in view, that if the difficulties will not necessarily, they very probably may, occur from these events. We should be prepared, as the Senator from Tennessee well said, to meet foreign war, not knowing what year, what month, nor scarce what week, it may be visited upon us.

I shall favor the increase of the regular Army in some form. If the proposition was not for a temporary, but for a permanent increase, I can see no objection to that, to the extent to which it is proposed to make the increase. If, at the expiration of the period of service for which this temporary increase is asked, it is proposed to make it permanent, I shall have no hesitation in assenting to it. We have these difficulties presented to us—Utah, the Indians, and the probable difficulties—or, at all events, if not difficulties, a probable opportunity to benefit ourselves—on our southwestern frontier; and, in my estimation, it will be extremely unwise not to prepare for either one of those contingencies.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I was entitled to the floor this morning on the subject before the Senate. I do not know but that it would be respectful and proper, as it is now four o'clock, to move an adjournment until to-morrow. If I thought the Senate desired it, I would do so.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope not. I think the general disposition of the Senate is to take the vote on this bill before we adjourn. I think a month has been long enough for its consideration. I believe we all understand it. Those of us who wanted to speak have had an opportunity of making five or six speeches apiece, and I think we are ready to vote. I do not believe all the talking we can do will change any gentleman's opinion. I think we ought to sit out the bill. I do not know any other way of stopping the interminable debate, than sitting it out; and I am prepared to do it until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOUSTON. Inasmuch as I have paired off with a gentleman who is indisposed and wished to leave the Senate, it will make no difference to me whether you go on with the bill now or not. I do not intend to speak long, and I am content to proceed now.

Mr. President, I believe the subject has assumed rather a new phase, and that this is now understood to be a proposition to increase the regular Army permanently, by this addition to the present peace establishment of the standing Army. If I apprehend the views of some gentlemen, I think I am right in saying so. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] challenges any gentleman to say that certain contingencies are not probably to result to Mexico in her present condition; and he says that, we being her immediate neighbor, it is necessary for us to be prepared for those contingencies. I will not undertake to refute his prediction on that subject, but I will add another to it—that if difficulties do arise, they will never be adjusted by the regular Army of the United States, but will be, as they have always been done, by volunteers.

I am not disposed to controvert anything he has said in relation to that point, but I deny the principle upon which he proceeds. As for the signification of those indications in the northern portion of Mexico, I think I understand them perhaps as well as most persons, that being rather in the neighborhood of my home. The fact is this: patronage and spoils in Mexico are divided differently from what they are in the United States; and when a man with some influence, either military or civic, in the northern States of Mexico, or indeed in any of the States, thinks that it is necessary to replenish his coffers, he issues his pronunciamiento, makes a fuss, robs for a while, and threatens the Federal Government. They want peace, because they know their imbecility and powerless condition; and the consequence is, that after some filibustering of this character, a proposition is made to this leader or chieftain, and it results in a purchase of him by the Federal Government, and then the whole revolution is at an end. It is for the purpose of procuring a bid, and levying black-mail on the Federal Government, that these revolutions take place. They have no ulterior design as to the establishment of a permanent confederacy in the northern States of Mexico; but the purpose is what I have stated. I apprehend no danger resulting from our vicinity to Mexico, that would require the increase of our regular Army.

I apprehend, as I have already stated upon the subject, no danger from the military influence or martial character of a regular army. It is the indoctrination of this Union with false sentiments that I fear; and the political influences brought to bear on the legislation and institutions of the country I wish to guard against, because, in proportion as the Army is increased and persons of influence, of family, or of wealth, obtain situations in it, they exercise indirectly or directly an influence on the legislation of the country not only in this body but in the other branch of Congress. That is what I am warning against, not that I would not foster a military spirit to a certain extent, but we are a nation of civilians, we are an agricultural, we are a farming, we are an independent people; we know the value of liberty, and you cannot find a man in possession of an estate but what knows how to defend his liberty and is willing to do it as a volunteer. But of what material will you compose your regular army? Of "cheap material." I am not in favor of that cheap material. Is it that you wish to send them out to Utah to get destroyed? Do you think it is a speculation on the part of the nation to get that material because it is cheap? I am for economizing the public Treasury of this nation, but I wish to do it on some rational principles. I wish to do it by the employment of volunteers.

We are told that there is a costliness about volunteers; that they are more expensive than regular soldiers. That may be true; but I doubt it. At all events, volunteers are generally paid after they render their service; regular troops are paid in advance. Volunteers furnish their own horses, if they are cavalry or dragoons, and they are paid for after they have performed the deed. But, in advance of the organization of the regular corps, the United States purchase and pay for the cavalry and dragoon horses that they use. There is the difference. You can make any calculation, show anything you please from the War Department, if there is a desire on the part of the Government to increase the regular Army; but they do not stand investigation when you come to test them. Would three thousand volunteers, employed for one or two years, cost more than the same number of men added to the regular Army for five, ten, or any number of years? It is said that each regiment costs about a million a year. Suppose volunteers should cost two millions a year, and you keep them but two years in the field: the expense would be four millions. If you were to keep the same number of regular troops four years in the field, besides fastening them on the country as a perpetual expense, you would exhaust the same amount of the public Treasury.

I do not believe, notwithstanding all the calculations that have been made, that volunteer troops are more expensive than regulars. I could show this by the celerity of volunteers. If there be an emergency, such as is stated by gentlemen, how is it to be met? Is it not by present action? Is it not to be promptly done? Are we to protract the war from year to year? Are we to take more than a year to fill up these three regiments, and are all operations to remain suspended until we raise this additional force? If it is necessary, if this is the purpose, you cannot move those already advancing on Utah. They must be supplied there; each ration will cost at least a dollar, and the expense of each man there, instead of being $1,000 or $1,500, according to the estimate made, will amount to $2,000, at the rate at which provisions will have to be supplied there. I cannot, for the life of me, see what advantage is to result to the Government, on the score of economy, by taking regulars instead of volunteers.

The troops that will volunteer their services will be healthy, active, efficient men, of suitable age and connections for the benefit of the country. I would infinitely prefer them to men who have been unaccustomed to toil or exercise, or frontier service, such as you would recruit for the regular Army. Men who have been reared in houses, who have had comforts around them, who have hardly ever been exposed to a blighting wind or shower in their lives, are not to be compared in efficiency, for such service as this, to men who have been reared on the frontier, and who understand border life and know something of Indian character.

I cannot, I will not, assent to the allegation that regulars are cheaper than volunteers, or that when in the field they are more efficient than volunteers. You need not tell me that, if you give volunteers the requisite implements, they will not march up in column or in line with their bayonets as well as regulars, and that they will not meet veteran troops as well as regulars. Wherever the American militia have been brought into a charge, they have never been repelled by regulars unless they were aided by a teeming shower of artillery balls. I believe you can charge as well with volunteers as with any troops on earth. How did they acquit themselves at Monterey, under a most galling fire of artillery? How did they ascend the heights of the Bishop's Palace, at Monterey? How did they act at Buena Vista? How did they act at Cerro Gordo? There they were driven back by a fire of artillery, and not in a hand-to-hand encounter, with bayonets crossed. I deny that they are not as good as regulars. I say that they have an aptitude for a charge, for a conflict of the most deadly character, and they can be prepared for it in half the time regulars can be, because they are half drilled when they go into service. I think I may safely say that they can be drilled in the platoon, the company, the battalion, and the regimental or field evolutions, in half the time that regular raw recruits can be.

If you want efficient troops, you must take volunteers. If you want the true national reliance in time of need and emergency, you must take volunteers. If you wish to carry on this war immediately, and to an effectual termination, you will have to take volunteers. If you wish to save the Treasury of the United States, you must take volunteers. If you have a higher and holier object, to preserve the institutions of this country, you must rely on volunteers at last.

The framers of the Constitution thought that they were the description of troops that were to stand for the defense of the country. I have no quotations to make from the various bills of rights of the States, which declare that standing armies are dangerous in time of peace, but I will simply read one short paragraph from the Constitution of the United States. In the enumeration of the powers of Congress, I find that authority is conferred—

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions."

This excludes the idea of a standing army for such purposes. One cause of the great convulsion which separated us from the mother country was the billeting or stationing of troops on private families without their consent. That was one of the most odious features of that phase of things that menaced our liberties, and it grated on the ideas of the freemen of this country. This provision was made in the Constitution on the supposition that none but the militia would be necessary for these purposes; that in any emergency there was not to be a standing army to be called out; and that that odious feature of despotism would not be obtruded before the public eye. It was not intended to use a standing army composed of mercenaries, of men of other countries, picked up at random, to operate upon the citizens of this country. No, sir; it was supposed that if the American people had to be subdued, it would be done by their peers, whose presence would rebuke them for insubordination or insurrection; and not by a regular force made up of mercenaries whose only resource was their employment in the Army, and who had none of the endearments of life to fall back upon when they had executed the orders of their officers.

This is the spirit in which the Constitution was framed. These were the feelings that animated its authors, who declared their open detestation of anything like the employment of a Federal force to control citizens, and reduce them to subordination to the laws. Therefore, sir, I am opposed to the increase of the regular Army; and if it is intended for the Mormons, I tell you that we cannot wait two years to raise troops to subdue them. If they have to be subdued—and God forbid us from such a result—and the valley of Salt Lake is to be ensanguined with the blood of American citizens, I think it will be one of the most fearful calamities that has befallen this country, from its inception to the present moment. I deprecate it as an intolerable evil. I am satisfied that the Executive has not had the information he ought to have had on this subject before making such a movement as he has directed to be made. I am convinced that facts have been concealed from him. I think his wisdom and patriotism should have dictated the propriety of ascertaining, in the first place, whether the people of Utah were willing to submit to the authority of the United States. Why not send to them men to whom they could unbosom themselves, and see whether they would say, "we are ready to submit to the authorities of the United States, if you send to us honest men and gentlemen, whose morals, whose wisdom, and whose character, comport with the high station they fill; we will surrender to them; we will give up our authority, and act in obedience to the laws of the United States." If this course had been taken by the Executive, I am sure he would never have recommended war; and if the facts had been before the Secretary of War, I am sure he never would have made the recommendation which he has submitted to us.

But, sir, there is never a pretext wanting here when it is proposed to increase the regular Army, so as to give promotion or to create new appointments. The Department had been for years calling for additional regiments, and in 1855 we granted them. We got along very well for many years without them. Indian depredations have not been diminished by the employment of those four regiments. More depredations have been committed since their organization, I believe, on the Indians, and by the Indians on the white people, than for five or six years previous. Whenever it is considered necessary to increase the Army, or to raise a disturbance, bad men will go on the frontier, who expect to profit by such things, or stimulated by such influences, and they commit depredations on the Indians or on the whites, so as to provoke a contest. Men have been detected in Texas stealing horses and committing depredations, and running to the Indian country for the purpose of inducing depredations on the Indians, when they would profit by that, or so to confuse the public mind that the people could not tell whether the depredators were Indians or white horse thieves.

How does Texas stand in relation to the Army? There are three thousand troops there, and we are told Texas is complaining that she wants protection. It is not regular soldiers that she wants; she has had three thousand of them there; they have done no good; she does not want them; she wants a regiment of rangers that she can rely upon; she does not want a force that will be inert and inactive until depredations are committed; and then, when the people get to a fort at some distance and give information that such and such depredations have been committed, some infantry, or perhaps some dragoons or cavalry, are sent out on the march; but by that time the Indians are far in advance of them. The troops march on; they do not meet that portion of Indians who committed the depredations; but they come across others who are hunting, unprepared for attack, without any hostile designs or thievish intention towards the property of the whites, and slaughter them indiscriminately, men, women, and children. That is the way in which the frontier has been protected. But if you give to Texas one thousand rangers, they will scour the frontier; they will be continually moving; the war parties of the Indians or horse-thieving parties will not know when they are to fall on them. These men are adepts; they know the country; they understand the necessity of guarding the frontier, they have some sympathy with the settlers; their friends are to be secured by their exertions. They are men residing on the frontier who go into this service; it is their interest to give protection to the frontier; but those who are sent there as regular troops may consult their convenience or their ignorance of Indian service, leaving the people on the frontier to be butchered and massacred.

That is the reason why I am opposed to any force but rangers in Texas. I do not intend to reflect on the troops of the United States, on the officers, or the men who compose the rank and file; but I am stating facts and history, that I wish to be understood. Would that I could impress the Senate with the necessity of giving that kind of force to Texas that is indispensable to her protection. I want a force that will be useful, and not one that will lock the door after the horse is stolen. That is done now. As I said before, Indians can pass within one mile, or half a mile, or two hundred yards, of your forts, and pass down inside of the line of the fortress, steal horses, and return without danger, from forts some fifty or sixty or two hundred miles apart. Do you think they cannot pass and repass their guns in perfect security? No one can doubt it. You do not give protection to the people now by your Army. But if there were a thousand rangers continually on horseback, on animals accustomed to the range, and who require no forage, you would find that country in a very different situation. The horses used by the rangers are very different from the fine American horses, as we call them, that have been pampered and reared and nursed and fed extravagantly. They are inured from their very birth to the time they are taken into the service, to subsist on grass. If they can find that on the prairies they are always ready for action. They do not become useless if they are not fed, or forage is scarce. It is no calamity to them, because their forage is every day where they are.

Insist that Texas does not want regular troops. If you will give her rangers you may withdraw every one of the three thousand soldiers that have been stationed there if you please, or you may leave them to take care of the permanent forts along the Rio Grande. You should leave artillery enough for the purpose of keeping the arms and ordnance in order; but you may withdraw the three thousand infantry, cavalry, and dragoons, and appropriate them to the necessities of the Mormon war, or whatever service you please. The more men you send to the Mormon war the more you increase the difficulty. They have to be fed. For some sixteen hundred miles you have to transport provisions. The regiments sent there have found Fort Bridger and other places, as they approached them, heaps of ashes. They will find Salt Lake, if they ever reach it, a heap of ashes. They will find that they will have to fight against Russia and the Russians. Whoever goes there will meet the fate of Napoleon's army when he went to Moscow. Just as sure as we are now standing in the Senate, these people, if they fight at all, will fight desperately. They are defending their homes. They are fighting to prevent the execution of threats that have been made, which touch their hearths and their families; and depend upon it they will fight until every man perishes before he surrenders. That is not all. If they do not choose to go into conflict immediately, they will secure their women and children in the fastnesses of the mountains; they have provisions for two years; and they will carry on a guerrilla warfare which will be most terrific to the troops you send there. They will get no supplies there. You will have to transport them all from Independence, in Missouri. When the fire will consume it, there will not be a spear of grass left that will not be burnt.

In addition to that universal desolation, they have cañons, they have ravines, and they have turbulent rivers to cross. A hundred men on the sides of these cañons can roll down rocks enough to keep the army engaged a week in getting them out of the way, and there is no place to put them. I am told by persons who have traversed it, that the passway is a mere space between precipitous and high mountains barely sufficient for the passage of a wagon. In times of rain a little rivulet courses its way through, and there they have made a road of width sufficient for the passage of one wagon only. How long would it take to throw obstructions there that would render it impassable? How long could they delay your army in that way? and when they arrived at Salt Lake, exhausted, worn down, without supplies and munitions, in what situation would they be to take to the mountains and to pursue these men in their fastnesses where ten men could resist a thousand? When the troops are in these cañons the rocks could be hurled down on them; and it could easily be done, for they are now in almost a quivering condition, and the least exertion will cast them down. With five hundred, or even fifty men, they could destroy an army of ten thousand, if they were in one of these gorges, and they chose to hurl down the rocks upon the troops. I am told there is a road for fifty miles which you have to pass, that is very difficult under the most favorable circumstances. Then, after you strike the margin of Salt Lake, there again is a precipitous mountain of several hundred feet high and perpendicular, on which an enemy could stand and act.

But this is not all. The rivers are impassable except by ferry-boats. Do you think the Mormons will let the ferry-boats remain? Will they not destroy them? There are no means there of making them; there is no suitable timber. How are they to carry the army and the supplies across? To reach Salt Lake City would require a march of many days from where the army are now, if they had no obstacles to encounter, no impediments in their way, and no enemy to encounter. I received the other day from a very intelligent Mormon whom I knew in Texas, and a very respectable man he was, once I believe the United States district attorney for Utah, a letter of seven pages. In that letter he takes a comprehensive view of this subject. He protests most solemnly that there never would have been the least hostility to the authorities of the United States if the President had sent respectable men there. He says that Governor Brigham Young has been anxious to get rid of the cares of office, and would freely have surrendered it and acknowledged the authority of the United States; but that men have gone there, who have made threats that they would hang them, and even threats of a character that renders them more sensitive in relation to their families, and that they expect nothing but rapine and destruction to ensue on the advent of those troops if they should ever arrive there.

I know not what course will be taken on this subject. I hope it will be one of conciliation. As for troops to conquer the Mormons, fifty thousand would be as inefficient as two or three thousand; and in proportion as you send troops in that vast region, without supplies, and without the hope of them, with no means of subsistence after a certain period, unless it is transported to them, the greater will be your danger. Consider the facilities these people have to cut off your supplies. I say your men will never return, but their bones will whiten the valley of Salt Lake. If war begins, the very moment one single drop of blood is drawn, it will be the signal of extermination.

Mr. President, in my opinion, whether we are to have a war with the Mormons or not, will depend on the fact whether our troops advance or not. If they do not advance; if negotiations be opened; if we understand what the Mormons are really willing to do; that they are ready to acquiesce in the mandates of the Government, and render obedience to the Constitution; if you will take time to ascertain that, and not repudiate all idea of peace, we may have peace. But so sure as the troops advance, so sure they will be annihilated. You may treble them, and you will only add to the catastrophe, not diminish human suffering. These people expect nothing but extermination, or abuse more intolerable than even extermination would be, from your troops, and they will oppose them.

We have a clear manifestation in a letter that was read here the other day of the course proposed to be taken by the commanding officer there, against whom I wish to say nothing. I shall animadvert, however, as I may think fit, on the circumstances that were there disclosed. I believe I saw the letter; but I am not certain yet that I fully comprehend it. An act of civility was tendered by Brigham Young, and you might, if you please, construe it, under the circumstances, rather as an act of submission on his part. He sent salt to the troops, understanding that it was scarce there, and was selling at seven dollars a pint. As an act of humanity, thinking at least that it could not be regarded as discourteous, he sent a supply of salt requisite for the relief of the encampment, intimating to the commander that he could pay for it, if he would not accept of it as a present. What was the message the military officer sent him back? I believe the substance of it was that he would have no intercourse with a rebel, and that when they met they would fight. They will fight; and if they fight, he will get miserably whipped. That was a time to make peace with Brigham Young, because there is something potent in salt. With the Turk, who has similar habits and religion to the Mormons, it is the sacrament of perpetual friendship. Why may not the Mormons have incorporated that into their creed? But, instead of that, he sent him a taunt and defiance. Why could he not have said: "I will accept it as a present, or I will recompense you for it according to its value? I would rather see Brigham Young; and if he chooses to come to my encampment, I pledge him the honor of an officer that he shall go away unscathed if we come to no understanding; but if he wishes to acknowledge the authority of the United States, I am ready to receive that acknowledgment; and if the Government of the United States bids me, I will withdraw my troops." If he had sent that message, it would have been worthy of a magnanimous, generous soldier's mind and heart. As it was, he sent a message I would not have sent, and I do not think it is calculated to conciliate Brigham Young. He is too proud a man, I take it; a man of too much sense to have sent such a message as that, after an act of civility was tendered.

What is to be the consequence of that act? We must have supplies. I presume the troops have cattle; and they must slaughter them in order to have fresh supplies. They will be very fresh supplies, indeed, if they have no salt to use with them. Placing men upon diet of that kind is calculated to produce the most fatal of all epidemics in the world—the cholera. Exposed in tents in that inclement region at this season, I should not be astonished if two thirds or three fourths of his forces were swept off by cholera. Humanity ought to have induced him to accept the salt and make a fair recompense for it, if he did not receive it as a courtesy; but an opposite course was taken. If there be any disastrous consequences resulting, his message was calculated to bring them about.

Mr. President, I shall not longer occupy the precious time of the Senate. My idea is, that volunteers are the cheapest and most reliable troops, because they have more physical energy and activity; and, as a mass, more intelligence than regulars. Though their officers may not be as educated, yet the mass of the rank and file are of that character that they embody the average intelligence generally of the citizens of the United States. They are, therefore, more efficient. They will arrive at the scene of action before the regular troops, that are contemplated in this bill, would be half raised. They would be raised cheaper, for you would take them at the instant; whereas, years will roll round and incidental expenses will accumulate before you obtain the regulars you contemplate raising. If the Mormons are to be conquered, volunteers can conquer them immediately; the regulars, never.

Volunteers being the cheapest force, and my principles being opposed to an increase of the regular Army, I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, which authorizes the President, according to the contemplation of the Constitution, to call out the militia in the character of volunteers for this service. They are tendering their services. Let him accept them; let him march them to the scene of action; and then you will meet the contingency contemplated in the Constitution of the country by using the militia to suppress insurrection and rebellion; but if you call out regulars, you get outside of the Constitution. I think it was not contemplated by the spirit of the Constitution. I am perfectly satisfied that volunteers who are taken from the militia are the persons contemplated by the framers of the Constitution to perform duties of this character.

It is said that regulars are necessary to protect the frontier. Did they protect the frontier of Georgia in old times? Have they protected the frontier of Florida? Have they protected the frontier of Texas? Have they protected the frontier of any portion of the United States on any occasion, or given security to frontiers that would not without their aid have been peaceful? I say not; or if so, it is beyond my reading or historical knowledge. Never have they done it. They cannot in the nature of things do it, whilst Indians have legs to run or horses to ride. They cannot do it, because Indians can go around their forts, and unless there is continual vigilance kept up along the border you cannot protect the frontiers by regulars. There is no sense in saying that a fortification gives protection to the people when an Indian can go within a mile of it and pass down and butcher the inhabitants. Then you start and run after the Indian, but he laughs at you. But if you have rangers continually traveling from point to point, the Indian will not know when he is to fall in with them, or when they will come across his trail and pursue him and take present vengeance. Do this, and you will protect the frontier. Take away the regulars and employ them where you please. They may be useful, as I have said before, in taking care of permanent fortifications and preserving arms.

It is said, however, that discipline is to be maintained with a nucleus on which to form a regular Army in time of need. This amounts to declaring that you must have an adequate force for all emergencies. I was astonished the other day to hear the Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] say that certain massacres had taken place because there were no regular troops stationed at a particular point. I wonder, if they had been stationed there and the Indians had gone around them, what they would have done. The theory is that you must have regular troops enough to meet every emergency that is called for. If the difficulties contemplated in the speech of the Senator from Indiana should arise, he imagines it will be necessary to have a force of regulars on hand for the purposes he indicated. If you do that, you must have two or three hundred thousand men, for that number might be employed perchance. If England, France, and Russia, as I have heard it suggested, were all to combine for the purpose of subjugating the United States, it would require three hundred thousand men, perhaps, and you must raise these three hundred thousand men to meet that contingency, for we do not know what will take place! Something dreadful may happen, and we must have regulars to put it down, and we must have a standing Army?

Sir, there is but one true army in the country, and that is the army of volunteers. There is but one class of men who, by the spirit of our institutions, are imbued with that heart which will perpetuate our liberties when called into the field, and they are the volunteers. Whenever you come to rely upon them, they will not deceive you; they will not desert. I heard of a case where four hundred regulars deserted from one station in a year—half the troops there. If you are to keep up the Army by replacing the four or five thousand who desert every year, it will be rather an expensive business. I think they will be more expensive than volunteers. Volunteers never desert their banners. I am determined, while I live, unless some emergency requires it, not to vote to increase the regular Army. While I occupy a place on this floor, I will oppose the increase of the regular Army. Thank God, my period of service here is drawing to a close, and I rejoice at it, for it will relieve me of responsibility. In the utterance of my opinions and sentiments in private life, as an American citizen, if I shall be spared, and in the little circle around my hearth, at least, I will inculcate the doctrine that a standing army is dangerous to liberty, and that volunteers are the true army of a Republic, and the only means of preserving its liberties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, in place of the original bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I see in the last line of the second section of the substitute what I expect is an omission in the printing, and, perhaps, in the copy. I move, after the words "shall be," to insert "appointed and" before the word "commissioned." It is merely a verbal correction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRODERICK. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, who has voted steadily with the friends of the original bill which was reported from the committee, I desire to state briefly why I shall not support the proposition which has been introduced by the Senator from Virginia. When this question was first agitated in the Military Committee, I was induced to give my support to this measure on the information I derived from the chairman, [Mr. Davis,] who is not now in his seat. I became committed to the bill, and have, as I have said, voted steadily for it. I am free to confess, that if I had had the information at that time that I now possess, I should not have voted for any increase of the Army. I am inclined to favor the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, believing that if there is any necessity for an increase of military force, it will be better to allow the President to call out volunteers.

I make this statement at this time that Senators may understand why I have changed my position. Without this explanation, some curiosity, which I desire to satisfy, may be found in some minds in regard to the motives which induced it. I therefore now state that I am opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, and that I shall vote for that of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am in hopes that, before the question is taken, the substitute will be read. As I think it covers the whole idea of the Administration, and will meet the wants of the country, I ask that it be read, so that we can act on it understandingly.

Several SENATORS. We all understand it.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say a very few words in explanation of my course on this bill. When a vote was taken some days ago on striking out the first section of this bill, as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, I voted with the friends of the bill, under the impression that we were engaged in a war which required the support of every patriotic citizen. I understood the President to say that an increase of the Army was necessary for the protection of the troops already sent to Utah. In conversation with distinguished Army officers, I got the opinion that our Army there was in danger of entire destruction, unless reinforcements were sent immediately; and in accordance with my uniform course in public life, I have considered it my duty, when the country needed troops for the protection of its honor, or for the protection of any portion of my fellow-citizens who were in distress, to vote them; and I made up my mind to vote for granting such an increase of the forces as the President might ask for. With this view, I voted in favor of retaining the first section of the bill reported by the committee, with the condition that the troops to be raised should be disbanded as soon as the war was over. If I still believed that the same necessity existed, I should now pursue the same course; but I cannot think so when I consider the time which has been consumed by the Administration itself. The delay which has taken place convinces me that there can be no such emergency as we were some time ago told existed. The friends with whom I act, have indicated a disposition to furnish the Administration with volunteers for this service; but they are declined; and there seems to be a determination to force upon the country an increase of the regular standing Army, to which I can never consent. All former republics have been destroyed by mercenary troops, and such will be the fate of this Government if the same course be pursued. I desire to put off that day as long as possible.

I have said that there appears to be no emergency to justify the passage of this bill. If we were to pass it now, probably months would be occupied before any troops could be sent to Utah. The time which would elapse before these troops could be sent there, renders it impossible that they can be of any use there during the present season; in fact, we are now told that they are not wanted for that service. This being the case, I cannot vote for this bill which I look upon as proposing an addition to the standing Army of the country without regard to the emergency which we have been asked to supply. I shall vote, however, for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which proposes to place volunteers at the service of the President to be used only in case they shall be necessary for the troubles in Utah.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope the communications we have heard around the Chamber will not prevent any one from insisting on an immediate vote on this measure. If it will not carry here, it ought to be defeated. I trust and hope it will be defeated if there is not a majority for it, and I think the responsibilities that may occur hereafter will rest where they belong. I sincerely hope we may have a vote to-night. ["Vote!" vote!"]

Mr. PUGH. I wish to say five words only. I am in favor of the employment of volunteers; but I regard the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee as comprising two propositions which, in my judgment, are in violation of the Constitution of the United States: first, interfering with the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army; and second, dictating how the officers of the militia shall be elected. One of those provisions I endeavored to correct, but I was voted down, and therefore I did not attempt to correct the other. I shall be compelled, therefore, reluctantly to vote against that proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I want to say a single word. I am satisfied there was a misapprehension of the provision in reference to the President appointing the officers. It is just the same as was in the ten-regiment bill.

Mr. PUGH. The ten-regiment bill was an increase of the regular Army.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It prescribed whom he should appoint as officers.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Indiana

[Mr. BRIGHT] has paired off with a gentleman on the other side, I think the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.]

Mr. GWIN. I have been requested to pair off with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is confined at home by dangerous illness; and I have agreed to do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Toombs, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—26.

So the substitute proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to strike out the whole bill after the enacting clause, and insert this substitute:

That, in addition to the military establishment of the United States, there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President, one regiment of dragoons and two regiments of infantry, each to be composed of the same number and rank of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, buglers, musicians, and privates, and so forth, as are provided for a regiment of dragoons and infantry, respectively, under existing laws, and who shall receive the same pay, rations, and allowances, according to their respective grades, and be subject to the same regulations and to the rules and articles of war. Provided, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States alone to appoint such of the commissioned officers, authorized by this act, below the grade of field officers, as may not be appointed during the present session.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be discharged from the service of the United States at the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That regular promotions to vacancies occurring in the grades of commissioned officers, in the regiments hereby authorized and required to be raised, shall be by regiments, instead of by arms of service, as now regulated and provided in certain cases.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is, authorized to select such officers of the Army as he may think proper, and assign them to command with temporary and increased rank in the regiments hereby authorized, and who, whilst exercising the temporary rank thus conferred, shall receive the pay and emoluments of the commands to which they have been assigned, and be entitled to no other pay or allowances whatever during the period of such detached service. The officers so employed shall succeed to vacancies in their own corps according to the ordinary rules of promotion, and, if not previously ordered to do so, shall, upon the disbandment of the regiments to which they have been assigned, rejoin their own regiment, corps, troop, or company, as the case may be. The field-officers of the regiments herein authorized and provided for, shall be selected from the officers of the Army, and appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to temporary commissions, the effect of which will cease and determine with the disbandment of the corps to which they may be assigned.

Mr. BIGGS. I believe, by these substitutes which have been proposed, it is well understood this service is to be temporary merely. It is the opinion of many of the Senators that there will be no necessity at all for raising this force, and that some arrangement may be made rendering it unnecessary, so far as peace negotiations may be concerned in Utah. This amendment makes it imperative on the President of the United States to raise the force. I desire to suggest a modification for the consideration of the Senator from Virginia, which I have already submitted to him, and to which he has no objection. It is, to insert after the word "President," in the fifth line, the words, "if, in his opinion, the exigencies of the public service shall require it."

Mr. HUNTER. I accept that amendment.

Mr. BIGGS. The second section provides:

"That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be discharged from the service of the United States, at the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act."

I move to amend that section by adding the words, "or sooner, if the public service will permit."

Mr. HUNTER. I accept that.

Mr. PUGH. Is it in order to move a substitute for that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. PUGH. Then I offer a substitute for the employment of volunteers, leaving out the two propositions to which I objected in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. My motion is to strike out all after the word "that," and insert:

The President is hereby authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding in all three thousand officers and men, who may offer their services as cavalry or infantry, to serve for twelve months, unless sooner discharged, after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, or been mustered into the service of the United States; and that the sum of — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers, when mustered into the service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and, until discharged therefrom, be subject to the rules and articles of war; and shall be organized in the same manner, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers and soldiers of the like grade or arm in the Army of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, or regiments, and that each company shall consist of the same number of officers and men as may be prescribed by law for companies of the regular Army. The captain and lieutenants of the said companies shall be elected or appointed, according to the laws of their several States; and the President, in the appointment of the staff and field-officers shall apportion them to the States wherein the companies are accepted.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred upon persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the substitute of the Senator from Ohio as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. GWIN. I had, on the preliminary votes and test questions in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, agreed to pair off with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.] Being in favor of volunteers, I mean now to vote in favor of the proposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the substitute was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Biggs, Broderick, Cameron, Crittenden, Douglas, Green, Gwin, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Pugh, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, and Toombs—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, King, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Simmons, Slidell, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—35.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Having voted with the majority, and wanting to give what time there is for deliberation, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lie on the table was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CLAY. Having achieved a great work to-day, I think we may rest on our labors until Monday next. With that view, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BELL. I desire to make an explanation which I think important to myself, and I trust I shall have the forbearance of the Senate in making it. In the debate which took place yesterday between my colleague and myself, I find one passage reported which is an error; and it is due to my colleague that I should make an explanation. The report contains this paragraph, as having been said by me:

"In the course of the canvasses in Tennessee, the female population usually come out to hear the champions on both sides in their debates, at barbecues and other occasions got up for the purpose of hearing them declaim on the subject of politics; and he asserted a doctrine which placed the delicate females among his auditory upon a level with the black wenches of the middle and western portions of the State—the property of the slaveholding lords or aristocrats."

It is due to my colleague to declare that I said no such thing; but I do not mean this as a censure on the reporters, for I am utterly amazed at the general accuracy with which they report my remarks, which are not premeditated in general. What I said was, that my colleague charged that the policy of the State, in the apportionment of representation, was such that it placed that portion of his auditory in that position—not that he advocated a doctrine which placed them in that position. I think it due to my colleague to say this much, in justice to him.

There is another point which I desire to notice. I had not time yesterday morning, before I commenced my remarks, to read the speech of my colleague made on the day before, as reported in the Globe of yesterday morning. I had no time to do more than run over it cursorily; but I understand from a friend that my colleague is reported to have stated that I had declared my determination to vote for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. I have not had time, since that intimation was given me, to examine the speech so as to find that paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not remember precisely the language of the report, but I certainly understood my colleague as saying that he would vote for the admission of Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. BELL. I should like to know on what expression of sentiment by me that is based. When that was told to me by a friend, I said that I would not stand any imputation of that kind; but I recollected that my colleague had pressed on me several interrogatories in reference to the instructions of the Legislature, and I saw how he could mistake my position. If I remember rightly, he asked me whether I meant to disregard the instructions of the Legislature, and I replied that I did not. What I meant was, that I would give them all due consideration and deference; that I did not mean to say that I would disregard them, because that might be construed as treating them with contempt. I excuse my colleague, if he inferred what I understand he asserted; but I desire to say now that I did not declare that I would obey the instructions of the Legislature on that point. I rather intimated the contrary; but I never said anything so disrespectful as that I would disregard or treat with contempt the instructions of the majority of my Legislature; I said that I would defer to them where they were formed upon a full consideration of the subject, in the manner I stated in my first remarks on the resolutions.

While I declared that I would not be bound to obey the instructions of the Legislature, I think my language could not be construed as saying that I intended to vote for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. While I do not mean to say that in all circumstances that may occur my mind is made up to vote in a certain way, I do say that my inclinations are rather against the course proposed by the instructions. I think from the whole tenor of my remarks on presenting the resolutions, it would be inferred that my impression was that I should vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, unless some new developments should be made, or some new information received; but still I held myself open to be convinced, either by arguments or new developments, or any considerations of sufficient weight that might be presented to induce me to go for it. I think it doubtful whether anything is likely to occur to induce me to change my mind.

I censure not my colleague. He asked me whether I would disregard the instructions of the Legislature, and I answered distinctly that I would not in that sense; but I explained the ground on which I made that answer. It was that I did not mean to treat with disrespect or contempt any expression of opinion by my Legislature. I have thought this much was due to myself, my friends, and my opponents. I have an honorable Senator now in my eye who really thought I had expressed a determination to vote for the admission of Kansas on the Lecompton constitution; and he was so confident of it that until he looked into the debate he would not be satisfied that I had not expressed such a sentiment. I do not mean to say that my colleague may not have been misled; but I trust what I have now stated will be sufficient to prevent any further discussion on this subject between him and myself.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I presume the Senate is sick and tired of this dish of Tennessee politics which we have had; but as my colleague has introduced the question again, I feel bound to say a word or two in justice to the reporters, though I do not know exactly what they have reported.

Mr. BELL. I say I have not seen it either. I do not know what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In justice to the reporters I wish to state what was my understanding of what I replied to when I made my speech. My colleague commented on the two first resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, and as I understood him, indicated very clearly and distinctly that he would not regard them or obey them. The third resolution instructed him and myself to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and when I asked him the question he stated that he would vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. That is the way I understood him, and I think the run of the debate will so show it. Then I asked the further question, whether he would vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, in obedience to his instructions, or upon his own judgment and reflection; to which he replied that on his own account he should vote against it, but in consequence of the instructions he should vote for the admission. That is the way I understood him, and I think the current of the debate will show it to be so. But of course the honorable Senator has a right to explain his position, if there be any misunderstanding about it, and so far as I am concerned his explanation is satisfactory to me. When he said that he would vote for the admission of Kansas, I stated, according to my recollection, that I was gratified to hear that. I do not know what my reply is as printed, but if the papers have given it that way, they are right.

Mr. BELL. There was not the slightest necessity for my colleague to interpose at all. I said before that I remembered the question which he put to me, and the answer I made, which might have misled him; but I did not hear his statement as to the inference he drew, that I would vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, or I should have corrected it at the time. I never approximated to such a sentiment. I did not mean to express any such sentiment. What I meant was, to show a due respect to the views of my Legislature, as evinced by resolutions expressive of the opinion of the majority of that body. I have not read the report of my remarks on that point, because I supposed I was clear and explicit in regard to it. I expressed my opinions in reference to the right and power of the Legislature to control my vote. I said that I did not feel bound by their instructions, but yet when I perceived that there was an expression of opinion on the part of the majority of the Legislature, that seemed to proceed from convictions founded on a full understanding of the subject, in all its bearings and consequences, I should always be disposed to defer to them, if there was no constitutional difficulty in the way; and, without acknowledging the obligations of the instructions, I would shape my course accordingly; but I said expressly, "that is not the present case." I think nobody who heard me, much less who has read what I said, could misunderstand me.

When my colleague pressed me on the subject as to what course I intended to pursue, I remember that one question was, "do I understand my colleague to mean that he disregards the instructions of the Legislature?" How it is reported I do not know, but I remember very well what I said, and I recollect the reason that actuated me at the moment. If I had answered in the affirmative, that I would disregard them, it would be ground sufficient on which to predicate columns on columns, speech after speech in Tennessee, that I had a perfect contempt of a majority of the Legislature. I had, by that time, come to a full understanding as to what I had to meet and contend with, and I said "no." Then I rose and stated what I did mean, that I intended to treat, with all proper respect, the sentiment of the majority of the Legislature of my State; and I did not intend to disregard it, but I did not mean to say I would obey it. My first speech on the resolutions I presented was sufficient to show that I did not feel bound to do any such thing.

When I made this explanation, I excused my colleague, and said perhaps there was enough to mislead him. I did not notice the inference which he drew, or of course I should not have allowed it to pass without comment at the time. I did not see it yesterday morning in his printed speech, because, as the Senate knows, the Globe is not laid on our desks until the meeting of the Senate. I obtained one, half an hour, or a quarter of an hour, before the meeting of the Senate, by sending a special messenger for it, and that was the only time I had to give to an examination of my colleague's speech of three hours. Of course I could only glance over it hurriedly. This point escaped me then, or I should have noticed it yesterday. I do not mean to say that my colleague may not have been honestly and candidly misled. I do not mean to say that there was any want of candor on his part. What I mean is, that I said no such thing. I think everybody who heard me must have been impressed with the idea that I should probably vote against the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, and yet I did not mean to commit myself positively, so as to shut out any light which I might derive from information to be received in the progress of the subject. I only state what I think would have been inferred by anybody who heard me, that I was inclined, with my present impressions, to go against it; and yet I did not mean to commit myself. There might be modifications of the proposition, there might be such provisions introduced that I should feel myself bound to vote for it. I avowed then, as I had all along, that my policy was to go for that which promised, with the greatest certainty, to terminate the eternal agitation on the question of slavery, which has been productive of so much mischief.

I have made this statement, because I desire that neither friends nor opponents shall misunderstand my course on this subject. My friends at home are advised of it. There is no withholding it. As the case now presents itself to me, unless I shall receive further information or further developments, I shall vote in opposition to the course recommended in the instructions of the Legislature of Tennessee; but still I do not mean to be bound by that. I await further developments, further argument, and any further light that may be thrown on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senate that there is no question pending.

Mr. BELL. I asked leave to make a personal explanation. There is no objection to my colleague's proceeding. I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have a single word to say on the same principle that the explanation has been made by my colleague. I replied to my colleague as I understood him at the time and as I think many Senators understood him. If I misunderstood him and others misunderstood him, of course he has a right to explain and define his position and tell what it was; but my reply was made to his speech just as I understood it.

In reference to apportioning the State, counting the whites against the blacks, and all that sort of thing, I merely wish to say that so far as that statement of my colleague, about what he has heard of what occurred in East Tennessee, is concerned, I was gratified that he stated it, for I intended at a proper time to call his attention, and that of the Senate, to it. That is all gratuitous, and has no foundation whatever; and I was gratified to hear him make the explanation.

Mr. BELL. I meant to do justice to my colleague as well as myself.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senators from Tennessee allow a stranger to interpose a word? I heard very carefully all that was said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee on this side, [Mr. BELL,] and I paid very particular attention, as I always do, to what was said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee on the other side, [Mr. JOHNSON.] I saw when the honorable Senator from Tennessee on the other side misapprehended and thereupon assumed that the honorable Senator here had pledged himself to vote for Lecompton. I observed it at the time, and thought he had misapprehended his colleague. I noticed it at the time, and I think when you come to read the debates you will find that the misapprehension occurred very much in the way it has been described. I did not fall into the error which the honorable Senator did.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The honorable Senator from New York proceeds on the idea that I misapprehended my colleague; but does he not remember that when I replied to my colleague, I said I was glad to hear that?

Mr. SEWARD. Exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I went on to make my comments, supposing that he had committed himself to voting for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, at which I was gratified.

Mr. SEWARD. Exactly; that is so. That was the misapprehension.

Mr. BELL. I could not have heard that, or if I was here, I was not attending to it. From the course of his debate afterwards, in which he still pursued the same bitter strain of denunciation of my course, I could not suppose he would be gratified at anything I had said.

Mr. PUGH. As we have agreed to adjourn until Monday, it will gratify me if the Senate would devote a few moments to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. B. N. BROWN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] proposing the expulsion of ORSAMUS B. MATTESON.

MARYLAND CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House evidence in the contested-election case from the third congressional district of Maryland.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved that said evidence be referred to the Committee of Elections, and printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose, sir, it would be better to refer that evidence to the committee without printing. There is a good deal of it, and if it is necessary to have it printed it can be done afterwards.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I think we had better take the order to print without further delay. Mr. HARRIS's motion was agreed to.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, respecting an appropriation for repairing the saloon of the old portion of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, containing replies to a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted 4th January, 1858, calling for certain information in relation to the sales and other disposal of the public lands; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of 19th of January, 1857, in respect to the number of suits on the dockets of the respective clerks of the United States courts in 1857.

Mr. STANTON. That is in answer to a resolution which was passed on my motion at the last session of Congress, with a view to a reorganization of judicial districts. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled an act to amend an act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook, and others; which thereupon was signed by the Speaker.

ROBERT KIRKAM.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House the papers in the case of Robert Kirkam, for reference to the Court of Claims.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] will yield the floor, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will yield for that purpose. I understand that the bill to be reported is an important one, and that it ought to be reported immediately.

Mr. QUITMAN. The Committee on Military Affairs has instructed me to make a report on those portions of the President's message, and on the resolutions from the State of Texas, which were presented for their consideration.

As this is an important matter, I wish to have it brought before the House, and to have its consideration fixed for a particular day.

No objection being made,

Mr. QUITMAN reported a bill to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the House will indulge me for but a few minutes, I will give the reasons why I think the immediate passage of this bill is demanded by the interests of the country—

Mr. GROW. What is the matter before the House?

The SPEAKER. A report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROW. To be considered at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi does not ask its consideration at this time.

Mr. GROW. If it is to be considered at this time, I will object; but not otherwise.

The SPEAKER. It would be too late now to object.

Mr. GROW. Did the Chair state to the House that it was to be considered at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not. The Chair does not so understand it.

Mr. QUITMAN. I do not desire to press this bill immediately on the consideration of the House. I merely desire to have it printed, and its further consideration postponed till a particular day. I believe that this bill embodies the public sentiment of the country and of both Houses of Congress, more than any bill that has yet been presented. The House is aware that this subject was not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs until several weeks ago, on account of the delay in referring particular portions of the President's message; and that the same subject has been elaborately discussed in the other branch of Congress. It is time that this House should also present its views, and it is time that some reply should be given to the recommendation of the President in his annual message, and to the Legislature of the State of Texas. It is time that it should be decided whether there is to be proffered to the President any volunteer force, or any additional military force. Every man in the country, whether a military man or not, knows that action should be immediately taken in the matter. The bill is a simple one. I ask that it may be printed, and taken up for consideration on Wednesday next.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to present the views of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, in the shape of a substitute for the bill reported; and ask that it may take the same direction.

There being no objection, the bill and substitute were ordered to be printed, and their consideration postponed till Wednesday next.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask that unanimous consent may be given to take up the bills upon the Speaker's table, in order that those to which there will be no objection may be referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object. I want to get at all the bills regularly.

Mr. PHELPS. By this means we will do so. Mr. CLINGMAN. No, sir; I want the gentleman's help, and the help of other gentlemen, to get at these bills regularly.

Mr. PHELPS. A privileged question interposes to prevent the call of committees for reports. No objection is made to my proposition, except by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Well, I object. I want to get at these bills regularly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose the gentleman from North Carolina would not object to their being all taken up. I hope they will be taken up regularly.

Mr. CLINGMAN. No; sir; the gentleman said those not objected to. I do not mean that a single member of the House may prevent action on a bill which the House may wish to reach.

Mr. PHELPS. The reason I made the modification of my request was this: the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] has the floor on a question of privilege. There is a private bill upon the Speaker's table, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRIMES] is entitled to the floor. That was the only bill I had in my mind when I made the modification.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to further debate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not object to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, that we proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

RESOLUTIONS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. GARTRELL, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Georgia; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

Resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, asking for the passage of a law fixing the rules of evidence regulating the granting of bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers therein mentioned.

Resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, asking that bounty lands be granted the officers and soldiers of the several companies of mounted volunteers called into the service of the State of Georgia, under the provisions of an act assented to December 26, 1837.

ORSAMUS B. MATTESON.

Mr. BLISS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a bill for reference.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I can yield the floor no further. If I yield to one gentleman after the other, the whole day may be taken up in this way. I must stop it at some time.

The Clerk read the resolutions pending, as follows:

Whereas, at the last session of Congress a select committee of the House reported the following resolutions, to wit:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for constraining the Des Moines grant to have here and to use a large sum of money, and other valuable considerations, corruptly, for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through this House.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together, and pledged themselves, each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution, granting money or lands, unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled."

And said committee also reported the facts upon which said resolutions were predicated, which are published with the reports of the House.

And whereas, the first of said resolutions was adopted by the House of Representatives on the 27th of February last, by a vote of 145 yeas to 17 nays, and the said second resolution was adopted by the House on the same day without a division: and whereas, the said MATTESON had, prior to any vote being taken on the last resolution, resigned his seat in this House, and thus avoided the effect of the same had it been passed: and whereas, the said MATTESON is a member of this House, with the imputations conveyed by the passage of the first two of the foregoing resolutions still upon him, and without having been subsequently reelected by his constituents: Therefore,

Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and is hereby, expelled from this House.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to make a motion to submit this question to a special committee, for the reason that I do not believe this House has jurisdiction over this question. I think I can show that fact upon the law of the case and the Constitution of the United States. I desire to make that motion, that I may present my views, because I shall feel compelled to vote against the resolution, however much I may believe in my own private judgment the member from New York may deserve the censure contained in it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I cannot yield the floor at this time for the gentleman to make his motion.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration was introduced by me in the fervent belief, not only that this House had the power to pass it, but that it was the duty of the House to pass it. I do not know that I should have introduced it had it not been that the House had previously decided to go into an investigation which related to transactions of members of the last House, and determined to raise a committee and to prosecute inquiries in the remote parts of the country to ascertain what had been done by members of the last House implicating them in improper legislation. But when the House had so determined, I thought the cause already upon the docket here ought to be disposed of before new causes were set down for trial. For my own part, I have no doubt as to the entire power of the House to pass the resolution. The House may, by a majority of its members, inflict punishments upon any of its members, and with the concurrence of two thirds, may expel a member—not for disorderly conduct alone—but may expel a member. The power is given in the broadest sense. It is a power that the House ought to possess, and it is a power which it can exercise only by the concurrence of two thirds of its members. The very necessity of requiring two thirds of its members sufficiently guards the power granted from any abuse of it.

When I first introduced the resolution, I proposed to myself simply to have the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the power of the House; not that I entertained any doubt of the power myself; but knowing very well that some gentlemen did, I was willing that the Committee on the Judiciary should examine and report to the House, that we might have their authority and sanction for the passage of the resolution, if the House were determined to pass it. Subsequently, however, to the introduction of the original resolution, gentlemen upon the other side, colleagues of the member implicated, desired me to modify it in the manner in which it is now before the House. Supposing them to be equally interested in what concerned their colleague with any upon this side of the House, I modified it in accordance with my own view and the suggestions they made. In that form it now stands before the House. I shall not enter into an argument to satisfy the House of the necessity or propriety of the passage of the resolution. All the facts are in the form of depositions, and now exist upon the records of the House. They were published with the reports of the last session, and are accessible to, and I have no doubt have been seen and examined and weighed and canvassed by, members of the House. I do not propose, therefore, to take up any time whatever in discussing the resolution. If it shall be necessary to say anything in defense of myself, or in vindication of the resolution, I shall endeavor to do so; but I do not propose now to occupy the time of the House, or to take it from the important business before it for the purpose of further discussion.

I am willing that the question may be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.] I am not pertinacious as to the course which the House shall pursue. I deemed it my duty to bring the question before the House; and having done that, I shall not be disturbed or elated with any action which the House may take.

Mr. KEITT. I only desire to occupy the floor a moment for the purpose of making a statement, in consequence of my connection with the postponement of the consideration of the resolution for a month, when it was up before. I propose to make no argument upon any branch of the resolution.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] the House will remember, a little more than a month ago, offered his resolution, and it was then stated by a colleague of the member against whom the resolution is moved, that he was kept at home by sickness in his family. The gentleman from Illinois then postponed its consideration until the succeeding Monday. On Sunday night a gentleman from the town, I believe, in which Mr. MATTESON resides—at least from his congressional district—called upon me and asked me to move the further postponement of the resolution in consequence of the serious illness of Mrs. Matteson. I told him I did not move the resolution, and had no control whatever over it; that he must go to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] who had moved it. The next morning the gentleman called upon me at my committee-room; said he had called upon the gentleman from Illinois and made a statement to him; that the gentleman from Illinois was ill, and could not attend the House that day, but that he readily concurred in the motion to postpone its consideration for a month; and asked me, as I had no personal or political relations with Mr. MATTESON, as an act of justice to him, to make that motion. He said to me that Mr. MATTESON was kept at home by the serious illness of his wife—an illness from which, in the judgment of her physicians, she probably never would recover. I made the motion because it was an act of justice to him under the circumstances.

Since that time I have received letters informing me that the excuse was fabricated; that Mrs. Matteson has not been sick. I have seen it so stated in an editorial article in a newspaper published at the gentleman's place of residence and sent to me. I have been informed by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that she is sick, and I had a newspaper, published at the gentleman's place of residence, sent to me, in which it was stated, editorially, that she is sick; and I have received half a dozen letters stating that she has not been for years as well as now.

This morning Mr. Moulton, who six years ago was a competitor of Mr. MATTESON, placed in my hands a letter from the physician of Mr. MATTESON, which I will read to the House. I do not know to whom it is directed as there is no direction upon the envelop. It is as follows:

"UTICA, February 15, 1858.

"I am in receipt of your letter of this morning. I have been Mrs. Matteson's physician for more than a year. She is subject to severe attacks of illness, and she has scarcely seen a well day for the last six months, and for the past few weeks she has been suffering more than usual."

Now, sir, these are the facts as they are in my possession. Upon them I have no comment to make, and no feelings to gratify.

Mr. SEWARD. In my opinion this is one of the gravest questions that has been presented to the House of Representatives for their decision; and while I condemn, as much as any man, the conduct of the member to be affected by our decision, yet I presume to stand here to respect the laws and the Constitution of my country, and, if need be, to defend this man in his constitutional rights. This House has not only civil jurisdiction, but criminal jurisdiction over its members; and I lay down the proposition, sir, without fear of contradiction, that unless some law can be shown, or some provision in the Constitution that attaches a personal and perpetual disqualification to its members, this House, by its action during the last session, exhausted its entire constitutional power over the question. In many of the States, in Tennessee, in Mississippi, in Georgia, and a number of other States, disqualifications perpetual in their nature are attached to certain crimes committed by members of Legislative Assemblies.

Now, sir, I ask any member of this House, who is willing to vote for a second expulsion, for a second punishment, to show me any law of the United States which disqualifies the people of the district represented by this gentleman from reflecting him after his expulsion from this House. The only instance known to our Constitution in which a perpetual disqualification attaches to an individual, is where a conviction has been had upon an impeachment.

Now, sir, I have before me Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, in which this whole question is reviewed, not only in regard to the powers of the General Government, but in regard to the powers of State governments depending upon their local laws and their constitutions; and the conclusion to which the author comes, upon the laws and constitutions reviewed, is found in these words:

"Expulsion from a former or from the same Legislative Assembly cannot be regarded as a personal disqualification, unless specially provided by law."

This power has been exerted in the British Parliament; but it was under a statute of Parliament annexing a disqualification to a member expelled, and who had been convicted of bribery; and some of our States have the same provision incorporated into their constitutions.

Now, sir, I voted at the last session of Congress for the expulsion of this member. I did so, sir, because I thought it was due to the dignity of the House. I did so, sir, because I thought that the punishment was just and righteous. I believe it yet. But, sir, I am not going to undertake to set up the doctrine that by reason of that expulsion, with no constitutional disqualification upon him—with no legal disqualification upon him—the people of his district had no right to reelect him and send him back.

Now, let me suppose a case. We had during the last Congress a case involving the reputation of a member from your State, [Mr. Brooks.] Suppose that a two-third vote could have been obtained for his expulsion from this Hall: would the Representatives from South Carolina, or any other State, affirm the doctrine that the expulsion, in the absence of a constitutional or legal disqualification, would have prevented the people of his district from sending him back here to represent them?

I do not regard myself, sir, as defending the member. I am defending the laws of this country. I am defending the Constitution. I am defending the popular rights of the people—their right to select their own Representatives when the Constitution gives them a right to do so. And to act upon this case again, and to resort to a process by which a second expulsion is to be made, would be, in my opinion, a most outrageous act of tyranny. I have no respect for the member; none whatever. But while I say this, I have respect for the Constitution and for the power of this House; and when I am called upon to give my vote, I shall give it regardless of consequences, and respond to the honest convictions of my own judgment, without regard to the meanest criminal that ever disgraced human nature.

Now, sir, it is said that if the election of this member had taken place subsequent to his expulsion, then, the people having passed upon it, the House would have been ousted of its jurisdiction. Why, sir, such a doctrine as that is absurd. Does the time when an election takes place change the law or affect the Constitution? No, sir; it cannot change the principle. But even if that were true, the letter upon which the conviction took place here, at the last session of Congress, was published and used in the canvass at which he was elected, prior to the last Congress.

But, as I have said, this whole question rests upon the fact of the qualification or disqualification of this member under the Constitution, or under some known law of the land.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think there is much force in some of the views which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] has presented; but I desire to call his attention to a point that is made in opposition to the views he has submitted. It is this: the offense having been committed by the member from New York after he was elected as a member of this House, does not that give the House jurisdiction? I do not suppose that the mere fact of the people passing upon the qualification of the member after the offense has been committed—by a reelection—changes the power or the duty of this House; but the fact that the member had been elected a member of this House before the offense (as is alleged) was committed, is claimed as giving jurisdiction to the House. I would like to hear the gentleman upon that precise point.

Mr. SEWARD. The question of jurisdiction is not affected by what the people may do, or by the time at which the election took place. The House of Representatives had jurisdiction over the question. They assumed that jurisdiction; they acted upon it; they applied the remedy; they administered the punishment; they expelled the member, and exhausted all their constitutional power. I ask the gentleman to show me some law of the United States, or some clause in the Constitution, which prohibits the people of that or any district in the United States from electing any man they may choose as their Representative in this House. I am looking to the law of the question. We do not know what questions may arise here hereafter. Some member of the House in the future may be expelled for some disorder, or for some act of personal violence committed on a member, and not affecting his honor at all; and if an expulsion is to attach as a permanent and perpetual disqualification, where will this doctrine lead to?

Mr. WINSLOW. I desire to ask my friend whether this member was expelled?

Mr. SEWARD. It is the same thing whether the resolution of expulsion passed or whether he resigned his seat to avoid it, and simply a resolution of censure was passed. He was convicted of the offense by the first resolution, and having disincumbered the House, if you will allow the expression, by his resignation, the House, I believe, did not vote to expel him, because it would have been an absurdity in itself.

Mr. STANTON. I think the gentleman will find, by reference to the Journal, that the House voted upon the resolution of expulsion, and passed it notwithstanding the resignation.

Mr. SEWARD. In one of these cases—I do not know which—a resolution of expulsion was passed, and not in the two other cases. But that does not affect this question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have before me the Congressional Globe. There were two branches of the resolution. The first was as follows:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of members of this House had associated themselves together, and pledged themselves each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof."

The second branch of the resolution was:

"That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, expelled therefrom."

Upon a motion to lay upon the table, it seems that a division was called for. The yeas and nays were called upon the first branch. The question was taken; and it was decided, upon the first branch, in the negative. So the House refused to lay that branch of the resolution upon the table. The question was then stated on the second resolution; and it was agreed to without a division. Mr. ORR moved to lay the final resolution on the table; which motion was agreed to. The House voted on the second resolution, and pro forma expelled him, and then laid the whole resolution on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky has correctly stated what occurred; but that does not affect the question at all.

I call the attention of the House to the law in relation to the power of legislative assemblies:

"This description of disqualifications results either from the doing of some act of a criminal nature, as, in Tennessee, dueling and bribery, and in Mississippi, denying the being of a God or a future state of rewards and punishments, or, from the conviction of some crime or offense, which by the Constitution alone, or the constitution and laws of a

State, is declared to be a ground of exclusion from a seat in the Legislature. In some of the States it is the commission of the crime which disqualifies; in others and the greater part, a conviction is also necessary. The offense which, more commonly than any other, is made a disqualification, is that of bribery in obtaining an office or appointment.

"Expulsion from a former or from the same legislative assembly cannot be regarded as a personal disqualification, unless specially provided by law."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will now read from the Journal. It seems that there were three resolutions in the case. I begin with the second resolution.

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together, and pledged themselves each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands unless they were paid for it, has falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House, and has proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof.

"And the question being put, Will the House agree thereto?"

"It was decided in the affirmative.

"So the second resolution was agreed to.

"Mr. WARNER moved that the votes by which the first and second resolutions were agreed to, be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

"The third resolution was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of this House from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, expelled therefrom.

"Pending which, on motion of Mr. ORR,

"Ordered, That the said resolution be laid on the table."

Mr. SEWARD. The law which I have laid down as being in force in this country was regarded as law in Great Britain up to the time of the passage of the British act of Parliament which now governs the matter. If gentlemen will take the trouble to look at Rogers's Law of Elections, they will find that the same principles are laid down as I have read from this book. But an act of Parliament was passed attaching permanent disqualification to members of the British Parliament who have been convicted of crime.

Now, if there is any trouble about this question, the fault is in our legislation. When this offense took place, and when the House of Representatives felt called upon to vindicate itself by arraigning those members before it for trial, if the crime was considered sufficient for their expulsion, and if their entire exclusion was intended to be carried out in the future, they should have passed a law classifying the crimes conviction for which should work perpetual disqualification. I now move to refer the preamble and resolution to a select committee of five.

Mr. STANTON. I am not yet prepared, Mr. Speaker, to vote for the expulsion or censure of a member for an offense committed against a former Congress. Although committees of the present House have been raised, with a view to inquire into the conduct of members of the past Congress, still I consider that their whole authority is limited to developing and disseminating before the public such corruptions as may have been practiced in that Congress. I do not consider myself bound, if any such developments are made, to vote for the expulsion of a member for offenses against a past Congress. I regard that as really a matter of secondary importance. The great object to be attained in all these congressional investigations is, that the public may be informed of the acts of their Representatives in their official capacity. But, sir, whether that be within the rightful power of the House or not, there is one thing to my mind perfectly clear. That is, that the House should keep within the spirit of the Constitution and the rule of the common law, and that no man should be twice tried and punished for the same offense. Now, whatever offense Mr. MATTESON may have been guilty of against the House of Representatives, he has already been arraigned, tried, convicted, and punished for it. Although we may not be strictly bound by the constitutional provision which is applicable to the courts of law, yet it seems to my mind that the spirit of that rule, and the principles of abstract justice, applicable to all proceedings, criminal and penal, of this character, are appropriate to the case before the House.

Therefore, for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on the question as to whether it will take jurisdiction of it, as to whether it will inquire into an offense that has been once inquired into, investigated, tried, and decided, I move that this resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that those who are not prepared to vote on the resolution can hardly be prepared to vote on that motion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion, and allow me to have the floor?

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman from Louisiana will renew it, I will yield.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. If the gentleman from Ohio desires me to renew his motion to lay on the table, I will do so; as, under the rules of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] will be entitled to make the closing speech.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay on the table, which would preclude any further debate.

Mr. STANTON. I will withdraw my motion unconditionally, and let the gentleman from Louisiana take the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the subject now presented for the consideration of the House is a grave one. It is one which has attracted the attention of the House at various periods during our national existence; and circumstances which are fresh in the recollection of all who were members of the last Congress, had the effect of directing the attention of many of us in a peculiar manner to it during the sessions of that Congress.

I happen to be one of those individuals who occupied such a position, that I was induced to investigate the subject for the purpose of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion in my own mind as to the power of the House. The conclusion which I then arrived at, the principles which I recognized in my own mind, and which I determined should be for the future the rule of my conduct, all operate upon me now; and before saying anything on the question, before entering into any argument on the principles involved, I wish simply to refer to the fact that in the proceedings had before the last Congress, in reference to the particular individual whose conduct is now before us, and in reference to other individuals, I was not to be found among those who voted for the expulsion of a member for any cause that was then set forth.

Mr. Speaker, the case before us is one of a character eminently fitted to secure a proper and fair decision upon this important question. The facts in it have long since transpired. The excitement which grew out of their disclosure has passed away. We are called upon in our legislative capacity to act on that question when our judgment is no longer clouded by the mist of passion, and when it can no longer be disturbed by the temporary excitement of the moment. I imagine there can be no doubt about the conduct of the person with respect to whom this question grows up. It is the universal opinion of the members of this House, as I presume it is of the citizens of the country, that he was guilty of conduct disgraceful to an American citizen, and which could not be for one moment tolerated in one who is to act as a representative of his fellows in the discharge of high legislative functions. But as important questions are often involved and often settled when action is invoked in respect to individuals whose conduct is admitted upon all hands to be unworthy, I propose now to pass away from the conduct of this person for the purpose of considering the question as to the right and the power we have, and the expediency of exercising any power over the subject-matter.

Mr. Speaker, legislative assemblies, according to my notion, have no inherent powers. There never was, nor can there be, a body which exercises, from its mere constitution, any power. The powers exercised by legislative bodies, with a view to enable them to discharge their appropriate functions, have in all instances been the result of convention. They have been conferred on them by law. That was the case in Great Britain, where we have the first instance of the existence of parliamentary bodies. It is true, sir, that when you attempt to examine into the historical records of Great Britain, you cannot go back to a period when you find the legislative enactments which conferred those powers; but you find, scattered through the whole system of British jurisprudence, unmistakable evidence that the decisions in relation to those subjects were, in all instances, the accustomed decisions of their judicial tribunals, and of their parliamentary assemblies, founded upon powers granted by the express will of the people, or governing power.

While it is not possible for us to reach the origin of those powers in the Parliament of Great Britain, while the origin of those powers is involved in darkness—the darkness of the ages of ignorance, the darkness of that period when there were no historical records which have come down to us—the process has gone on, if I may use the expression, under our own eyes in this Republic. When our fathers settled upon American soil, they brought with them the notions, the views, the principles, which had filled their bosoms while they were members of the political community which then occupied the island of Great Britain. What was the spectacle presented when they did settle and organize new political communities? If you refer to the history of the individual colonies, will you find that, when legislative assemblies were organized, those legislative assemblies proceeded to exercise the powers which are now believed to belong to legislative bodies? Did they exercise any power for protecting their members against violence, for the purpose of giving them security while they were transacting public business, as necessarily inherent in them? Not at all; but when you refer to the colonial records, you will find, in every instance, in proportion as the necessity for any particular protection was discovered, that protection was extended by legislation. In the various colonies, (and I have taken a great deal of pains to trace their history,) it will be found that, within a very few years after the organization of these different legislative assemblies, they provided the means of punishing individuals who should attempt to interfere with members in going to and returning from legislative assemblies. They provided means for punishing individuals who disturbed them for what they did in the course of the discharge of their public duty. This was universal with all of the colonies. The powers were the result of convention. They were the result of particular and special grants.

Now, the States which came into existence on the separation of the American colonies from the mother country, adopted constitutions, in which they embodied the then existing provisions of law in respect to these matters. When you refer to the first constitutions adopted by the States, you will discover that there was great diversity in the powers conferred by them upon the various legislative assemblies; as, for example, you will find that the State of Pennsylvania, under the constitution adopted at the time of its becoming a sovereign State, conferred upon its Legislature the power to expel for disorderly conduct alone. You will find the constitution of Maryland conferred the same power; and, in addition to it, conferred the power to expel for a great misdemeanor, but not a second time for the same offense. You will find that the constitution of the State of Georgia conferred the power to expel for disorderly conduct, or on conviction of an individual for an infamous crime. The constitutions of Massachusetts and New Hampshire contained no provisions giving the power to expel.

And now I would ask gentlemen who are to decide on the construction to be given to those great instruments of government, whether it will be pretended by any individual that the power to expel was the same in Pennsylvania, when the constitution gave the power to expel for disorderly conduct, that it was in Maryland, when, in addition to that power, the power was given to expel for a great misdemeanor? Will it be pretended that the same power existed in the State of Maryland which was conferred upon the Legislature of Georgia, when, in the constitution of Georgia, the power was given to expel for disorderly conduct, and in case of a conviction for an infamous crime? According to my notion, the plainest rules of construction make it certain that the provisions contained in the different constitutions, which were of various characters, gave different powers, and that each legislative assembly was restricted to the power which was specially conferred. Any other conclusion than this would stultify the framers of constitutions.

Mr. DAWES. I will refer the gentleman to a late decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts which may throw some light upon the subject. The constitution of Massachusetts contains no such provision.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I was speaking

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 56.

of the former constitution of Massachusetts, and not of the present one.

Mr. DAWES. The present constitution of Massachusetts contains no such provision. Within a few years the Legislature of Massachusetts has exercised that power, and their power has been contested before the supreme court of Massachusetts. I was interested in the gentleman's argument, and it may be a matter of curiosity to him to refer to the record of that matter. By referring to the opinion of the supreme court of Massachusetts, he will find that power fully discussed, and I think he will find that the opinion of the supreme court of Massachusetts conflicts somewhat with the opinion which the gentleman has now given.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. In respect to political questions, the people of the United States, in the various departments of the Government in which they exercise power, are supreme. The judicial authorities decide in regard to rights brought into contest in individual cases. Whatever might have been the decision of any court might be a matter of curiosity, and within the sphere of judicial action it would be entitled to and receive my respect; but it would not determine my course upon a question of this nature. This is a political question, and it must be decided by political bodies with reference to the great principles which regulate public rights.

I have referred to many of the provisions contained in the various constitutions of the various States directly after they ceased to be members of the great British Empire. I have alluded to the diversity between them; and I have insisted that it was in consequence of differences in their provisions; and that the powers existing in the various Legislatures were to be determined by the grants made to them by the people when they adopted these different State constitutions.

When the Constitution of the United States was framed we had these various constitutions in existence, and the people, who through their representatives were about to engage in the great work of constructing a new Government, were perfectly aware of the character of legislative assemblies; were perfectly aware of the accidents to which they were subjected, to the embarrassments and trammels which might be thrown about the members; of the importance of purity of conduct in members, as well as of giving them security and independence of action; and when they framed the Constitution, and determined the character of the legislative bodies to which the legislative power of the country was intrusted, they laid down in specific language the power which they vested in the two legislative bodies with respect to their own members. The Constitution of the United States, in section five, contains this clause:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceeding, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member."

My own opinion is, that all the power which was conferred on this House, or the other House of Congress, is to be derived from that particular clause, and that no other power exists but what is given directly in that clause, or results from it by necessary implication. Now, sir, the first thing which strikes us is the absence from the Constitution of the United States of any provision giving the right to expel for any other cause, except that growing out of disorderly conduct on the part of its members. This Government is one of limited powers. There is no power in the Constitution of the United States which is not the result of express delegation or which does not result necessarily by implication from some delegated power. In determining upon the power which should be vested in the two Houses of Congress, the representatives of the people, who were engaged in framing that great instrument, were jealous of conferring any more power than was necessary to attain the end aimed at. The only power really necessary was that of controlling its members, and compelling them to submit to the rules which the Houses, in their judgment, might find necessary for the proper prosecution of the public business. With respect to protecting themselves against external violence, that protection was to be derived from the legislative power of the two Houses, or from the action of the House, through its own officers to resist intrusion within its limits or to put an end to physical violence or disorder in its presence.

Now the question is as to the power to expel. It is said that legislative bodies have the power, in all instances, of expelling members who have disgraced themselves by infamous conduct, who have been guilty of conduct incompatible with the honest discharge of the trust confided to them, or who have committed criminal offenses. That is true with respect to the Parliament of Great Britain, because they have so declared it by their laws. That is true, too, in regard to the Legislatures of many of the States, because the power has been expressly conferred by their constitutions.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana if he holds that the power to expel, with the concurrence of two thirds, includes no other cause of expulsion than disorderly behavior, which he has mentioned?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. That is my conviction; and I will refer to something which shows that there has been previous action in one of the Houses of the American Congress that indicates the existence and recognition of that principle, and I will then proceed to show the necessity for acting upon it now.

Mr. STANTON. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he claims not only that the power does not exist by virtue of the Constitution to expel for any cause except disorderly conduct; but that Congress has no power under the Constitution to pass any law making any offense, except simply disorderly behavior, a cause for expulsion.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I go to that extent. I am perfectly persuaded that Congress cannot create any other cause of expulsion. I say it is not within the power of Congress to make any other rule. Now it is competent for this body to adopt any rules which it sees fit for the government of its proceedings. It can make those rules and prohibit its members from doing any act which, in their judgment, is of a character inconsistent with legislative purity, or which, in their judgment, is inconsistent with the propriety of legislative conduct, and make the violation of such rules a reason for expulsion.

The power of the House over this subject, in my view, is unlimited. They adopt the laws which are to govern in relation to that matter, and whatever, in the judgment of the House, would be a proper ground of expulsion, that they can determine for themselves and embody in their rules; because, so far as relates to the existence and action of this body, by the Constitution of the United States, the power of legislation over its members, as members, and to regulate and govern their conduct as members, is vested in the House, and that that power is exclusive.

Now, sir, with the permission of the House, I will proceed to show how I conceive that power is to be exercised, how it has been limited, and why it should be so.

Mr. STANTON. Does the gentleman hold that the term "disorderly behavior" excludes offenses committed beyond the halls of legislation, such as bribery, or an offense that may have been committed when Congress was not in session?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. No, sir.

I will now proceed to show why the different States have adopted different rules, so far as relates to the devolving of power upon legislative bodies to expel. The reason is that the power to expel is a delicate power. Under the theory of our Government, each constituency is to judge for itself of the qualifications and character of the individuals they may select to represent them; and, therefore, in different States they have looked upon this power as an extremely delicate one, and they have not conferred this power upon their legislative assemblies. If that power be a delicate one when it is to be applied to individuals belonging to the same

State, members of the same political sovereignty, how much more delicate does it become when it is a power to be applied in respect to individuals who come here, not merely as citizens of the United States, but who come here as the representatives of constituencies making a portion of communities possessed of sovereign power in their separate capacities as States?

Now, sir, I said that the sole power was vested in each House, that they were possessed of the exclusive power of determining upon what grounds this power should be exercised, because they were possessed of the exclusive power of establishing rules for the government of their members. I will, with the permission of the House, refer to one instance that is remarkable—one, perhaps, that may not have attracted the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] or any other individual who now hears me.

The Senate of the United States has as great power as the House of Representatives of the United States. They have power to expel in the same manner. That provision of the Constitution applies in the same degree to them. Now, it is known to all that the Senate of the United States is a body that not only exercises legislative functions, but that it discharges certain functions that are connected with the executive power of the country, and whilst they are engaged in the transaction of executive business, by the rules of the Senate, there is an injunction of secrecy. The rule prohibits any individual from making public anything that transpires in an executive session; and that injunction of secrecy exists, not only with respect to communicating anything which passes in executive session, but to the communication of any fact brought to their knowledge by executive communication made to them. A few years ago, when an important treaty was before the Senate, and whilst the Senate was still engaged in discussing questions growing out of the consideration of that treaty, surreptitiously, and in violation of the rules of the Senate, some member communicated a copy of that treaty to a person connected with one of our newspapers. That was an offense of as grave a character as could be perpetrated by any man discharging the functions of a Senator of the United States. What was the conduct of the Senate upon that occasion? Did they proceed to exercise the power of expulsion, which was given to them in the Constitution, for violating the rules of order? Not at all, sir. And the reason was, that although there was a rule of the Senate which prohibited any such disclosure, there was no rule of the Senate which declared that the penalty of such disclosure should be expulsion. But immediately after the occurrence of that case, immediately after the excitement had passed away which was consequent upon it, the Senate adopted rule 51, for the purpose of meeting that very contingency; they took the action which this House ought to take, and adopted a rule declaring what should be a ground of expulsion. I refer the House to rule 51 of the Senate, which was adopted upon that occasion, and which prescribes that—

"Any officer or member of the Senate convicted of disclosing for publication any written or printed matter, directed by the Senate to be held in confidence, shall be liable, if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and in the case of a member, to suffer expulsion from the body."

Now, Mr. Speaker, any other course of proceeding than that adopted by the Senate would, in my view, be in violation of every principle of good government; it would be a violation of every principle recognized in a republican system; it would be a violation of the most sacred rights of man and of the sacred right of the Representative. That the power exists of laying down rules, of prescribing laws, and of expelling members if they violate them, is perfectly certain; but that right, vested in the House, is to be exercised by established rules. The disorderly conduct, for which a member may be expelled, is the violation of the rules of order. Adopt any other construction than that, and you establish a tyranny; adopt any other construction than that, and you give to this House and to the other House an arbitrary power, depending upon the mere will of the majority—and that is tyranny; you give them power to create an offense after it has been committed, and to inflict punishment before the law has been laid down. The Apostle says that where there is no law there is no transgression; and that is a principle which obtains in politics and in the action of civil society, as it does in morals and religion.

Now, sir, I have detained the House longer than I had intended, but to my mind it seems clear, that this is a question of the greatest importance. It seems to me that it would be wrong—that it would be more than wrong; that it would be in violation of all true principle—for this House to proceed to act upon any such question until it has, by its rules, provided for the cases before they arise.

Now, what is the position of this person? So far as I know he has not been in his seat during this session. If he has been, he certainly has not placed himself within the public gaze. He has withdrawn himself because, so far as I can judge, from the manner of those around me, he is looked upon as a moral Pariah. If the House should act in the direction proposed in the resolution, what public advantage would be secured? The constituents of this gentleman will have an opportunity, in November next, of passing sentence upon him for themselves. I have no doubt that they will visit him with the most exemplary punishment. I have no doubt that when the month of November shall have passed by, it will be found that he will have died a political death. Then, I ask, what public advantage is to be obtained in taking the action proposed? According to my view it would be a dangerous precedent, because it would imply a determination on the part of this House to punish as a crime over which the House has jurisdiction, an act which the House had not before declared should be considered a crime; because it would be visiting with a penalty an act which, when it was done, was not by the House regarded as an offense against its rules of order.

Under these circumstances I, for one, am opposed to all action. I, for one, am in favor of laying the resolution on the table, with a view to have the House, hereafter, embody in its rules a provision which will provide for cases of this kind.

Mr. GIDDINGS. For the reasons assigned by my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] for delay in this case, I desire immediate action upon it. I desire that the House shall act to-day efficiently and conclusively on the resolution. The people of that district have a right to be represented on this floor. I speak not of the guilt or innocence of the accused; but his absence from this Hall, as noted by the gentleman from Louisiana, shows to me conclusively that he ought not to be here. Neither the sickness of a wife, nor the death of a partner, nor the illness of children or family or friends, can exempt a man elected by his constituents from the duty of attending in his place here.

Now, I desire that the majority of the House should act one way or the other. I am opposed to the motion of my friend to refer this case. Let it be decided at once. I will not argue the law. I do not believe that it would be prudent for me to enter into such argument. I only wish to say, I desire that the majority shall take this case into their own hands; and I hope that no member on this side of the House will throw himself in the way of executing judgment, or of delaying the establishment of a precedent which will govern us all, and our successors in coming time. I invoke the majority to establish just such a precedent as they desire, and we will carry it out.

I merely rose to say that I rejoice that this portion of the House commenced a system of purifying this body which was never introduced into it before the Republicans obtained possession of it. I rejoiced most heartily that my friend [Mr. KELSER] brought in his resolution of investigation. He did so after consultation with me. It was because we then had the power over our own friends. I rejoiced when I saw my own intimate friends coming up to the work and letting the ax descend upon their own particular associates. It was one of the proudest moments of my life. I now implore them to maintain the position which they have taken; and now upon the opposite party rests the responsibility.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not propose to enter at length into a discussion of the expediency of voting the expulsion of the member from New York whose name is mentioned in the resolution. But I do propose to submit a few observations in regard to the power and the jurisdiction of the House. The proposition before the House is to expel that member. I conceive, sir, that over him the House has absolute jurisdiction. But such is the importance of the question involved, that it is meet and proper that the House should approach it with due deliberation, and in a frame of mind eminently judicial. I am gratified to perceive from the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD,] and of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] that they are opposed to the assumption of any doubtful power by this House; and, sir, I regret that the action of the House during the present session has not in all cases been characterized by that deliberation. I allude to the fact that at this moment a citizen of the United States, who has no right to be heard on this floor, is now incarcerated in a dungeon over the votes of a respectable minority of this body, and put there under a gag; the proceedings against whom I avail myself of this opportunity to enter my solemn protest.

Mr. STANTON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether he thinks the minority should have the power to put the gag on the majority?

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say that the minority had that power. I say that this man was imprisoned over the vote of a respectable minority of this body, and that it was done under the previous question, moved by the gentleman from Ohio. Permit me to say that the motion to lay this resolution upon the table, and thereby cut off all discussion on this important question, was inappropriate and in ill-keeping with the remarks which the gentleman from Ohio himself submitted to-day.

This resolution has been before this House for more than one month. It is the special order for this day. Every member of this body must have had his attention more or less directed to this question. I presume that almost every member of this body has some opinion on the subject, as to the power of the House to expel a member. For my part, I desire to say here that my opinions on that question are fully made up; but I am not prepared to vote for the resolution in its present form; and, therefore, I hope to see it modified; and for that purpose, before I close my remarks, I will submit a motion to refer it to what I conceive to be the proper committee—the Committee on the Judiciary.

But as to the power of the House. Why have we not the power to expel the member from New York? Because it is alleged that he committed offenses which were passed upon by a previous Congress. There is a very memorable instance bearing, to some extent, on this question—"the Middlesex election," where Mr. Wilkes was expelled by one Parliament, reelected, and refused permission to take his seat in following Parliaments.

Mr. SEWARD. Did the gentleman ascertain that that was done on an existing British statute, which affixed a permanent disqualification?

Mr. HUGHES. I did not.

Mr. SEWARD. That is the fact.

Mr. HUGHES. The result of that controversy was, and the precedent was fully established, that an expulsion from one Parliament did not render a man ineligible to a seat in another. That was the point which was decided. It was never decided that a subsequent Parliament had not the power to expel a man, in its discretion. It was maintained that the vote of expulsion absolutely disqualified the member from sitting in a subsequent Parliament; and it has never been decided, to my knowledge, that a man may not be expelled by two legislative bodies for the same offense, though it would be unjust, and in contravention of the settled principles of jurisprudence in this country.

Sir, what are the facts in this case? The member whom it is proposed to expel, was charged with certain offenses by a Congress of which he was a member. After a full investigation, he was found sufficiently implicated to justify a committee of that House in reporting a resolution for his expulsion. He evaded that resolution by a voluntary resignation. Whether the resolutions were subsequently passed, at a time when he was no longer a member of that body or not, I humbly conceive has little to do with the question before the House, because the bar of a former conviction technically does not interpose itself if he had voluntarily severed his connection with Congress and evaded the resolution. He placed himself beyond their reach voluntarily. He did it, no doubt, purposely. He withdrew himself out of the jurisdiction of the body. The punishment, then, except in a moral aspect, was never visited on him. The legal bar, then, does not exist; and the question which presents itself to this House is simply this: ought he to sit as a member of this body? Has his conduct been such as, in the judgment of this House, acting judicially, disqualifies him for a seat upon this floor? Then when it comes to that question, judging from the expressions of opinion which have been made by gentlemen on both sides of this House, I apprehend there will be great unanimity. It seems to be a conceded fact, a matter beyond controversy, that the member from New York is regarded as having forfeited his right to the respect of his associates, and his usefulness as a member of this body. No legal bar interposes itself between him and the action of this House.

I say, then, that the question of power is clear. The question of expediency alone remains on the question whether he ought to be expelled or not. I do not know what opinions others may entertain; but for my part, I believe, if the proposition were before me, unexceptionable in its form, I would vote, as a matter of justice to the House, and the constituents of that member, in favor of his expulsion. But, sir, I will not vote for that resolution in its present form, because I do not think it places the case upon its true ground, or upon as strong ground as it can be placed upon. For that reason I desire to see this resolution go to the Committee on the Judiciary, that they may examine the subject, report their views on the question of power and the question of expediency, and that they may present the proposition in a proper form. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who last addressed the House, feels disposed to dedicate himself to the work of purification; and he boasts that that work has been inaugurated by the party with which he acts. I wish to make no issue with the gentleman on that question; but, sir, I leave it for history to declare which party upon this floor has created the necessity for that work of purification. I am in favor of purification in reference to those matters concerning which this House has jurisdiction. I believe this House has jurisdiction of this matter, and therefore the appeal of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] comes with full force to the majority of this House, to define their position upon this question, and to take the responsibility of action here.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to explain what I said. I meant nothing more than to allude to the fact that they have the power, and that they should feel the responsibility of disposing of this case.

Mr. HUGHES. I say the appeal was just.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I meant nothing offensive.

Mr. HUGHES. I approve of the gentleman's remark, and I hope the majority will take it home to themselves, and will not evade the question.

Mr. SEWARD. Have the Administration a majority in this Hall?

Mr. HUGHES. I suppose the Administration have a majority upon all questions but one; and I rather think, sir, that when the final vote is taken, they will have it upon that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine his remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I was only answering the question propounded by the gentleman from Georgia.

But, sir, I say that when this House is so careful to proceed prudently, and with a due regard to the Constitution, in this matter, I hope they will not proceed so slowly as to present the spectacle to the people of this country of permitting a member, convicted of corruption, over whom we have jurisdiction, and whom self-condemnation has banished from a seat in this Hall, without the judgment of the House, to sit in this Hall, and that, too, while the House proceeded, in hot haste, to incarcerate a private citizen upon a question of very doubtful jurisdiction. While we have a citizen of this country in jail for having been, perhaps, a collaborer with the member from New York in the work of corrupting legislation in the last Congress, this House, sir, owes it to itself to act with all becoming speed that is consistent with justice in dealing with that member himself. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to submit a few remarks to the consideration of this House; and I take occasion to say that I trust that there will be no parties in the consideration of this question. I trust that members from all sides will come up to its consideration with candor and judgment, and will pass upon it in a manner that becomes their duty to themselves and their country. I mean not to know party; and so meaning, I shall have no reference to parties in the views I shall present upon this subject.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I wish to say that in the remarks I made, I only intended to take the ground that the postponement of this matter depended upon the majority; that they having the majority could act one way or the other, as they choose. I had no idea of embarrassing any one. On the contrary, I shall vote unhesitatingly.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. During the last Congress, when this body was engaged in the consideration of a question connected with this matter, I will say that the House evinced a most commendable earnestness in purging itself of those who appeared to be obnoxious to the proper judgment of the House. I will say that neither party evinced any hesitation in doing what became them. It was my fortune, upon that occasion, to offer a resolution as a substitute for the report of the committee in reference to one member, which substitute was happily adopted; and I must express my surprise, therefore, that in the face of such conduct upon the part of the last House, the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who was a member then, should have intimated to the country and to this House that we acted under the influence of passion and prejudice.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. The gentleman will remember that in that Congress we acted not only upon this class of cases, but upon the cases of Brooks, Kerr, and Edmundson.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We are dealing now with this particular question. The question is, what was the conduct of the House upon this case, and this particular class of cases? I say the House evinced no passion and no unbecoming prejudice whatever. My opinion is, and I say it with pleasure, without reference to anybody, that there was a prompt and decided disposition to expel from this Hall men who were shown to be unworthy of association here. As to those other cases to which the gentleman referred, they are not before us, and I did not imagine they were in the mind of the gentleman while indulging in remarks upon this class of cases. The question, it seems to me, is a very simple one. The last Congress did pass a resolution such as that which I have before me now, bearing upon this particular member to whom the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois refers; and he acknowledged the truthfulness, as I conceive, of that report of the committee, by resigning his seat with a view to avoid the judgment of the House. Such was the strength of the conviction of that House against him, and so unwilling were they, even after his resignation, to permit him to go free, that they took up and passed the resolution which is referred to in the preamble to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois. And the question comes up now, whether a member thus expelled from this Hall, by his own confession of his guilt, and by the actual judgment of this House upon one of the resolutions they adopted, and which was reported against him, can come here and take his seat with us, as his peers, and represent a portion of the sovereign people of this country.

The learned gentleman from Louisiana has given us an argument upon this subject which I must respectfully submit is of a curious character. The gentleman says that no legislative body has inherent powers. I am opposed to the whole doctrine of inherent powers beyond what is clearly and indispensably legitimate, and I beg leave to call the attention of the House to that clause of the Constitution which bears upon this subject:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member."

Does not that clause of the Constitution imply, necessarily, inherent powers? Can, sir, that grant of power be executed by this House without the necessary investigation, without the necessary examination?

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member."

Does that not imply that this House has a right to exercise all of that class of inherent powers requisite to give effect and influence to this clause of the Constitution? But the gentleman says that there is no power to expel a member, except for disorderly conduct; that, no matter what may be the debasement of the conduct of members of this House, no matter what its atrocity, the Constitution gives power to expel for disorderly conduct, but does not give power to expel for murder, felony, or other misdemeanor. Such an argument, it seems to me, is utterly unsound, and proves itself so by the very curiosity of the conclusion to which it leads. I will not, of course, use a discourteous term; but the gentleman says that the power to expel for these graver offenses is to be found in the first clause of this section; that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; and that, under that power, you may provide for the expulsion of members who are guilty of these enormous offenses. The Constitution, according to that gentleman's argument, specifies that you may expel a member for disorderly conduct, but leaves it to the rules of the House to provide for expulsion for graver offenses. That argument, sir, is not sound, it seems to me, and cannot seriously command the attention of this House.

This clause of the Constitution is divided into three parts. "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." That is an independent power, embracing, manifestly, independent subjects, having no reference whatever to the conduct of members. It then goes on as follows: "may punish its members for disorderly behavior." I say that it was not contemplated by the Constitution that a member should be expelled for disorderly behavior. He is to be punished in such manner as such conduct deserves, according to the judgment and discretion of the House.

But the clause goes on: "and with the concurrence of two thirds may expel a member." It does not require two thirds to punish a member for disorderly behavior. No, a majority may do that, but you cannot exercise so grave a power as that of driving from this Hall the Representative of a portion of the sovereign people of this Union, unless it commands the concurrence of two thirds of this House. I mention these things for the consideration of the House. And now the question comes up: what ought to be our course in reference to this subject? The gentleman from Ohio, over the way, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who, I believe, is the oldest member upon this floor, has rightly said that the people of Mr. MATTESON's district have a right to be represented here. I say so too, and if they are not represented it is our duty, if we can properly do so, to give them an opportunity to be represented. It is now within our power to do so.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] said very strangely, as it seemed to me, that he would not act in this case because the member has not shown his face here during the present session. I cannot understand the weight of that argument, and so have no power to answer it. It seems to me the fact that being a Representative of the people, this member has totally neglected the duty of attendance here, only aggravates the offense.

What, then, sir, ought we to do? As I understand this doctrine, it is the right and power, and duty of this House, to expel a member for proper cause. The power is unqualified, and it would seem to be absolute, but it is controlled by those high and commanding considerations which are presumed to surround the action of this House. We will expel, but only expel for good and sufficient cause; not because there may be an arbitrary majority here in favor of it, but because it is right that it should be done. In this particular case, this member retired from his seat in this Hall during the last Congress, but he did not do so until after he had been reelected a member of the present Congress. Whilst it is our duty to keep ourselves from improper association with impure and unworthy men, as far as we can legitimately do it, it is, sir, a right which, once asserted, will be asserted until the people whose Representative the member may claim to be, shall have had an opportunity to pass upon his conduct. What was the fact in this case? After Mr. MATTESON was expelled, you may say, from the House, he did not go home and get the judgment of his people upon his conduct. No, sir; he had been previously elected to this Congress. The people reelected him in utter ignorance of the conduct which caused him to be driven from this floor, and they have had no opportunity whatsoever, to manifest their opinion of that conduct; and, sir, we are not to presume that a portion of the sovereign people of this Union would elect a member to this House whom this House would unite in expelling from it. At any rate, until they have had an opportunity to do so, it does seem to me that it is due, not to ourselves alone, but due to the people who are more immediately interested in this matter, that we should act upon this case.

I understand it to be the doctrine of the parliamentary law—the doctrine which has been settled in England—that until the people have had an opportunity to pass upon the conduct of the obnoxious member, the body of which he is a member have power to expel him, and should exercise it. He is, by the judgment of this House at least, unworthy to be associated with us here.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will, sir, certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. Can the people, by electing at a subsequent election, a man who has been expelled, deprive this House of its constitutional power to act in the case; or would the subsequent election cure the defect in the man's character so that we should admit him?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have already said enough upon that subject. I say that when this House drive from their association an unworthy member, whose unworthiness has been developed by a proper investigation, they manifest their sense of the character of the member upon whose case they act; and when he goes home to the people, if the people choose to reelect him, they purify him so far as we are concerned. Such are the English precedents, and such is the reason of the thing. If you can suppose it possible that a hundred thousand of the American people will reelect a man who is obnoxious to the moral sense of the House of Representatives; will reelect a man whose guilt has been manifested to the country; then, sir, if they do that, theirs is the immediate interest. We can keep him from affiliation with us; we can keep him away from us as we would leprosy, or anything else profoundly obnoxious; but if they choose to have such a Representative, theirs is the immediate responsibility. This has been the construction in England, as I understand, though I have not looked into this question for years. It is the proper construction here. It is bowing to the will of the sovereign people in the untrammelled exercise of their right to select a Representative. It would be dangerous doctrine, indeed, that would undertake even to trammel the right of the people to a fair election after they knew all the objections to the individual whom they elected to represent them. I have no passion on the subject; none in the world. I have no purpose to gratify or subserve, except such as is connected with my duty. We are bound to take notice of the public action of Congress; we are bound to take notice of the popular action in elections; we know the facts that are referred to; we know that our predecessors in effect expelled this man; we know that his reelection took place before such expulsion; we know that his constituents acted in ignorance of his conduct; and I say that it is our duty to our predecessors and to the country to drive from our midst this individual. If the people choose to reelect him, I shall be willing that he shall take his seat, because it is their right to have a Representative here.

I repeat, this is the election doctrine that has been settled in many cases. It is the one that imposes necessary restrictions on our action under the broad power given by the Constitution. This is not restriction, to be sure. It is the moral rule; and has the force of authority and precedent which we must recognize.

These are the views that I entertain, and having submitted them, I cheerfully leave the question. I would add, however, before I take my seat, that I am for the most deliberate inquiry. I will go cheerfully for its reference to a select, or to any other committee. I will not act in hot or indecent haste. It is due to our dignity, it is due to the people whom we are bound to suppose this man does not properly represent, to act definitely and calmly on this subject, in order to settle the matter, and fix a precedent to control the House in future.

Mr. NICHOLS. When this resolution was submitted, a few weeks ago, I made up my mind that there were questions involved in it which required careful consideration on the part of those who are to act as judges. At that time the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD,] whose this morning made his motion to refer the whole matter to a select committee, moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire and report on the power of the House in this particular case. In my judgment, sir, that motion should have prevailed. I believe now that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, should prevail. I am not clear in my own mind that this House has the power again to expel. I use the term "again to expel," because every gentleman who has discussed the question assumes that the resolutions adopted by the last House were virtually an expulsion of the gentleman from New York; and, Mr. Speaker, who doubts it? After the two first resolutions had been adopted, and when it was apparent that the third would be adopted, the gentleman from New York voluntarily withdrew from the jurisdiction of the House to evade its adoption. After all that, does any gentleman doubt that the action of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fourth Congress was virtually an expulsion of the gentleman from New York.

The gentleman from Virginia who last spoke, [Mr. SMITH,] has said that it was a virtual expulsion. I was not able to catch all that fell from the lips of the gentleman, but I understood him to invoke the action of the House on the resolution, and to ask it to again proceed to expulsion. He acknowledged that we have expelled the gentleman from New York, in effect.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I did say that he resigned to evade the judgment of the House, and that that was equivalent to expulsion. But allow me to say to the gentleman from Ohio, that he had better go upon the record than upon my inferences.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not think that I misrepresented the gentleman from Virginia. I understood him to say that the action of the last House was equivalent to expulsion. I so deemed it. I so construed the action of the House. I believe that the moral effect on the country was the same as if the House had passed a deliberate resolution of expulsion. But I do not think that I misapprehended the argument of the gentleman, when he spoke so feelingly and so eloquently of the virtue that should be cultivated here; and of the action which the House should take in reference to the member from New York, whose case is now before us. I understood his argument to point to another expulsion.

Mr. Speaker, it was well said by the gentleman from Georgia this morning, that this House exercised a double jurisdiction over its members. It exercises a civil jurisdiction and it exercises a criminal jurisdiction. Which was the jurisdiction exercised in the last Congress over the gentleman from New York? It was the criminal jurisdiction of the House. It was the power of the House, conferred by the Constitution, to punish a member—not only to punish, but it was the cumulative power conferred in the same section of the Constitution, that the House might not only punish in a particular form, but that it might, for cause, expel a member. Sir, we had that cause stated. We had the case in court. We had a trial by a fair and impartial committee of investigation. We had a discussion on their report and on the testimony, in the House itself.

I believe the trial was a fair one, and on it punishment was awarded, precisely as the gentleman from Virginia says it was awarded—in effect, the expulsion of the member. Now, what does expulsion involve? I know not what consideration other men may place upon it, but before God and man, I would rather be arraigned, and condemned to any physical punishment than be subjected to that.

If my apprehension of the question be correct, then expulsion is the highest punishment that can be inflicted on an honorable man. And yet, the gentleman from Virginia, by his argument, indicates that, having tried, having judged, and having punished, we should carry retribution further and punish again for the same offense. I protest against it in the name of justice; I protest against it in the name of fairness. I ask gentlemen, whether, after the power of the House to punish for an offense has been exercised, they are prepared to go further, and violate a fundamental rule of the criminal law of the land by again punishing for the same offense? Gentlemen may flatter themselves that it is shielding and vindicating the dignity of the House. Let us examine that question, Mr. Speaker.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] submits a case which he declares to be a case in point. I have that case now before me, and I have strangely misconceived the action of the British Parliament in the matter, or the gentleman from Indiana has. I understand him to say that the power of the people to reelect, or that the rights of sovereign power, lying behind the representative capacity, are held in a sort of abeyance here; that the British Parliament, or rather the House of Commons, had never decided in any case, that they had no power to expel a member twice for the same offense; or, in other words, after an expulsion and reelection of the party expelled, that they did not declare that they had not the power to again expel him for the offense for which he had been originally expelled. The decision to which the gentleman alluded does not bear the interpretation which he has placed upon it. If it does, then I misapprehend the force of the English language. I will read the decision. It is as follows:

"In the case of Middlesex, 1769, the proceedings were as follows:

"3d February.—Mr. Wilkes was expelled for being the author of a libel on the House. A new writ was issued, when he was reelected.

"17th February.—Upon this return, the House resolved that, inasmuch as he had been, in that session, expelled the House, he was incapable of being elected to serve in that Parliament; that his election was void; and they ordered a new writ.

"17th March.—Mr. Wilkes having been again elected without opposition, the House avoided his election, ordering a new writ as before.

"Mr. Wilkes was a third time elected, and returned.

"14th April.—Upon this last election and return, the House resolved that both were null and void.

"And on the 15th April they resolved that Mr. Luttrell ought to have been returned, he having been a candidate with Mr. Wilkes at the last election.

"25th April, a petition was presented; on the 8th May it was heard; after the hearing it was resolved that Mr. Luttrell is duly elected.

"But, on the 3d May, 1782, the House ordered the above-mentioned vote of the 17th February to be expunged, as unfit to remain on their journals."

Being subversive of what? Of the privileges of members sitting upon that floor? No, sir; but referring to a higher tribunal than that: "Being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom." That is the point. Now, Mr. Speaker, I look upon the action of the Commons in that particular as decisive of the one great question, that when the power of the people is exercised, that when they return a member to this floor, the action is theirs. The right to be represented by that member is theirs, absolutely, unqualifiedly. Unless for some reason then preferred against him, or some cause then set down for trial against him, the House cannot, under the power which has been granted to it, expel him—not for a reason which occurred in any other House; not for a reason which occurred at an antecedent period, and which had already been determined; but for a reason to be presented against him there, then, and at that time, tried and adjudged.

This is the view, sir, which I take of this question. I am in favor of the reference to the Judiciary Committee—not believing, however, that the report from that committee will change the view I entertain on this question—not at all, sir; but in order that some law may be framed, which may define the limits and jurisdiction of this power—this power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, and which needs to be administered in justice and in mercy. I wish the rules of law to prevail, the manner of punishment to be pointed out, and its duration limited by a fixed rule. I do not choose, sir, that it shall rest with the arbitrary will of a majority.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from Ohio. Will he allow an obnoxious member of this House to escape its judgment and the judgment of subsequent Houses by a ruse, by resigning his seat? The gentleman will see that it would make it probable for the vilest malefactor to obtain a seat here in that way.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will answer the gentleman's question. He says to me: "Will you allow a member, by a ruse, by resigning his seat on this floor, to evade expulsion?" I will reply to the gentleman in his own language. He has said: "You have virtually expelled this man, and his resignation was no ruse by which he evaded the punishment of the House, for he has been subjected to all the disgrace of an expulsion." I hope the gentleman is answered.

I have but one word further to say. I desire some law on this subject further than the simple provision in the Constitution. I desire that this power may be limited by legislation, that it shall be exercised in a particular manner. I wish it placed upon the statute-book, so that members may know at once what are their rights. I find it declared in the Constitution that this House may punish its members for disorderly behavior; and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member. Let me put a case to the gentleman from Virginia. He says that, after a member has been virtually expelled, we may again turn him from this floor. Without any law on this subject, without the jurisdiction of the House being pointed out, or anything of the kind, I will ask whether we may not have the same power the gentleman claims to turn him from the floor because his political opinions are not in accordance with those of a majority of this House? It is the naked exercise of power that the gentleman claims shall be applied to the member from New York to-day.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I trust the gentleman does not, and will not, impute to me any such unworthy mode of action. I would not drive any man from this floor as a question of power, that was not also a question of justice. Let this man give the people a chance to decide. He would not give our predecessors a chance to pass on him, and he will not give his constituents a chance to pass judgment on him.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman from Virginia and I will have no quarrel about that. I can only say, (and it is not for me to control the conduct of any other member,) that were I in the place of the member from New York, notwithstanding the opinions I have stated on the legal status of the case, I would have stood the test of the resolution of expulsion. If I believed myself innocent, I would have gone before the people for justification. That would have been my course. That he is not here now with their approval, is not for me to inquire into. I argue as to the power of the House to do a particular thing which we propose to do. My only view has been as to the power. I am not the advocate of the member from New York; I do not justify the course which he has deemed it his duty to pursue in this case. A man, whether right or wrong, when he has made up his mind, should do that boldly which he is resolved to do, and not shufflingly.

A word now in reference to one other point, and I have done. I want this question referred. I want a report on it from some responsible committee of this House, which shall point out the line of policy to be pursued in this respect hereafter. And why? Sir, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] has told us why. You have now a citizen of the United States confined in the jail of this District, herding, perhaps, with common criminals—I cannot say as to that, nor do I propose to say anything about the abstract justice of his condemnation; but I say this: that hereafter, when a man goes to jail for a contempt, or a violation of any law, I want to see a rule prescribing the offense on which he goes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I think, perhaps, there has been as much of the time of the House consumed upon this subject as a majority of its members desire.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Illinois intends to move the previous question, I ask him to allow me to make a single remark or two upon this subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make a remark in consequence of the position in which this matter has been placed. The gentleman from Illinois moved a resolution to expel the gentleman from New York. A motion, I understand, is now pending, to refer that resolution to a select committee. Now, sir, I wish to vote against that reference, and to vote for the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois to expel the gentleman from New York, not as a punishment to that gentleman, but as a justification and purification of this House. And, sir, I would vote to expel him every Congress as long as I may be here, if his constituents, or those in his district, should reflect and send him back. I believe the proof taken and reported at the last Congress has demonstrated that he is disqualified to sit as a member of the American Congress; and I will always, when it is in my power, vote to exclude him from this House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, resumed the floor.

Mr. READY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield me the floor a moment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. READY. I desire to say that I regard this as a very important question, involving not only the rights of the member in question, but those of his constituents, whose interests he represents upon this floor. It is desirable that the early action of this House should be had upon the question of his right to continue a member of this body, and that such a course should be pursued as would bring about the earliest possible action upon that subject. Now I want to say, in connection with this remark, that the proposition made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] if adopted, is not likely to produce as speedy action of the House as I think is desirable. The Committee on the Judiciary is now, and has been for a considerable length of time, daily engaged in the examination of a subject of paramount importance to this, or any other question which will probably come before that committee during the present Congress. The whole of their time, when the House is not in session, has been, and will continue to be for almost an indefinite period, occupied with that investigation; and hence it will be impossible, as I conceive, for that committee to give this subject the careful, deliberate, and speedy investigation which its importance demands. Believing that a reference to a select committee will be likely to produce the desired result with as much satisfaction to the House as a report from the Judiciary Committee would, I think it would be wisdom upon the part of the House to vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana to send it to the Judiciary Committee, and send it to a special committee, or make such other disposition of it as they may deem proper.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] to allow me to put my position right before the House, as I am a new member, and had no part in this matter in the last session.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not myself expect to occupy much time, and as I intend to call the previous question and close the debate, I will allow the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. CURTIS. This whole matter comes before Congress at this time, as the proceedings of a former Congress. It seems to be conceded on both sides of this House, by all parties, that the member whose case is before us has been considered unworthy of association with a former Congress. He has not removed the taint which rests upon him. It was in his power to have gone before his constituents, to have appealed to them, and to have obtained from them, so far as lay in their power, a release from the odium which rests upon him. He has not seen proper to do that. He escaped, perhaps, a portion of the blow intended for him at the last Congress, by a resignation. He has done nothing since to relieve himself of that odium; and as a member of this Congress, and not of the other, if he was unworthy of association there, he is unworthy here. Taking this matter as conceded, that he was unworthy, as a member of this Congress, I conceive it my duty to vote against him here; and notwithstanding the legal argument of the gentleman from Ohio, that we are punishing a man twice for the same offense, I shall vote to exclude the member from New York from this Hall, solely upon the ground that he is considered as unworthy of associating with us. And also, for self-preservation, self-consideration, and self-respect, I shall vote against him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is very easy, Mr. Speaker, to start objections to any proposition that may be made here; but in this case it is quite as easy to sustain the proposition that is advanced as it is to make objection to it.

One gentleman objects to the resolution which I introduced because it is not drawn in language that suits him exactly; its points are not presented in that strong, terse, expressive manner which meets his approbation; by a better adjustment of the nouns and verbs, and pronouns and adverbs, it could be placed in a shape that would meet his approbation and induce him to vote for it; he is for the principle enunciated in the resolution, for the object which it seeks to accomplish, with all his heart; but the arrangement of the language does not meet with his approbation, and therefore he cannot vote for the resolution.

Another gentleman is extremely anxious to do justice; thinks the member was properly expelled from the last Congress; but he is opposed to punishing a man twice for the same offense. He starts divers objections to this mode of proceeding, and thinks that it would be a great outrage upon the constituency of the member, and the exercise of injustice on the part of the House.

Now, sir, in the first place, if this were a punishment, it is not a punishment twice for the same offense; but in no sense is it a punishment for a crime. The Constitution allows us to punish a member by a majority vote; but when you come to expel a member, it is not looked upon in the light of a punishment; it is looked upon as an act which is to be performed for the purification of the House; for the vindication of its honor and its purity, and to drive an obnoxious member from the Hall. The punishment of a member does not drive him from the Hall. He can remain here if he chooses to do so, and continue in the performance of his duties. But when you come to exercise the great function of expelling a member, you refer him back to his constituents, and he has no longer any powers to exercise here. The act is performed, not in a spirit of vengeance against the party, but for the high purpose of purifying the body and removing any imputation which might rest upon its action and upon its character, if parties tainted with crime and reeking with corruption should be allowed to retain their seats here.

Mr. OLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, the answer to which will, to some extent, control my vote upon this matter. Can the gentleman point the House to any case in which a legislative assembly has punished one of its members for an offense committed against a prior legislative assembly?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if that question was involved in this case, I would answer it. But the party did not simply commit an offense against this body. I received no personal offense. You, sir, received no personal offense. The members composing the body received no personal offense. But there was a great public outrage perpetrated. It was not the House, but it was the majesty of the people of the country that this House represents, which was assailed. It was not the function of the House punishing its member for having been guilty of corrupt practices here; but the House was purifying itself from a loathsome excrement which did not deserve a place here. It was not simply the punishment of an offense. I thought I had disposed of this question of the punishment of an offense before. You may, by a majority vote, punish a man for an offense; but here was a great public outrage committed.

Mr. OLIN. Allow me one further remark. It seems to me that the gentleman does not answer my question at all. I do not understand that this House has general jurisdiction over offenses at large. It must be an offense against this House—against its dignity or interfering with its legislation—and not an offense against the country generally, that this House can take cognizance of. And therefore, if it was not an offense against a former House, why, we certainly have no jurisdiction of it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think I understand the object of the gentleman. His inquiry is based upon his own opinion, which I consider entirely erroneous. He says that the House cannot expel a member except for offenses against its own dignity and character; and starting off with that as his proposition, then it follows, of course, that if a member has not offended against the dignity of the House, the House cannot expel him.

Mr. OLIN. I made the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. I supposed that, as he had the matter in charge, he would communicate to the House information showing that we have authority to act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will endeavor to do so, if the gentleman will let me do it. The gentleman puts the inquiry to me, whether I have ever known a case where a member was punished in one Congress for an offense committed in a prior Congress? I cannot state to him that I do know of any such case, because I do not know that there has ever been a case like this presented. If there had ever been such a case presented, and action had been refused, on the ground that the offense was committed against a prior Congress, that could be cited as a precedent against me; but there is merely the absence of a precedent.

Now, I will tell the gentleman what I can prove to him. He will find, in the case of the expulsion of Mr. Blunt, of Tennessee, from the Senate, that it was for an offense committed in the State of Tennessee, for certain letters written. It was not an offense against the dignity of the House of which he was a member, committed either in its presence or in its place of session; but it was for an offense committed in a remote part of the country. That case was decided in 1799, and was decided mainly upon a letter written by him on the 21st of April, 1797, in the State of Tennessee. He was expelled from the Senate by a vote of 25 to 1. The offense was not even committed during the session of Congress—I am not sure that it was even committed during his term; but it was certainly committed before he had taken his seat in the Senate, before he had been sworn in as a member of that body, and before he was amenable to its jurisdiction. That case, I think, is near enough to satisfy the gentleman, if the decision of the Senate is any authority with him, that there is power to punish for corruption.

Mr. OLIN. Will the gentleman inform the House whether that was not a case of an offense—to wit, an attempt at bribery—committed against the Senate that undertook to punish the member?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It was so alleged; and this is just such a case. The resolutions that we passed in this case in the last Congress put it expressly on the ground that he attempted to corrupt members of this House.

Mr. OLIN. Of the last House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman need not balk on the position. I will bring him to the junction directly. The resolution directly stated that as one of the grounds for which the resolution of expulsion was introduced—for corrupt practices in connection with the legislation of Congress.

I see the point where all this opposition rests. It is contended that this occurred at a prior Congress, and that therefore you have not the power to punish. Gentlemen mistake this thing altogether. We are not acting here as executive officers for punishing crimes. We are not a Congress of factots, punishing a member for what he has done. We stand here to vindicate the character of our body, not to inflict punishment, either unusual or unheard of, or twice for the same offense. They mistake entirely the character of the proceedings.

Mr. SEWARD. As I desire to be correct about this matter, I hope the gentleman will pardon me if I ask one question. I should like to hear the gentleman in regard to the effect of the action of the last Congress on the qualifications of the member; whether that action is a personal disqualification, which continues and attaches to him, and which disentitles him to a seat? I have really no feeling about this; but I would like to hear the gentleman, as I know that what he says will be to the point.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. With me it is a personal disqualification, which half a century would not work out. I do not know that it could be called an unpardonable sin; but I believe that if a member was capable of committing such a sin, it ought to be so considered.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman will pardon me: I did not desire to know what objection might strike him, as an individual, with so much force, but whether there is a constitutional or legal personal disqualification to this individual? That is what I want to know.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will endeavor to answer any question which any gentleman may ask me, in the course of my remarks. And I reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, that so far as anything connected with the action of last Congress goes to work personal disqualification, it is a matter for the House to determine. I do not undertake to say that there has been any offense committed here which would, per se, disqualify the member. But when he comes and offers himself here, he places himself within our purview, and we have a right to look into his character. I am not to be compelled to sit here with felons and scoundrels, day by day, and to have no power of redress, if I can find it under any instrument under which I am acting.

Mr. SEWARD. I agree with the gentleman; but I want the law. If there be no law, the fault is with the legislative body for not passing one. What I want to get at is this: as I said this morning, the Constitution, in cases of impeachment, affixes a personal and permanent disqualification on the person thus convicted. In reference to the expulsion of members, and punishing them, the framers of the Constitution omitted to put any disqualification of that sort upon them. Now, I understand the gentleman's position to be, that in his own private discretion he attaches a disqualification to the member because he thinks that the member is not fit, on account of some moral defect in his character, to occupy a seat with him. Now, I want some law to define that, and I will be satisfied.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hardly dare presume to think that I can succeed in satisfying the gentleman. But I will come very briefly to the points he has presented. The gentleman says, that in the case of impeachment, the Constitution would give us a right to expel the party. Well, he is mistaken in that respect, according to his own argument, if he goes by the Constitution. Impeachment only works disqualification for the office the party holds, according to the gentleman's construction, if you cannot go beyond the time. According to his own doctrine, it would work no disqualification except as to the office which the party might hold at the time.

But before I get there, I must touch more extensively on the point on which he seems to dwell so much.

Now, sir, as to this question of power, which has been so much talked about, and about which gentlemen have felt under such great apprehensions lest we might exercise doubtful power. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] said that he was not clear on that subject; that he wanted the matter referred to a committee, that they might brush away these cobwebs of doubt that seem to hang about his mind, and might enable him to see clearly what his duty in the premises is. I think that the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] on this point were exceedingly pertinent. The remarks themselves were clear, and I think that if the gentleman from Ohio had observed them, they would, perhaps, have aided somewhat in clearing his mind. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD], when he inquires after this power, will find it in the fifth article of the Constitution, which has just been read. It declares, all in one sentence, that each House shall determine its rules of proceeding, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member—not for disorderly behavior.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to have an understanding in reference to this matter of impeachment. The Constitution says that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office, and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States. That is the disqualification.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. According to the gentleman's own construction, the provision which he quotes would extend only to the office which the party held. That is the gentleman's construction, not mine. I hold no such thing. I am dealing with his position. If he wants to mend that he can have full liberty to do so.

Now, as I was remarking, each House has, under the Constitution, the unquestionable power to expel a member for any cause or without cause. The gentleman contends that it has no such power. Suppose that the House should by a two-thirds vote expel you, Mr. Speaker, from the House, and order the Doorkeeper to keep you outside: I want to know what remedy you have got? There is no power on earth to place you back in your position. You might denounce the act as unconstitutional, and might say that we had violated the instrument we had sworn to support. But all this would not relieve you. It does not relieve you. But there is a power in the Constitution. It is intended that it should be there for great and important public purposes.

Before I pass from this branch of the case, I want to refer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] to a case that I think ought to be some authority with him. There was a case presented in the tenth Congress—the case of Senator John Smith, of Ohio. It was referred to a select committee, of which Mr. Adams was chairman. The committee was composed of Messrs. Adams, Maclay, Franklin, Smith of Maryland, Pope, Thurston, and Anderson. The charge against Mr. Smith was that he had been guilty of a complicity with the Burr conspiracy. It was referred to that committee for investigation. Mr. Adams at that time was the leader of Mr. Jefferson's administration in the Senate of the United States. After mature deliberation that committee made a report. The following is so much of it as refers to the power of Congress. I think it applies the matter in so clear a light that the gentleman from Ohio, even, will be able to see it.

"The power of expelling a member for misconduct results, on the principle of common sense, from the interest of the nation, that the high trust of legislation should be invested in pure hands. When the trust is elective, it is not to be presumed that the constituent body will commit the deposit to the keeping of worthless characters. But when a man, whom his fellow-citizens have honored with their confidence, on the pledge of a spotless reputation, has degraded himself by the commission of infamous crimes, which become suddenly and unexpectedly revealed to the world, defective indeed would be that institution which should be impotent to discard from its bosom the contagion of such a member; which should have no remedy of amputation to apply until the poison had reached the heart.

"The question upon the trial of a criminal case, before the courts of common law, is not between guilt and innocence, but between guilt and the possibility of innocence. If a doubt can possibly be raised, either by the ingenuity of the party or his counsel, or by the operation of general rules in their unforeseen application to particular cases, that doubt must be decisive for acquittal, and the verdict of not guilty, perhaps, in nine cases out of ten, means no more than that the guilt of the party has not been demonstrated in the precise, specific, and narrow forms prescribed by law. The humane spirit of the laws multiplies the barriers for the protection of innocence, and freely admits that these barriers may be abused for the shelter of guilt. It avows a strong partiality favorable to the person upon trial, and acknowledges the preference that ten guilty should escape rather than that one innocent should suffer. The interest of the public that a particular crime should be punished, is but as one to ten, compared with the interest of the party, that innocence should be spared. Acquittal only restores the party to the common rights of every other citizen; it restores him to no public trust; it invests him with no public confidence; it substitutes the sentence of mercy for the doom of justice; and to the eyes of impartial reason, in the great majority of cases, must be considered rather as a pardon than a justification.

"But when a member of a legislative body lies under the imputation of aggravated offenses, and the determination upon his cause can operate only to remove him from a station of extensive powers and important trust, this disproportion between the interest of the public and the interest of the individual, disappears; if any disproportion exists, it is of an opposite kind. It is not better that ten traitors should be members of this Senate, than that one innocent man should suffer expulsion. In either case, no doubt, the evil would be great. But, in the former, it would strike at the vitals of the nation; in the latter it might, though deeply to be lamented, only be the calamity of an individual.

"By the letter of the Constitution, the power of expelling a member is given to each of the two Houses of Congress, without any limitation other than that which requires a concurrence of two thirds of the votes to give it effect.

"The spirit of the Constitution is, perhaps, in no respect more remarkable than in the solicitude which it has manifested to secure the purity of the Legislature by that of the elements of its composition. A qualification of age is made necessary for the members, to insure the maturity of their judgment; a qualification of long citizenship, to insure a community of interests and affections between them and their country; a qualification of residence, to provide a sympathy between every member and the portion of the Union from which he is delegated; and to guard, as far as regulation can guard, against every bias of personal interest, and every hazard of interfering duties, it has made every member of Congress ineligible to office which he contributed to create, and every officer of the Union incapable of holding a seat in Congress. Yet, in the midst of all this anxious providence of legislative virtue, it has not authorized the constituent body to recall in any case its representative. It has not subjected him to removal by impeachment; and when the darling of the people's choice has become their deadliest foe, can it enter the imagination of a reasonable man that the sanctuary of their legislation must remain polluted with his presence, until a court of common law, with its pace of snail, can ascertain whether his crime was committed on the right or on the left bank of a river; whether a puncture of difference can be found between the words of the charge and the words of the proof; whether the witnesses of his guilt should or should not be heard by his jury; and whether he was punishable, because present at an overt act, or intangible to public justice, because he only contrived and prepared it. Is it conceivable that a traitor to that country which has loaded him with favors, guilty to the common understanding of all mankind, should be suffered to return unquestioned to that post of honor and confidence, where, in the zenith of his good fame, he had been placed by the esteem of his countrymen, and in defiance of their wishes, in mockery of their fears, surrounded by the public indignation, but inaccessible to its bolt, pursue the purposes of treason in the heart of the national councils? Must the assembled rulers of the land listen with calmness and indifference, session after session, to the voice of notorious infamy, until the slugging step of municipal justice can overtake his enormities? Must they tamely see the lives and fortunes of millions, the safety of present and future ages, depending upon his vote, recorded with theirs, merely because the abused benignity of general maxims may have remitted to him the forfeiture of his life?

"Such, in very supposable cases, would be the unavoidable consequences of a principle which should offer the crutches of judicial tribunals as an apology for crippling the congressional power of expulsion. Far different, in the opinion of your committee, is the spirit of our Constitution. They believe that the very purpose for which this power was given, was to preserve the Legislature from the first approaches of infection. That it was made discretionary because it could not exist under the procrastination of general rules; that its process must be summary, because it would be rendered nugatory by delay."

Mr. NICHOLS. I have to confess to the gentleman from Illinois my ignorance that the illustrious family of Smith had ever represented the State of Ohio on the floor of the Senate, and that the particular, individual John had a case there in point. But I conceive the gentleman did not meet the case that the House has the power to punish twice for the same offense.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman is determined to be blinded. He is determined not to see, and returns to his old point. He says that this does not touch the old question whether we have the power to punish a man twice for the same offense. I give him up, and will pursue him no further in that connection.

Here is a document elaborately prepared by one of the ablest committees of the Senate, considering a case that, in some of its aspects, is precisely like this. The affair occurred outside of the Senate. It was not in violation of its rules of order. It was an offense, however, which the Senate deemed it its duty to take cognizance of. The committee reported on it that the Senate had full power, as we claim here. The vote stood in the Senate—19 to 10; one vote lacking the two thirds required to expel. I cannot conceive that any member, after that decision, can desire any authority stronger than that cited. Now, sir, if the gentleman's argument is sound, we may be compelled to associate here daily with felons; men who have been guilty of treason; men who have been convicted of treason, if you please, and we cannot reach back to the session of Congress in which we passed upon their conduct. It is utterly impossible for us to reach a man, no matter how gross his offense may be, unless we have this power given in this clause of the Constitution; and, if it is given at all, it is given in the whole breadth of its language. And the result would be, that though the last Congress had power to purify itself of an obnoxious member, yet, although we are as well satisfied as they were that he is unfit to be a member, we are compelled, from this lack of power, to sit here from day to day and endure the odium on account of our inability to purify ourselves of a member whom the unanimous vote of the preceding Congress might have decided was unfit to a seat at all.

Now, gentlemen have talked about his constituents indorsing him. I submit that that does not change the power of the House. The House have the same power after his constituents have indorsed him, that they had before; but until his constituents have indorsed him he has no claim to a seat in this House. In this case, as the gentleman from Virginia well remarked, he dodged a vote of the House, prevented an expulsion here, has refused up to this time to allow his constituents to pass upon his course; and now it is claimed that it would be an outrage, a wrong, a cruelty for the House to pass judgment upon him here. The case of Wilkes has been cited, and the gentleman gave us a syllabus of that case. He stated that the House of Commons subsequently rescinded the resolution which they had passed, upon the ground that it was an outrage upon public liberty. In that case his constituents had passed upon his case four or five times, and had returned him to the House of Commons. What was the expulsion for? For a libel upon the House, the language of which would have been pronounced a libel by nobody except the corrupt administration in power. The charge was not true in the outset, and the punishment was repeated over and over and over again, for the same offense, and after he had been indorsed by his constituent body. The Journal was expunged, not because the House of Commons had expelled him again and again, but because there was originally no cause for his expulsion.

Mr. SEWARD. The House of Commons acted upon the presumption that a personal disqualification attached to him, and he was not allowed to take his seat. There was an old British statute which fixed the disqualification of members, and a proposition was made to change the law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman is still splitting hairs. It is one of those refined arguments I have been compelled to allude to from the beginning. The great difference is, that gentleman cannot see that there is any power. If the gentleman will, and I have no idea he ever will, place himself in the position of the gentleman from New York, I trust he will have occasion to feel the power, if he cannot see it.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope it will be applied to me; and I hope the same rule will be applied to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I would make no complaint. I had no allusion to Blythe Island in the world.

Mr. SEWARD. Nor did I refer to that Illinois Central Railroad project. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Now, sir, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAYLOR] had another very remarkable refinement, to which I must pay my respects. The gentleman argued that we had power to expel for the cause enumerated in the Constitution—disorderly behavior; that we must first make the rule of the House, and determine what was disorderly conduct; and after we had made the rules of the House and determined that, then, if a member violated that rule, we could expel him; and that, upon the ground that the House "could determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member." Well, sir, I think the argument is exceedingly unfortunate for the gentleman, because this House, by its two-third action, makes the rule when it expels a member. Is it enough to say to me that the House has got to proceed and make a catalogue of offenses to include all which have ever been perpetrated, in order to include one which, by any possibility, could work the disqualification or expulsion of a member; and then, perchance, if some grander villain than we have ever had before, could discover an offense greater in enormity than those enumerated, we therefore could not expel him because our rules did not happen to include the offense?

Sir, we make the rule when we apply the remedy. I am talking now about the reasoning of the gentleman. I do not, however, admit his argument. If it be true that the House, by first fixing the code of rules, can then punish a member for a violation of those rules, then it can make a rule, and, in five minutes thereafter, punish a member for violating it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if the principle that he advocates is not exactly that of the rule which is familiarly known as the Irish rule—a word and a blow, and the blow first? [A laugh.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Exactly so; and there is no better rule in the world than the Irish rule for this case, and I am very sorry the gentleman does not think so too. It is the very rule that I would apply to all such cases as this. I was only testing the gentleman's argument; if it does not fit it is not my fault. I deny the whole ground of the argument; but I say that if it is in the power of the House to fix a rule which shall work the disqualification of a member, and say that any member who shall be shown to be guilty is unfit to hold a seat here, we can apply the remedy now. It does not come under the condition of an ex post facto law. It is merely providing a rule of qualification for those who are to sit here; and if, after providing the rule, we find any members here who do not come within the rule, they are excluded. I think the argument, if it is like the Irish one, is sufficient to answer the gentleman's argument.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to continue this discussion. I think it must be apparent to the House, both by the reason of the case and by precedents, too, that the power exists to expel a member for any cause which by the House is deemed sufficient. I am, therefore, willing to submit the question as it now stands. I do not think that we should gain any more information than we now possess if we were to refer this question either to a standing or to a special committee. If, however, the House thinks otherwise, I shall not object; but I, for one, shall vote against the reference. I think the House is prepared now to decide the question. The country desires that it should be decided. From every quarter of the country but one voice comes up, saying that this man is not worthy to be a member of this body; and there will be no act of the session which will more strongly commend itself to the good sense of the people than that which exhibits a determination, on the part of this body, to purify itself from such members as have shown themselves to be unworthy to sit here.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question. He says that the country expects and demands of us this act. I desire to know of him whether any portion of the constituents of the accused member have asked any action of this House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will answer that question, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest cheerfulness. I did not intend to have alluded to that at all. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Kerr] alluded to it. I did not intend to do so, but I do it in response to the gentleman from Vermont. Why, sir, I have received batches of letters and newspapers from the district of the member involved, requesting and demanding that this should be done.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to know whether any petitions have been presented to this House on the subject?

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. Newspaper communications and outside letters have nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia is himself out of order, and I desire that he shall take his seat. The gentleman from Vermont is as well aware as I am whether there have been any petitions presented on the subject. I do not know and do not care whether the member's constituents have petitioned for this action or not. We are not acting in regard to the constituents of the member. We are acting here for our own purposes, for the purposes of the country. The House, at the last session of Congress, declared almost unanimously that this member, in declaring that a large number of the members of this House had associated themselves together, and pledged themselves each to the other, not to vote for any law or resolution granting money or lands unless they were paid for it, had falsely and willfully assailed and defamed the character of this House, and had proved himself unworthy to be a member thereof. They also decided, by a vote of 125 to 17, that ORSAMUS B. MATTESON, a member of the House from the State of New York, did incite parties deeply interested in the passage of a joint resolution for construing the Des Moines grant to have here and to use a large sum of money and other valuable considerations corruptly, for the purpose of procuring the passage of said joint resolution through the House.

Sir, the member stands convicted, first, of defaming the character of the House of which he was a member; and, secondly, of corruption in endeavoring to effect the passage of a law by the use of money among the members of the House. I need, sir, only to state the counts of the indictment upon which he was convicted, and the verdict of the House, to satisfy every member that this man is not fit to occupy a seat here. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to yield me the floor for a moment, to state some facts which are directly pertinent to this case. I will renew the call for the previous question, if he desires it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is other public business which demands our attention; and I must decline to withdraw the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman to allow me a few moments, to say a word as to the facts. I appeal to him, as a personal favor, to withdraw the previous question, and allow me ten minutes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there a motion pending to refer this resolution to a committee?

The SPEAKER. There is; to a select committee, and also to a standing committee.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman to allow me a few moments. I will renew the demand for the previous question, if he desires it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman has any facts in his possession, of which the House and the country are not aware, I will do so. If he will state that he has anything new in the way of facts to present to the House, I will withdraw the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I desire to call the attention of the House to facts which have not been adverted to to-day, in this discussion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Well, that opens up a field as wide as the corruption itself. If the gentleman has any new facts to present, I will withdraw the previous question. If not, I cannot do it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague does not wish to debate the question, but simply to present facts.

Mr. GROW. I do not wish to involve myself in any controversy with any one.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. He does not wish to debate the resolution.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will not allow me to make my statement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I yield to the solicitations of the gentleman; but I request him to renew the demand for the previous question when he is through.

Mr. GROW. I can say all I desire to in a few minutes. I propose to speak upon this point only, whether the House should attempt to expel a member for facts which existed at the time that he was elected a member of Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is not so.

Mr. GROW. Wait till you hear me before you contradict it. The letter which was the basis of this whole charge against Mr. MATTESON was known to his constituents when he was elected a member of this Congress.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. GROW. Gentlemen had better wait, before they deny my facts, till they hear the evidence. It will be time enough when I get through. Mr. MATTESON was a member of the last Congress. The committee of this House, in making their investigation, introduced a letter sent by him to William C. Johnson. That was the basis of the charge. It was the principle allegation of corruption. When Mr. Johnson was on the witness-stand, he was asked when he received that letter, and he replied in July or August.

"Question, (by Mr. ORR.) When did you first have a conversation with Mr. MATTESON on the subject of that letter?"

"Answer. It was after I had returned to Utica, when Congress had adjourned."

"Question, (by Mr. ORR.) The existence of the letter had at that time become public?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

That is the testimony of the witness, and do gentlemen dispute it? A member elected to the last Congress, passed under the censure of the House? And for what was he censured? Because, as was alleged, he slandered the last House. You said in your resolutions that it was a libel on that body. How was it a libel? Because he had said to Mr. Reverdy Johnson that twenty or thirty members had combined together, and would not vote for any measure unless they were paid for their votes. Is that any slander on this body? or was it any slander on the last Congress? Who knows whether it was true or not?

The committee of investigation did not summon Mr. MATTESON before them, and ask him who were these twenty or thirty men, and whether the understanding of Mr. Johnson was correct. But I do not propose at this time to review the action of that committee. I pass that by. I thought at the last Congress that the mode of proceeding was unfair, and that it broke down all the barriers thrown around innocence when accused of crime. I think so still, but I am not going back to that question; for I know the House is already weary of this discussion.

Now to the point. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] says he will not sit here and associate with rogues and thieves and felons. Mr. Speaker, the constituencies of the respective congressional districts of the country select our associates on this floor, and not we ourselves. If we had the selection ourselves we should probably make a very different selection in many cases. Yet it is not for this House to erect itself into a judge of the personal merits of its members after they have been passed upon by the constituency? Are the majorities of the respective congressional districts of the country to choose their Representatives on this floor of such persons as they please, or are you to say that because of the moral derelictions of character which you may suppose a member possesses, or because of some erroneous opinion of his which you may think destructive to the welfare of the country, he must not be elected, or if so, he must be driven from this Hall?

The gentleman from Illinois says a member may have been convicted of treason. Suppose he was convicted of treason, or of murder, or of anything else, and a majority of his congressional district choose to send him here: is it for a majority on the floor to expel him from the Hall? If so, then the theory of this Government is a fallacy. If there is any disqualification under the Constitution of the country, that of course bars the choice which the people might otherwise make. Disqualification under the organic law of the country is, of course, paramount to all majorities. But where there is no disqualification under the Constitution; and where the majority of voters of a congressional district send a member here, it is a strange doctrine that would deprive such man of his right to a seat in this House; and it is to protest against such an assumption of power by the House that I have sought the floor.

I think we have made rapid strides in this Congress in trampling down the individual rights of citizens, in our treatment of contumacious witnesses. The ruin of liberty begins when personal rights are violated. This new doctrine that a majority of this House, because they may not like the moral character of a member, or may not like anything pertaining to him personally, shall have the right to expel him, when the question on which the charge is based was known to the constituents who elected him, is a doctrine highly dangerous to personal liberty, and strikes at the vital principle of free government.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman this question?

Mr. GROW. I cannot yield the floor. It was with great difficulty I obtained it myself. The gentleman has been talking all day, while I have kept my seat in silence. But I do not propose to weary the patience of the House. By the structure of your Government, a majority of the voters of each congressional district are entitled to elect whom they please as their Representative. If you do not like the Representative whom they send, you can take the seat furthest from him, and withhold all personal intercourse; but he has the right to enter this Hall as your peer in legislation. Is it for any gentleman to set up a claim that there is greater purity of character in the people of his congressional district than in the people of any other congressional district? It is not for this House to inquire what is the moral character of one of its members, so far as legislation on this floor is concerned, so long as he violates none of its rules of order or decorum. He comes here the Representative of an independent constituency of one hundred thousand people, and stands, in view of his constitutional rights, the equal of all other members.

Now, I have read from the evidence to show that the very letter which was made the basis of this whole charge was known to the constituents of Mr. MATTESON when he was elected a member of this Congress.

You passed sentence upon him last Congress for libeling that House. And now I ask, what authority is there in this House to expel a man for a libel on a past Congress? I can say what I please of a preceding Congress. It may be true or false; that is none of the business of this House. And should they attempt to arraign me for it, it would be but a renewal of the odious doctrine contained in the sedition laws of the old Federalists. For what I say of the House in which I may occupy a seat, it can pass judgment upon me; and my conduct during the existence of the Congress to which I am elected may be subjected to its action; but when the next Congress comes, I deny its authority to inflict any punishment for declarations that I may have made in regard to this House. To assume such authority would be to trample down the rights of the constituency which I represent on this floor, and which is entitled to be represented, no matter what may be the moral character either of the constituency or its Representative. Now, in accordance with my promise, I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. RITCHIE. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw it, to permit me to correct my colleague on a question of fact.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am not disposed to cut off any legitimate debate on this subject. If anybody wants to speak in Mr. MATTESON's defense, I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. RITCHIE. I do not want to speak in his defense. I merely wish to say that my colleague [Mr. GROW] is not correct in stating that Mr. MATTESON was not called before the investigating committee of last Congress. He was asked repeatedly to come there, and he declined to attend.

Mr. GROW. Was he summoned as a witness?

Mr. RITCHIE. No, sir.

Mr. GROW. That is it; what is the use in evading?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW,] to whom I yielded the floor, has raised a question of fact to which his colleague wishes to reply, I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. GROW. It is no question of fact with my colleague; he admits what I claimed.

Mr. RITCHIE. I merely wish to say that Mr. MATTESON repeatedly received notice to appear before the committee—as a party, of course; because he was not a witness. We gave him notice to attend as a party, and he declined to attend. He was notified that the committee would be glad to hear anything he had to say. I wish to add further, with the permission of the gentleman—

Mr. GROW. Was Mr. MATTESON summoned at any time to give evidence before the committee in reference to this matter of Mr. Reverdy Johnson?

Mr. RITCHIE. He stated in his letter to the committee—

Mr. GROW. Was he sent for or notified to attend and give evidence on that point?

Mr. RITCHIE. Yes; he had notice to attend.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman is evading the question.

Mr. RITCHIE. He was not subpoenaed as a witness; but he was cited to attend as a party.

In reference to the question of constitutional power, I have no doubt as to the power of the House to expel a member whenever it may think fit. No limits are placed to that power by the Constitution, but its exercise is left to the discretion of the House. The Constitution, however, furnishes us, in its provisions with reference to criminal trial, with a rule by which I think we ought to be guided in analogous cases, unless there should be strong reasons to the contrary. The Constitution provides that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense. This member was before the last House; that House tried and condemned him. Now, much as I condemn the action of that member, I think we had better follow the rule laid down by the Constitution in other cases. In other cases, men cannot be tried and punished twice for the same offense. I do not say that we cannot do it in this case. On the contrary, I think we can. But I think the better course in this case is to refer the matter to a committee for consideration. I renew the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. MILES. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 122; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Giddings, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Horton, Howard, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Parker, Pettit, Potter, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Wood—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Boccock, Bonham, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dinmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reily, Ricard, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Underwood, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollieoffer—122.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. WOODSON stated that his colleague, Mr. ANDERSON, was detained from his seat by illness.

Mr. BISHOP stated that his colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. WINSLOW said: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BRANCH, has gone home. He was very sick for some time before leaving. He has paired off with Mr. HALL, of Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, stated that his colleague, Mr. COX, was detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, stated that his colleague, Mr. CORNING, had been called home by sickness in his family; and that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, was still confined to his room by severe indisposition.

Mr. COCKERILL stated that his colleague, Mr. HALL, had been called home by illness in his family.

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. HALL, had been unexpectedly called from the House, and had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Illinois.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleague, Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, had been confined to his room for four or five days, by a severe indisposition.

Mr. MOORE stated that his colleague, Mr. STALLWORTH, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. BURNETT stated that his colleague, Mr. TALBOTT, was detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. STANTON stated that Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. COLFAX stated that his colleague, Mr. WILSON, having been called home, had informed him that he had paired off with Mr. KEITT on the Kansas question and on the contested-election cases.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that he had paired off with Mr. DAVIDSON, who was detained from the House by sickness.

The SPEAKER stated that the question recurred on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, will that committee have the power to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, as this is a question of privilege, the committee would have the right to report at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I hope the question will be disposed of now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand tellers.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. EDIE and WHITE were appointed.

The tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 89. So the motion to refer was lost.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. REILLY moved that the House adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there not a motion pending to commit this matter to a select committee?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to lay upon the table the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FLORENCE. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion to refer the resolution to a select committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT (at fifteen minutes past four o'clock) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bocoek, Bryan, Burroughs, Campbell, Ezra Clark, Clemens, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Eustis, Florence, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Greenwood, Hawkins, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Montgomery, Morgan, Mott, Murray, Olin, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Seward, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Abt, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, Colfax, James Craig, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Reilly, Robbins, Royce, Sandidge, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Whiteley—87.

So the resolution was referred to a select committee.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. WARD had paired off with his colleague, Mr. MORSE.

Mr. CRAWFORD stated that Mr. STEPHENS, being ill, had paired off with Mr. MORRIS of Illinois, upon the pending question.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to a select committee, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BENNETT moved (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes) that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. ADRAIN (at four o'clock and forty minutes) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE INTERFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the following resolution, offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOARD:]

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made by any person connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any person acting under their advice or consent, to influence the action of this House, or any of its members, upon any questions or measure upon which the House has acted, or which it has under consideration, directly or indirectly, by any promise, offer, or intimation of employment, patronage, office, or favors under the Government, or under any department, officer, or servant thereof, to be conferred or withheld in consideration of any vote given or to be given, withheld or to be withheld, with power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

The pending question is, "Shall the resolution be received and entertained, on the ground that the privileges of the House are involved?"

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The general debate on the Indian appropriation bill terminates at two o'clock to-day. If it suits the gentleman from New York to take any other day for the consideration of this matter—and I presume it will—I hope he will give way to me, to make a motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOARD. If the gentleman desires to postpone the matter until a day certain, I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move to postpone its consideration until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House testimony in the matter of the contested-election case from the third congressional district of Maryland; which, on motion of Mr. RICAUD, was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th January, 1858, requesting him to furnish the House with any information which may have been communicated to him by F. W. Lander, Esq., engineer of the wagon road, as to the practicability of a railroad through the South Pass, and the best method of constructing the same.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the communication was referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SHORTER moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Bowie, Bryan, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Burton, Craigie, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Dimmick, Edie, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hickman, Horton, Hughes, Kellogg, Jacob M. Kunkel, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Edward Joy Morris, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Searing, John Sherman, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicofer—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Avery, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bocoek, Brayton, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Chaffee, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Granger, Greenwood, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ready, Robbins, Royce, Seales, Seward, Judson W. Sherman, Stallworth, James A. Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Whiteley—81.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. STANTON's motion.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GROW. I give notice to the House that I will on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, ask leave to introduce a bill to permit the Government to be sued by its creditors in the district courts of the United States. I give the notice in open House, because the bill is of general interest in its character, and I desire to call the attention of members to the subject.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a question of privilege. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances, I should not deem it my duty to bring to the attention of this House any aspersions which the correspondent of a newspaper might make upon me through the public press. I most cheerfully acknowledge the fullest right of the press to comment upon the public acts of officers of the Government, and especially of those acting in a representative capacity. But, sir, when the personal conduct of a member of this House, upon its floor, and during its session, is misrepresented, and unfounded charges, reflecting upon his conduct in his intercourse with other gentlemen occupying seats on this floor, are publicly made against him by newspaper correspondents, it is then the duty, as well as the right, of the member thus assailed to call the attention of the House to the matter. My attention was called this morning to such an article in the Baltimore Clipper, of the 25th February, copied from the Southern Argus.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. What is the gentleman's question of privilege?

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman will ascertain what my question of privilege is, if he will listen.

Mr. FLORENCE. We would rather that you should state it first.

Mr. BOCOCK. This is not a question of privilege. I must call the gentleman to order.

Mr. POTTER. Then, sir, I send up the paper to the Clerk's desk, and ask that the passage which I have marked may be read.

Mr. BOCOCK. I do not know that I should object to the gentleman proceeding, but I do protest against this being acknowledged by the House to be a question of privilege. I protest against gentlemen being allowed to rise here and read newspaper articles, and proceed to comment on them at length, on the ground that they involve questions of privilege. This is no question of privilege. The gentleman must appeal to the House to allow him to make a personal explanation. I shall not object.

Mr. POTTER. I then ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear the article read first, that we may know what is the character of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"KICKING SCENE IN CONGRESS.—A correspondent of the Norfolk Argus, signing himself 'Delta,' gives the following particulars of a scene in the House of Representatives, generally overlooked by the Washington letter writers:

"Whenever a call of the House is ordered, the doors are locked to prevent those that are absent from coming in the mean time and answering to their names. Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee, and Mr. ELLIOTT, of Kentucky, after answering to their names, had occasion to leave the hall a few moments, and on returning beckoned to one of the officers of the House through the glass door to admit them, who was proceeding to unbar the door, when POTTER, of Wisconsin, told him not to admit them. The officer being a subordinate, and not understanding the rules of the House, obeyed POTTER. POTTER then amused himself by mockingly and derisively laughing at the situation of Messrs. ELLIOTT and WRIGHT.

"In the mean while ELLIOTT procured a brick-bat, and holding it up to the view of the officer, told him if he did not unbar the door he would smash it and his head too. This frightened the officer, who ran and brought the principal Doorkeeper to the scene of action, explaining, meanwhile, the circumstances of the case. The principal Doorkeeper acknowledged the right of ELLIOTT and WRIGHT to admittance and unbarred the door. Whereupon Mr. WRIGHT made a very brisk application of his pedal extremity to the person of POTTER, for his impudent interference.

"The future valorous leader received his chastisement in humility and meekness, until WRIGHT, after kicking to his heart's content, turned to go to his seat. POTTER then ran his hand in his bosom, as if to draw a weapon. WRIGHT remarked, 'Do you have the impudence to feign drawing a weapon on me?' POTTER nodded assent; whereupon WRIGHT returned to the former application of his foot. In the mean time, two of POTTER's allies came to his rescue, and attempted to interfere. ELLIOTT immediately seized both of them, holding one in each hand as with the grip of a vice, and calling to WRIGHT to let the d—d rascal's friends see him kicked well, since they chose to interfere. WRIGHT, with two spectators to stimulate him, returned to the attack with renewed vigor, and only desisted when, through exhaustion, he could kick no longer, and then left the 'kicked future leader' to the condolence of his spectator allies."

The reading of the above article created much merriment upon all sides of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to the time of the House being occupied about this matter. I consider that publication a hoax.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I have only to add, that the article is false in every particular, and without the least shadow of foundation. I have never spoken with either of the gentlemen named in that article, and I pronounce the writer of the article, or whoever dictated it, guilty, with malignant, deliberate, and willful falsehood.

The question recurred upon Mr. STANTON's motion.

BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Mr. BRYAN, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

A bill to amend an act to divide the State of Texas into two judicial districts, approved February 21, 1857. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill to provide a building for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, and the post offices at Austin and Brownsville, in the State of Texas. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

A bill to alter and create certain collection districts in the State of Texas. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESOLUTIONS OF TEXAS.

Mr. BRYAN, also, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, relative to Indian spoiliages; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a privileged motion. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which a resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman cannot call up a motion to reconsider until the two pending questions to suspend the rules are disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. The rule declares that motions to reconsider shall take precedence of all motions except motions to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. And these two motions are to suspend that and the other rules.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes; but my motion takes precedence of all except motions to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I will call the attention of the Chair directly to the rule.

MOTIONS TO GO INTO COMMITTEE.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I call for tellers on the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH, of Tennessee, and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 74.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. SEWARD. My object in calling up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution in reference to the act to promote the efficiency of the Navy, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was that the House might fix some particular day next week for its consideration. If gentlemen will allow me, I will submit a motion to make this resolution a special order for next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain it.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Some time since, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] made a motion to reconsider the vote by which a joint resolution, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was entered. This morning, he proposes to call up that motion while a motion is pending to suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair decides that the question on the motion to suspend the rules must be first put and decided, inasmuch as that is a proposition to suspend all the rules, including that under which the gentleman claims his right.

Mr. SEWARD. Would any remarks be in order? I should like to be heard on the question for about two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question is not debatable. The question is one relating to priority of business, and no debate is in order on any appeal growing out of that question.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the reading of the 55th rule.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is the question of appeal debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object to the reading of the rule, which is in the nature of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad if the House would indulge the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to know if I have not a right to have a rule read which must control both the Presiding Officer and the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The rule was read, as follows:

"55. When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof on the same or succeeding day; and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House; and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would make a suggestion to the gentleman from Georgia which is conclusive: If this matter had been regularly pending, and under the consideration of the House, it would be superseded by a motion to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SEWARD. The Chair and myself differ about that. But as it seems to embarrass the House, I shall withdraw my appeal, though I am satisfied that I am right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very willing that the gentleman should entertain his opinion.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no doubt that the Speaker is equally satisfied that he is right.

Mr. STANTON. Is it now in order to move to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. Has not business intervened so as to make it in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion to suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union must be first put. The two motions were pending. The motion of the gentleman had precedence. It has been disposed of. The question now recurs on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to—ayes one hundred and five, noes not counted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question before the committee was the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending 30th June, 1859; upon which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SMITH] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I feel somewhat embarrassed in addressing the committee to-day on a subject foreign to the bill which is now under consideration; and yet I feel justified in so doing, because the prominent topic of discussion in this House and before the country is one of so much importance, one fraught with such consequences to the Union, that any member of this House is justified in departing from the subject under consideration to lay before the country his views, or to make whatever argument he may which may have a bearing or an influence upon the public mind or upon this House in reference to the admission into this Union of the State of Kansas, with all the rights and privileges of the original States of the Confederacy.

For the last few years, important events have precipitated themselves in such rapid succession upon Congress and the country, that the statesman and the patriot are lost, as it were, in bewilderment, contemplating the consequences of the settlement of these questions, which come before us as the Representatives of the people. This is an important one, because it involves the conclusion of the agitation, which commenced in 1820, against the domestic institutions of one half of the States of this Union. The first serious agitation which occurred in this country in reference to the question of slavery was in 1820, and from that time until the present, in some form or other, it has been a fruitful theme for politicians, statesmen, demagogues, and those who were disposed to inflame the public mind, that they might live for a time, at least, in the public estimation. It was used for those excitements, inflammatory in their character and injurious to the interests of the country, which these men might create in the minds of their constituents, and thus enable them to hold on to power, which is one of the leading and controlling motives of those who have not the merit to come here upon a political creed right in itself, and just to every section of the Union. I do not care whether the disturbance comes from the North or the South. I say, sir, that there is a spirit of revolution abroad in the land, which, if not checked, may some day result in inaugurating the train of circumstances referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS],—a train of circumstances which would destroy the fairest fabric of government upon earth. It is not so much the slavery question; it is not so much the right of southern men to hold negroes as our servants, as it is that spirit of revolution which I am prepared to show the people of Kansas are not responsible for. I relieve them, sir, from the responsibility which I am prepared to show rests upon the Representatives of the people. This is a Government of law and order; and, unless maintained upon such principles, cannot be maintained at all. I am no disunionist; I wish not to talk about disunion; yet, sir, if the idea shall go abroad that the dissolution of the Union is an impossibility, it only arms those who would create revolution with an additional incentive to commit aggressions upon the rights of those who may be weaker, who may be in the minority; to commit aggressions upon the rights of sections of this Union, either South or North, East or West, which would bring about a dissolution of the Union. I do not wish, sir, to see the measure of which we have heard so much, forced through under a threat of disunion. I make no such threat; I have not the power to make any such threats. I tell gentlemen on all sides of this House that, if the day shall ever come when this Union shall be dissolved, it must not be done by me, not by Congress, but by the act of the States whose servants we are. If that time shall ever come—which Heaven forbid!—I shall be the last man to leave my post upon the floor of the House of Representatives. If the time shall come—which I do not look for—that any portion of the Representatives from the North or the South shall deem it proper to leave this Hall, I say, for one, that I shall consider it my highest duty to remain here, until recalled by the people of my State, and prevent those who are here from doing harm to the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not look to these consequences. It is true, sir, that when we lose our equality in this Union, when that is gone, when the General Government becomes the oppressor of the States, there then can be no Union; because the very fact of union implies equality among all the members thereof. A General Government was formed and a more particular Union was formed for public safety, and public defense, and public justice; and when it shall cease to accomplish those ends, and becomes the oppressor of any section of this Union, or any State of this Union, then I say the Union itself is at an end by its own operation and by the action of the Federal Government. I hope never to see that time come. I do not believe it has ever been, and, without prediction as to what may occur, without indicating what course I shall pursue in reference to the future, if Kansas shall be or shall not be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, I content myself with acting upon the principle of the immortal bard, who "Sees what befall, and what may yet befall, Concludes from both; and best provides for all."

Sufficient, then, "unto the day is the evil thereof." Without going into a discussion of what I may do, what my State may do, or what she ought to do under the circumstances, I shall address myself to the question which I have selected for discussion to-day, and that is the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

The first question which arises here is, have we the power to admit Kansas into the Union? the second is, do the people of Kansas desire to be incorporated as a State? and the third, ought we, in view of all the circumstances and all the facts, to admit her as a sovereign State of this Union?

I do not wish to indulge here in remarks which reflect upon the Representatives of any section of this Union. I know that I have more to make at home, by making an inflammatory speech here, harrowing up imaginary wrongs which have been done to my section of the Union. Those which have been done heretofore are imaginary; but if the admission of Kansas shall be refused, they then will become real, so far as this question is concerned. If Kansas shall be refused to them it will not be because her constitution tolerates slavery; it will not be because it prohibits slavery; it will not be because the constitutional convention did not submit the whole constitution to the people; nay, sir, nor will it be because a large minority of the citizens refused to participate in making this constitution. If Kansas be refused admission into this Union, it will be on account of that revolutionary spirit which overrides all law, and all constitutions, which, as I before remarked, was started in this House immediately after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I do not intend here to enter into a discussion of that measure; I do not intend to construe it. It construes itself. But before entering upon that, or attempting to speak in reference to the operation upon the people there, so far as authorizing them to form a State constitution, I can go behind that and find an enabling act, if gentlemen desire it. I have stated heretofore that I doubt the power of this House or of Congress to pass an enabling act; and as an original question, I should unhesitatingly vote against any such proposition. The Constitution of the United States provides that "Congress may admit new States into the Union with all the rights and privileges of the original States." That is the only word in the Constitution in reference to the admission of new States into this Union. Congress has no power to create, no power to alter their constitution, has no power to authorize them to make a constitution, because that must proceed from the people themselves, and be the representation of the sovereign will.

I need not enlarge upon this, because, as I before stated, there is an enabling act for the formation of a State government for the Territory of Kansas, dated anterior to the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I know, sir, that some, who heretofore belonged to the Democratic party, are of opinion that there ought to have been an enabling act—such as the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas]—but at the same time admit that an enabling act is not necessary to the formation of a constitution. Upon examination I find that the treaty between the United States and France, of the 30th of April, 1803—that treaty which is the supreme law of the land—provides: what? That Congress shall pass an enabling act? No, sir; but it provides that the people of the Territory of Kansas, which is a part of the Louisiana Territory, shall be admitted into the Union as a State or States, as soon as practicable.

The following is the article of the treaty referred to:

"That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

There, sir, is the enabling act, which this Congress has no right to annul, even if it were necessary to have an enabling act. I merely mention this, because it binds Congress to admit this territory into the Union as States, and there is not a word in the treaty which provides that Congress shall take preliminary steps to authorize them to form a constitution and ask admission into the Union. I voted during the last session of Congress to authorize Minnesota to form a constitution and ask admission into the Union. I was one, I believe, of only thirteen southern men who did cast such a vote. And, Mr. Chairman, I believe that all those who have served with me here for the last five years will bear me witness, that in all the votes I have given here, I have given them without reference to any prejudice which may exist in my section of the country in reference to the principles of men north of Mason and Dixon's line. I voted for that act because it had been established by precedents, and not because I believe, as an original question, that we had power to pass an enabling act authorizing Minnesota to form a constitution and ask admission into the Union. We did pass the act. Minnesota has formed a constitution, and in forming that constitution she has departed from the law of Congress. She had a right to depart from it. She had a right to go contrary to it, because when you admit that Congress can prescribe the mode and manner in which States may form their constitutions, you admit that Congress can control the domestic institutions of States before and after they shall be formed. Well, sir, Minnesota has formed her constitution and presents it here; and, notwithstanding that, in forming that constitution, she has gone directly in the teeth of the law of Congress, I expect—I do not say now that I shall do it, because I have not looked into the question—but I expect to vote to admit the State of Minnesota into the Union. What patriotism I have is not bounded by a southern State, or by a northern State, or by a county, or by a district.

But, Mr. Chairman, so far as Kansas is concerned, the convention of the people have formed a constitution, and ask admission into the Union as a sovereign State. It is said by some that the delegates to this convention were not fairly elected. It is said by others that the convention did not redeem its pledges. It is said again that the constitution was not submitted to the people, and that the convention had no authority to make a constitution; but that they had only authority to present to the people a constitution for their ratification.

Sir, I deny this assumption. The convention, in making that constitution, exercised the authority delegated to it, and it exercised it in the only mode in which it could do it with justice and fairness. I call your attention to the law under which the convention was organized and the delegates were elected. Section sixteen provides, that—

"The delegates thus elected shall assemble in convention at the capital of said Territory, on the first Monday of September next, and shall proceed to form its constitution and State government, which shall be republican in its form, for admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of Kansas."

That section makes it the duty of the convention to form a constitution and State government; and, sir, it is a fact, which is known perhaps to every member of this committee, that that law was vetoed by the Governor of the Territory of Kansas upon the ground that it did not require the constitution to be submitted to the people; and was passed by a two-third vote over that veto, and thus became a law. It was under that law that the convention acted. The convention formed a constitution, and have presented it here. Will any one say that the constitution is not republican in its character? I have heard no one say so yet; and, on looking over it, any man must see that it is not only republican in its character, but that it is couched almost in the same language and in the same terms as the most approved constitutions of the other States of this Union. There is nothing irregular in it; and I ask, where was the irregularity in forming it? Before it was formed, an election was held to take the sense of the people as to whether they would form a constitution; and they decided that they would. After that election, and after that popular vote, the Legislature passed the law, of which I have read a part, providing for an election of delegates. Delegates were elected; those delegates assembled in convention; they made a constitution; and now it is said that, because they submitted the slavery clause only, and did not submit the whole constitution to the people, we should refuse to admit the State of Kansas into the Union, although her constitution is republican in form, and correct and proper in every respect.

I ask you, sir, from whom does this objection come? The people of Kansas have been in an unfortunate position; and why? Because, as soon as the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed, there were a hundred members of this House, in the Thirty-Third Congress, who determined that that bill should not have its proper and legitimate effect. It is not the people of Kansas who are to blame. The revolution started here, in the attempt to annul and destroy the effect of a law passed in pursuance of the Constitution, by a majority of both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President. If we are to have laws passed by all the legislative branches of the Government thus overturned by fraud and force, such as has been witnessed in Kansas, and their effect defeated and destroyed by any party in this country, our Government will very soon be brought to an end. Repeal these laws, if you disapprove of them, in the legitimate forum; but instead of that, members of this House, some of whom are still here, openly declared that the Kansas-Nebraska bill should not have its legitimate effect, and that slavery never should go into the Territory of Kansas. We ask if the law was not constitutional? Gentlemen admit that it was constitutional; but, say they, we are so much opposed to slavery that we will defeat the action of the law, we will destroy its effect, even if we do it at the expense of our once glorious Union. Such was the spirit which sent these men to Kansas.

Now, what do we see? At the very first election held in the Territory we find disorders; we find a large number of northern men there, not for the purpose of settlement, but for the purpose of shaping the institutions of Kansas. They refused to go into the election; they refused to go into any election affecting the organization of the Territory into a State government.

Mr. Chairman, I have always acknowledged that principle of law which says that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong. These people went into Kansas for the purpose of shaping its institutions, peaceably if they could, forcibly if they must. When they failed, they refused to go into an election, although they were invited to do so. They refused to go into the election when the people were called on to declare their wishes on the subject of framing a State government. They refused to vote in the election of delegates. They refused to vote when the article of the constitution in regard to the question of slavery was submitted to them. And now they come here, and ask us to reject the admission of the State. And why? The reason is obvious; they do not desire to have this question settled; they desire to keep it open. If you go to Kansas, you will find a small party there—not belonging to the respectable portion of the Free-Soilers or of the Abolitionists—headed by Lane, with his marauders, his murderers, and his house-burners. They do not number more than eight hundred. Take them out of the way, and the whole people of Kansas are in favor of the admission of the State under the Lecompton constitution.

I know it has been said here that a great fraud is about to be committed on the people of Kansas. I am not astonished at the course of the Republican party. They have determined that no State shall ever be admitted into the Union, the constitution of which tolerates slavery. Such is the character of the speeches here. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOMPKINS], and divers other gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject, have declared most unequivocally that no State shall ever be admitted into the Union by their votes that tolerates the institution of slavery. I therefore say that I am not surprised at the course of the Republican party. They act on a principle of their creed. It is on that they live. And yet their course is founded on a revolutionary principle, under which no government can last. I am not astonished at them, for they never professed anything else. They have always operated on the prejudices of the people. They hold their seats here by such means. But I am astonished at another class of members of this House, who have heretofore acted with the Democratic party. In looking at this question, and considering the effect of its result on either the North or South, I am almost led to exclaim—

“What shadows we are! What shadows we pursue!”

I hold that the admission or rejection of Kansas can be of no benefit either to the North or to the South. It is a principle that lies at the bottom of this question; and, if Kansas be rejected, it will be a triumph of that revolutionary spirit which originated all the difficulties in Kansas, which has maintained them, and which will keep the State out of the Union. It will show to the country that that revolutionary spirit is strong enough to oppress one section of the Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the Democratic party of the North should be divided on this question of the admission of Kansas. I had hoped to see the termination of the excitement and agitation on this slavery question. I know, you know, every considerate man knows, that the only way peace can be attained is by concluding the Kansas question. The only way to conclude that question is to admit Kansas into the Union as a State, and then let her people settle their own difficulties in their own way. I care not whether she be a slave or a free State. I care not whether her Legislature is pro-slavery or free-soil. I want the question settled, because it is undermining the Union of these States.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman says that the only way to settle the question is by the admission of Kansas, and allowing her people to settle it themselves. The question I put is, whether, in that case, the gentleman is prepared to have the United States Army withdrawn?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Yes, sir; I answer that question. I have stated my position on that subject heretofore. I say, admit Kansas as a State; withdraw the Army of the United States; and then, if there are any outlaws there who have gone there on account of excitement, let them cut their own throats in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Kansas. [Laughter.] Now, sir, small considerations sometimes lead to important results. Here we are, talking about a question in which, I confess, there is but little except that which looks to the protection of the rights of a great section of the Union.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to propound an interrogatory to the gentleman in the way of compromise. Will the gentleman and his party, in case Kansas is admitted into the Union, vote for a law requiring the President to withdraw the military force from Kansas?

Mr. CRAWFORD. For one, I will say that I wish the army had been taken from there long ago. I would have voted two years ago for their withdrawal.

Mr. SHORTER. And so would I.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I would vote for such a law. I informed the President that I would recommend the withdrawal of the army from Kansas. More than that, I can tell the gentleman that the President, in his message, stated to Congress that the admission of that Territory would enable him to withdraw the army, and to send it to Utah.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am aware of that. The gentleman will understand me as putting the question to him in good faith. I will introduce a bill to-morrow, or some subsequent day, directing the withdrawal of the United States Army from Kansas.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will put a question to the gentleman. If I vote to withdraw the troops, will he vote for the admission of Kansas?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Under the Lecompton contrivance, never!

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I regret, sir, to see this division in the Democratic party in the northern States, because I see no necessity for it. If you admit Kansas, this question must be settled. The people of Kansas are ready, as I am prepared to show, to settle it upon just and honorable terms, satisfactory to themselves and to the whole people of the country. I regret to see these gentlemen from the North, with whom I have heretofore been proud to act, differing from the Democratic party. I do not speak of them now because they are northern men. I find some here from the South who are opposed to the admission of Kansas. I am gratified that there is no Democrat from the South with them. If the Lecompton constitution were irregular in its formation, yet, as it is republican in its character, such is the importance of the settlement of the question, that I hope every man who belongs to the Democratic party will rise above petty considerations, admit her as a State, and thus preserve the integrity of the Democratic party. It is the only means of preserving the Union. I see no means of preserving the Union except through the agency of the Democratic party. I say it not as a partisan. Call me a party man, or what you please; but I say that that party has alone the power to resist that revolutionary spirit which would trample down the laws of the United States, and particularly the law passed in 1854, providing for the organization of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska.

I do not charge this upon the people of the North, for the people of the North are as patriotic as the people of the South, talking the masses of them, and giving them a correct understanding of the questions before the country. What can it be but a revolutionary spirit which attempts to destroy the effect of a law? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOMPKINS] says that, since the repeal of the Missouri compromise, he is determined never to vote for the admission of any State, the constitution of which tolerates slavery. He is determined in his mind that the law repealing the Missouri restriction shall have no effect. Such was the substance of declarations made here; and it was in such mood that the eastern societies were organized, which sent these men to Kansas with Sharpe's rifles and Colt's revolvers to shape the institutions of the Territory. Such a spirit as that must be put down. Such a spirit must not rule, or this Union cannot exist.

I said that there was no cause for a division of the Democratic party in the North on this question. If those who have chosen to differ from the great body of the party upon this question will look to the past history of the country, if they will look to the records which they have made in this House, they will find that every objection made to the admission of Kansas has been previously answered by themselves. The principal ground of objection here is, that there has been fraud in the elections in the Territory. Not only so: they say that the people have not participated in these elections. I ask gentlemen to calmly review their statements. The reason why these people have not engaged in the elections in Kansas is because of their wanton, willful, and revolutionary spirit, which prevented them from participating in any election held under any law of Congress, or of the Territorial Legislature. They openly defied the laws of the country. They openly rebelled against the law organizing their territorial government.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS], who introduced the resolutions referring the President's message to a special committee of fifteen, remarked truly, that we were now entering upon a duty which, no matter how discharged, might inaugurate a train of circumstances of more serious consequence to the country than any that had ever before occurred. I will ask the gentleman, when we have seen all this to be the result of non-action on the part of the free-State men in Kansas, if he is ready to allow them to take advantage of their own wrong, and to keep this country excited on this question for the next four years, or at least until after the next presidential election?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. After a while, when I have read some authorities on the subject, to show how these difficulties originated. I always listen to the gentleman with pleasure. When he investigates a subject, free from prejudice or any influence which could bias his judgment, he goes into the facts with an earnestness which carries conviction with it. I find that the gentleman, on the 13th of March, 1856, in discussing the question of the origin of the difficulties in Kansas, stated that they were easily traceable to their proper sources. He said:

“The origin of this difficulty can be very easily traced, and its history understood. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed by the last Congress, it was at once proclaimed by those who had been most bitterly opposed to its passage, including many of the three thousand clergymen, that, as they had been unsuccessful in their efforts in Congress, they would transfer the battle ground to Kansas. The Black Republican press of the North, and the Black Republican preachers, with that reverend fireman—Henry Ward Beecher—at their head, have declared from their pulpits that they will carry freedom into Kansas by means of revolvers and Sharpe's rifles, and that these implements of death are more effective agents for that purpose than the Bible and the sword of the Spirit.”

He also states that the cause of these difficulties was, that the North had sent, by these Abolition societies, men to Kansas to shape and form their institutions with Sharpe's rifles; that they had incorporated large companies with a large amount of capital for that purpose; and that whatever the people of Missouri had done, they had done in self-defense. And not only that, but after that committee had gone to Kansas, after they had reported, and after that question had been discussed, the gentleman from Illinois again took up the subject and discussed Kansas affairs in general. He said:

“The ink was not dry upon the signature of the bill, before the slavery agitators commenced plotting to prevent a quiet and peaceful settlement of Kansas. Combinations of capital were formed, under the auspices of the Abolitionists, to carry bodies of settlers of their own stripe into that Territory. They passed on through the State of Missouri, and there made their threats and boasts that they intended, after shaping affairs in the Territory, to run off the slaves in that State. The people of Missouri, living upon the immediate border of Kansas, attracted to its soil from their avocations, also pressed into the Territory. Still no difficulties occurred; and even the correspondents of their papers lauded the kindness of the Missourians. [See Evening Post, June 15, 1854.] This would not do; strife is the subsistence of this kind of fanaticism, and strife must be engendered. A change of tactics became necessary. The New York Tribune, the Post, and Times, and all the leading papers of that sort, began to threaten and boast what their free State organization would do with the Missourians and the pro-slavery men. On the 1st of August, 1854, the Post declared that ‘slavery will be overlad and smothered by freedom, if the PLANS ALREADY FORMED BE HALF EXECUTED.’

“Now, let it be borne in mind that no outbreak had occurred; everything was going on smoothly; the Territory was filling up, and all were willing to leave future legislation to a fair expression of the popular will. But here came the announcement of plans and plots ‘already formed,’ which, if but ‘half executed,’ were to overlay and smother out slavery; not by a fair expression of the people, but ‘by plans already formed.’ On the 3d of August, the same print had an article headed, ‘When and where the first blood will be shed!’ showing that there was a determination then to have bloodshed in Kansas, and making a prediction with the sole view to accomplish that result. Then began the arming of emigrants—the organization of secret and sworn lodges—all under the general management of Robinson, who, it is stated in the Tribune of November 3, 1854, ‘was a Garrison Abolitionist.’ Now, I put it to any candid man to say, if with these movements, so begun and so heralded, the people of Missouri would not, nay, ought not, to have become deeply interested, if not excited, in the movements of these crusaders? They commenced a counter emigrant movement, and being near the spot, they sent in the largest number, and the plans were not ‘half executed.’ Then the cry began of outrages, border ruffians, arson, robberies, murders—all charged upon the pro-slavery men, or the Missourians, while their own people were perfectly honest, pious, and harmless. No prejudiced mind believes these statements; and whatever has subsequently occurred, or whoever may be to blame, the beginning and cause of it all is clearly traceable to the emigrant aid societies of Massachusetts and New York, and to the Abolition organs who were acting with them, to promote disorder and outrage, and then turn it to political effect. This was the origin of all the trouble in Kansas; and it has no just or legitimate connection with any particular feature of the Kansas-Nebraska bill."

But he went further in that speech of the 9th of August, 1856, and, in speaking of the Abolitionists, said:

"But they not only went there for the purpose of controlling the legislation of the Territory, but they have organized forces, and marched into the Territory for the exclusive purpose of shaping the institutions. This is proof sufficient that all these difficulties have arisen from the actions of those who act with my colleague in the settlement of that Territory."

That, sir, was the position which the gentleman occupied; and now he comes here in this Congress and votes against his party, for reasons no doubt satisfactory to himself. I do not charge him with voting against the admission of Kansas on the ground that its constitution tolerates slavery; and indeed I think it will be hard for those northern Democrats who have heretofore acted with us, to find a reason for voting as they have done, unless it is—and I do not charge it—that they desire to follow the lead of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. But after taking this ground; after showing the plots and plans of the Abolitionists, and having shown that they had set the day upon which the first blood should be shed; after tracing the schemes of this revolutionary party, which started in the House of Representatives, and doing it with that effect with which he can always do anything he undertakes; we now find him coming here, and taking a position which I contend allows this same people, who had formed their unlawful combinations, who had arranged their plots and plans, and fixed the day on which the first blood was to be shed, to take advantage of their own wrong, and thus to keep this question open until after the presidential election of 1860.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman quotes some remarks I had the honor to make last Congress in reference to the affairs of Kansas. By every word and every sentiment I then uttered, I now abide. I have nothing to add to, or to take from them. The convictions of my mind when I made those remarks remain as they were then; but it is not for the gentleman to put an inference upon those remarks tending to show that I have changed my position, and have now become a defender of those whom I then assailed. The condition and position of parties have changed; and I stand now as I stood then, defending a portion of the people from all assaults from those who have no right to assail them. I said that they were not allowed to manage their own affairs, as they ought to be. I contend now, as then, for the rights of a majority of the people of Kansas. Then I maintained that legitimate emigration to Kansas would have given a certain direction to public opinion; that that opinion had been overthrown by organizations at the North. I defended the people of Kansas from the effect of what I considered to be a forced organization, gotten up to the prejudice of the best interests of the country. Now the condition of things is reversed; and I stand now, as then, advocating the rights of the people of Kansas.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Be short.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no disposition, as the gentleman is asking for his time, to go into a discussion of this matter now, but I trust I shall have an opportunity to do so hereafter, fully.

The gentleman undertakes to intimate that I am following the lead of somebody else, in the positions I occupy. I follow no man's lead. I can state here that I came to this city without having had a word of consultation with any one of my colleagues, either in this body or in the other, either verbally or in writing. I had no more knowledge of their position upon this question than I had of yours. We came here representing the sentiments of our people, and found ourselves alike in sentiment. I could take no other position. But the gentleman is urging me for his time, and I will say no more here, but will take some future occasion to place myself right in this matter.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will now proceed to show and to prove that the people of Kansas, of all parties, desire to be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. After all we have heard here in those papers which have correspondents in Kansas from the northern States, after all the shrieks of these shriekers, as they are called, in reference to this question of slavery—and if there is any man in this House who can speak upon that subject disinterestedly, I can—what, I ask, is the condition of Kansas? They want peace and quiet, and they want to be admitted into the Union, because they know it would destroy the only element upon which Abolitionists there can feed; because they know that this is the only way by which they can be permitted to pursue, in peace and quiet, the common avocations of life. They have wives and children to provide for and protect, and a large number of them, as I can show, are in favor of the settlement of this question; while gentlemen here are opposed to it, because, they say, the constitution is an outrageous fraud upon the people of Kansas. Fraud, where? Nowhere. The Abolitionists did not vote, because they would not vote; notwithstanding they had a fair opportunity to do so, as the record shows.

I suppose it will be admitted that the pro-slavery party in Kansas is anxious to have the State admitted under the Lecompton constitution. I hold in my hand the Herald of Freedom, a Republican paper published in Kansas. [A Voice. It has just been bought up.] Gentlemen say it has just been bought up by patronage. Well, the article I shall read is found in that paper before it could have been bought up. Hear what that paper says, speaking of the New York Tribune and all those northern papers which have correspondents in Kansas:

"The whole tendency of these croaking papers, from first to last, has been to make Kansas what those journals have professed a desire to avoid. Our only hope of saving Kansas to freedom lay through emigration. Their croakings, instead of encouraging emigration, as has been our policy by presenting a gilded future, such as we have full confidence to expect, has only discouraged it by thousands."

"And we know that if any attempt is made to prevent the people from ruling in this matter, they will not be foiled; but, by peaceful means, through legal forms, and without the shedding of a drop of blood, they will take possession of the government, and immediately proceed to institute measures for supplanting it with another."

This does not look as if it had been bought up. That, sir, is one item from the Kansas papers. I ask the gentleman, now, if the Leavenworth Ledger has been bought up?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman asks me, I tell him that I know nothing about what papers have been bought up. They are being bought up so fast that I can hardly keep the run of them. But if the Legislature of Kansas represents the public opinion of the Territory, the gentleman is entirely at fault in his position.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I have here the Ledger, the leading Free-Soil paper in the Territory, and that, too, of the 15th instant, and it confirms the information I have received from all the respectable men I have seen from the Territory of Kansas, and those who are not respectable are not to be believed on any occasion. I read now from the Ledger:

"Let the Lecompton constitution pass, and let the representatives elected be called together and elect the two United States Senators; and the agony is all over."

I read these extracts to show the wrong impression which has been produced by members here, who desire to keep Kansas out of the Union, even though the Union falls. The article goes on:

"True, there may be a faction [referring to Jim Lane's party] in the free-State party, who will not be successful, and may endeavor to keep up this infernal nigger agitation, from the fact that they have been 'ruled out' from a participation in the 'spoils'; but that's nothing; they can be easily choked off and made to bite the dust by the stern will of the people."

Now, sir, the Territorial Legislature is Free-Soil; and there is a circumstance connected with its action that this House ought to know. Notwithstanding all the complaints which have been made of the laws passed by the first Territorial Legislature, the present Legislature have adjourned without repealing those laws when they had the power to do so. They passed an act to repeal them, and the next day reconsidered it, and adjourned sine die without passing it, thus leaving in force the laws of the original Territorial Legislature. But, sir, this paper goes on to say:

"Demagogues and fanatics of both parties are no longer in the hearts and affections of the people, and their 'rantings' and 'roarings' will avail nothing. The people are sick, tired, and disgusted with them, and will listen to their madness no more. We want peace, for that brings us happiness and prosperity."

Here, sir, are the people of Kansas begging to be admitted into the Union, and to be relieved from the control of this revolutionary spirit, led on by the New York Tribune and by members of this House, and we refuse their application, notwithstanding that we have a perfect knowledge that, unless we admit them into the Union, the slavery agitation must go on until, in all probability, it may affect the integrity of the Union itself.

But, sir, a portion of the people of the Territory of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion. There is no question of that; and that rebellion was promoted by that spirit which advised the people of the Territory to repudiate the territorial government. I have here the statements of Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, from the time they entered the Territory up to the 26th of September last. Governor Walker states that the Territory was in a state of open rebellion against the laws of Congress and of the territorial government. Are you not to believe Mr. Walker? If you do not believe Walker, cannot you believe Stanton? But it is said that these statements were made before Walker and Stanton knew what the people of Kansas were doing. Now, sir, I have here the speech made by Mr. Stanton, in the city of New York, a few days ago, in which he says that when he got to the Territory he found the people in open rebellion; in which he says, also, that the free-State party prevented the sheriffs and other officers from taking the census and a registration of voters; and in which he says that they refused to obey any laws passed by the Territorial Legislature, but repudiated them all from the beginning to the end. This was said in his speech, made in the city of New York a few days ago, in which he confirmed all the statements made by Walker and by himself while in the Territory of Kansas. Now, if he was not to be believed while he was in the Territory, is he not to be believed now that he is out of it? I confess, sir, that I have but little confidence in Mr. Frederick P. Stanton. I remember that he was the member who threw the first firebrand into the Democratic party during the administration of President Pierce, in the caucus of the party, and repeated it afterwards in the House of Representatives. My Democracy can never be gauged by that of Frederick P. Stanton, as is proven by the fact that he has turned abolition lecturer, and has gone to the northern States; and I think he had better stay there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one clause in the Kansas constitution to which I wish to refer, but I find that I must do it in a minute or two; it is in reference to the change of the constitution. I do not want to see any conditions put upon the bill for the admission of Kansas. I want her to come in free and untrammelled. I hold that the people of Kansas have the right, under their constitution, to amend, alter, or abolish it in any manner they may see proper, by a majority vote, up to 1864. The Topeka convention, the House will recollect, asked for admission as a State; the Lecompton convention also asked for a State; and that settles the question that the people of Kansas want to be admitted as a State. The Topeka convention provided, in their constitution, that no amendment should be made to that constitution until after 1865. The Lecompton constitution omits that prohibition, but provides that after 1864, whenever the Legislature see proper to change the constitution, they may do it by a two third vote. It is perfectly clear that whatever rights the people have not granted away they have reserved to them; and therefore, until 1864, they have a right to amend their constitution by a majority vote. This right is inherent in the people, and they have expressly reserved it in the Lecompton constitution. Why, then, shall we annex any condition or declaration to the law admitting the State into the Union. It would be a novelty in legislation, and an unsafe precedent, as all who will vote for the admission of Kansas will agree that Congress has no power to control the future action of the people or Legislature of any old or new State of the Union.

I repeat, then, let Kansas be admitted into the Union with her constitution as it is, with no conditions, with no declarations, by Congress. Her people will then have the peace and quiet which they so much desire. The excitement which has been so great a curse to her will cease, and prosperity and happiness will reign throughout her borders.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation bill has now been before the committee for a little over a week. In the few remarks which I made in opening the debate, I stated that this bill was one which could not be amended without the change of a treaty or the repeal of an existing law. The committee seems to have taken the same view of the subject; for, after a delay of nearly ten days, as far as I have been informed, there has not been one word said in relation to the bill. I therefore—though entitled to one hour in which to close debate in defense of the bill—have no occasion to occupy the time of the committee; for, during the whole pendency of the bill in the Committee of the Whole, as I have remarked, there has not been one word said about it. Inasmuch, therefore, as no exception has been taken to the remarks I made in opening the debate, I shall ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill by clauses, and hope the committee will take action on it, and that it may be reported to the House, and passed to-day. After the bill has been read by clauses, I shall ask that it may be laid aside, and that another appropriation bill shall be taken up.

The bill was then read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES asked that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was so laid aside.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not like to make a point of order on my friend from Pennsylvania, who has charge of these matters; but this may grow into a precedent. I therefore raise the question of order that it is not competent for the committee to lay aside this bill and proceed to take up another. The language of the resolution terminating debate on the bill is, that general debate shall close at a particular hour, and that after that, the committee shall proceed to act on such amendments as may be proposed, and report the bill to the House. I believe that the ruling heretofore under such resolutions has been, that the committee having consummated its work, was bound to report it to the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My object in taking that course was to expedite business, and save time. I know this same course has often been taken in committee, although it may have been by unanimous consent, or because a point of order was not raised. My object is to take up another appropriation bill, which it is very important should be passed immediately by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the precedents are both ways. But this bill has been laid aside by unanimous consent, to be reported to the House.

CAPITALIZATION OF SOUND DUES.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now propose to take up House bill No. 271, which is a bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a point of order. Has the Chair decided that the gentleman can make a motion to lay aside the other bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the ruling has been both ways.

Mr. MILLSON. Well, there must be a vote upon it in committee before the bill is laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been laid aside; and the motion now is to take up another bill.

Mr. MILLSON. But I do not understand that this second bill can be taken up before the committee has acted on the motion to lay aside the first bill. My object is to move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House, in order that we may then go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and use the hour that we have yet left before adjourning; this being objection day.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a point of order. I object to the gentleman from Virginia assigning reasons why the House should go into a Committee of the Whole House. The other bill was laid aside by unanimous consent before the gentleman from Virginia raised his point of order. And the Chair decided on the point of order raised by the other gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bo-cock] that, even if the point of order were well taken it came too late, as the bill had been already laid aside by unanimous consent, and as the committee had proceeded to take up another bill. I am now entitled to the floor to make an hour's speech upon it if I please.

Mr. STANTON. Is it understood that the other bill has been laid aside and that this has been taken up by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The other bill has been laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLSON. The question was not put by the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. If it had been, I should certainly have objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair expressly stated to the committee that unless objection was made the bill would be laid aside to be reported to the House, and stated that the Chair heard no objection.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Well; I have a right to supersede my friend from Pennsylvania for the purpose of raising a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rose to a point of order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Yes; but now he says he has a right to make an hour's speech. I want to interpose a point of order between him and his hour's speech.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did not by any means say that I would make it.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The point of order which I now raise, Mr. Chairman, is, that the committee has not the right, by unanimous consent, to lay aside that bill, and to proceed to the consideration of another. A committee is the creature of the House. We are acting here by order of the House; and we cannot, by any action of ours, set aside the order of the House. Suppose the House orders us to terminate debate at two o'clock: can the committee fix another hour?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If my friend will allow me, it is not in order to debate a point of order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I am not going to debate it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Nor is it in order to raise it again after being decided.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I am just stating it. My point of order is, that the House has directed us to proceed to the consideration of the bill and amendments, and report them to the House; and we are bound to carry out that order of the House, and have no right, by unanimous consent, to do anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the precedents may have been both ways. The very convenience of the body would require frequently this course to be pursued. The Chair knows of no rule which prevents the committee, when it has concluded one subject, from passing to another.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The resolution terminating debate requires the committee to report the bill to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether there was a resolution really adopted terminating this debate? If so, let it be read, and it will determine the whole question.

The CHAIRMAN. A week ago this day, when the House was in a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, it acted on one bill, laid it aside to be reported, acted on another, and so on.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand, then, that the bill has been laid aside by unanimous consent, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been so laid aside.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman cannot take the floor from me for that purpose. I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 271) to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, it is important that this bill should be laid aside, to be reported to the House, before the committee rises. It provides for the payment of $393,000, in fulfillment of the treaty entered into between this Government and the King of Denmark in relation to the Sound dues. That treaty has been ratified, and the ratifications of the two Governments have been exchanged. It is the highest law of the land. It took effect on the 1st of April, 1857. The sum provided for in this bill is a capitalization of the Sound dues as set forth in articles three and six of the treaty. The money is stipulated to be paid in London on the 11th day of April next; and unless this bill be passed immediately it will be impossible for our Government to comply with that stipulation. It is a measure which, under the circumstances, can admit of no delay. It is a mere appropriation of $393,000 in fulfillment of treaty stipulation entered into between the United States and Denmark. The money must be paid in London on the 11th day of April next. I hope, therefore, there will be no disposition to put off action to-day. I propose to occupy the time of the committee no longer. I cannot now suggest the time to close debate; but I hope the bill will be passed without the necessity of resorting to any such measure.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have some written remarks which I desire to submit, and I hope there will be no objection to my doing so in the ordinary tone of voice. I am unable to pitch my voice and sustain it higher.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not yet before the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understood the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to argue the propriety of passing the bill. Are the merits of the bill debatable on a motion to take up?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke by the indulgence of the committee. He gave the reasons why it should be taken up.

Mr. MILLSON. I move that the committee rise. I want to get into the House, that we may resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The committee refused to rise.

The question recurred on the motion to take up the bill for consideration; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Chairman, questions of mere economy, those which relate to banks, to internal improvements, or protective tariffs, no longer occupy the public mind. These subjects have given place to questions of more transcendent importance, to those which relate to the rights of mankind, to the religious, moral, and political elevation of our race. The discussion of these rights, which are common to our race, has in all past time been attended with agitation and excitement. It brings the rights of the people into conflict with despotism, whatever may be the form of government under which the discussion takes place. Such is now the condition of this mighty nation; our Union is shaken to its very center by the agitation of great and undying truths. Our Government is vibrating between freedom and despotism, and it becomes us thoroughly to examine the religious basis on which we found our political action.

The late message of the President in relation to Kansas is without precedent in the history of executive communications to this body. Its tone of contempt for the people of that Territory finds no precedent in our Government, or even in the fulminations of European despotism; while the language of the people of Kansas, expressed by her Legislature, is most extraordinary for sovereigns to use towards a servant already arraigned before the tribunal of the popular mind for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Under these circumstances, I have thought that the best service I can render the people on the present occasion would be to analyze the subject which now absorbs the popular mind; and, so far as able, to define the issue now pending before the nation.

That issue is founded upon fundamental religious truths, which are maintained by one political party and denied by the other.

Immediately after the last Congress adjourned, the men who wield the judicial and executive powers of Government publicly denied the great primal doctrine of our Government, "that all men are endowed by their Creator with inherent, equal, and inalienable rights." They essayed to obliterate ate the line of demarkation drawn by our patriot fathers between the despotisms of a darker age, and the rights of mankind as understood in this nineteenth century.

The annual message of the President, in its leading positions and in its details, wholly disregards those rights of human nature, and speaks of men created in the image of God, with undying spirits, with eternal destinies, as transformed into property, in direct contradiction to those truths which the American people have long regarded as "self-evident."

It will be my object to render this issue more distinctly obvious. Its importance is transcendent; and, however fully other gentlemen may have appreciated it, I feel constrained to admit that I have failed to comprehend its vastness, or set bounds to the consequences naturally resulting from its decision; yet every member of society is bound to examine and to act upon his own responsibility.

Our fathers, recognizing God as the author of human life, proclaimed it a "self-evident" truth that every human being holds from the Creator an inalienable right to live, to sustain and protect life, attain knowledge, elevate his moral nature, and enjoy happiness.

These prerogatives were recognized as "gifts of God," lying behind and above human legislation; and the founders of our institutions proceeded to declare that governments are instituted among men to secure their enjoyment. Thus our Republic was founded on religious truth, and it was thus far emphatically a religious Government. It has ever been sustained by the religious sentiment of the nation; and it will only fail when this element shall be discarded by the people. The attempt now made to overthrow these religious truths demands the severest scrutiny.

There are but few men who openly deny the existence of a Supreme Being, or that He is clothed with the attributes of infinite wisdom, truth, and justice; or that men are religious in degree as they bring themselves into harmony with those divine qualities, make them their own, and assimilate their characters to that of Deity. This is the sense in which I use the term "religion." I do not speak as a sectarian. Indeed, sectarians do not regard membership as religion, but merely as the evidence of religious feeling on the part of the individual. All admit that those who are wise, truthful, just, and pure, of all denominations, and men who, possessing these attributes, belong to no particular sect, are the truly religious men of earth.

I will here remark that I am conscious this examination of the religious character of our Government will subject me to the criticisms of all who deny the existence of man's inalienable rights: they will insist that an examination of the religious character of our institutions is unsuited to this forum; that laymen should not tread on this holy ground; but I assert, if there be a place on earth where religion, where wisdom and truth and justice and purity of purpose, should be observed and practiced, this Hall constitutes that place. If there be a class of men on earth who ought to be religious, who ought to be wise and truthful and just and pure of purpose, the members of this body ought to sustain that character.

I repeat, we all acknowledge the existence of a Supreme Being; that he is the Creator; that we are brought into life by His will. At this point, the American people separate into two great parties—one holding that sovereignty dwells alone with the Creator, and not with men; that kings, potentates, and all human governments, are subjected to the "higher law" of the Creator, and authorized to legislate only for the protection of the rights which God has conferred on mankind; another portion deny the existence of this "higher law," and insist upon the perfect and unlimited sovereignty of human Governments over the lives and liberties of the people. To be more explicit on this point, I will remark that the religious portion of our people hold, that, as God gave life to the human race, He conferred on each a right to that liberty which is necessary to become wise, truthful, just, and pure; to bring himself into harmony with the law of God, and enjoy the happiness resulting therefrom; that these rights are equally self-evident as the existence of our race; that they are inherent, inalienable, and common to all men; that they constitute the great moral ligament which binds man to his Creator, connects earth with heaven, and unites the human race in one common brotherhood, bound by the most sacred obligations to love, revere, and obey our Universal Father. Of the possession of these rights every sentient being is conscious. When God created man, and breathed into him the breath of life, when man became a living soul, this consciousness formed a part of his moral nature; and never, in any age or in any clime, has man, even in his rudest, his most barbarous state, been unconscious of his right to live, to nourish, and protect life, and seek his own happiness.

These rights constitute an element of the human soul; they cannot be alienated by the individual; nor can any association of men, or any earthly power, separate the humblest of the human race from them. Men may rob their fellow-man of the food which he gathers for his own support; they may deprive him of the power of self-defense; they may bind his limbs and scourge his body; they may prevent him from attaining knowledge; but his right to the food which he gathers, to defend his person, to attain knowledge, will remain unchanged. Their crimes will in no degree affect his right.

This relation of man to the Creator is repudiated by a portion of the American people. They deny that man holds any inalienable rights from God. They deny that the right to live, to protect life, and to attain moral elevation and happiness, is derived from Heaven, or is superior to human enactments. The denial of these fundamental religious truths I can characterize by no other term than "American infidelity." This first and primal issue literally separates the religious from the infidel portion of our people. In using this language, I do not seek to cast opprobrium upon those who honestly disbelieve the religious truths which Jefferson and Adams and Franklin and their associates termed "self-evident." I have no unkind feeling towards them. I regard them as brethren, entitled to my best wishes, my earnest prayers; and I apply the term "infidel" to them as the only expression by which I can characterize them as a class.

The outworking of this great primal issue is witnessed in almost every important question that comes before Congress. One portion of the members adhere to the central proposition, that man holds natural and inalienable rights from the Creator, which are not to be invaded by human enactments; that they cannot be violated except by incurring the penalties of that law which was ordained by Him who bestowed them upon our race; that every individual who invades these rights of his fellow-man is guilty of crime, and should be punished accordingly; that all human enactments professing to authorize the invasion of these rights are outside the just powers of human governments, are impious invasions of God's prerogatives, are despotic in their character, impose no moral obligation upon any individual, but involve those who enact them in the same degree of guilt with those who perpetrate the crimes; that such statutes can in no degree modify the moral guilt of those who trample upon the rights which God has bestowed upon their fellow-men. The other portion of the American people maintaining a corresponding infidelity, deny the existence of these rights, deny that God has bestowed them upon mankind; they claim unlimited sovereignty for human governments over human rights.

But I desire to call attention to some of those specific rights which are regarded as inalienable and common to all men. Christians and patriots hold life to be the gift of God. They regard it sacred; they look upon its invasion as a crime; that, as the Creator bestows existence upon those who bear His image, it becomes the duty of individuals, of associations, and of governments, to protect each and every human being in the enjoyment of life; that at this point human legislation commences, limited in its appropriate powers to the protection of life, and not to its destruction; that human governments hold no other rightful powers in regard to life than to protect its enjoyment; that the execution of pirates and murderers, and those who invade our country, is allowed only for the purpose of protecting society; that these powers are ordained of God, sanctioned by religion, by philosophy, by the common sense of mankind. They believe that that command which was proclaimed from Sinai in tones of thunder, saying to every human being, "THOU SHALT NOT KILL," was truly the voice of God; that it is repeated in all His works and in every revelation of Himself, and is binding on all our race. This commandment of God, this entire doctrine, is denied by the President and by all American infidels.

In our slaveholding communities enactments have been passed, and are now supported, professing to authorize masters to murder their slaves in certain cases. For instance, in those States the slave is denied the right of self-defense; the right to protect his life or his person. If he attempt to defend himself against the master, the master is authorized to slay him in any manner he may be able; if he run from the master, after being ordered to stop, the master is authorized to shoot him; if he die under the scourge, the master is not held responsible. American infidels believe that no moral turpitude attaches to these statutory murders; while Christians hold that God's moral law remains unchanged by such human enactments; that the guilt of the murderer is in no degree modified by such statutes; that the perpetrator stands unveiled before God and all good men, guilty as he would be if no such laws existed; that all who enact, and all who support such enactments, make themselves accessory to the crimes committed under them, are guilty as such, and ought to be subjected to the same punishment with those who murder their slaves.

But this power of the master over the life of the slave constitutes the vital element of the institution, without which slavery could not exist. It is exercised wherever slavery is maintained. Every master exercises the privilege of driving his slave, in sickness or in health, just so severely as he thinks will best subserve his own interests. It is on this principle that slaveholders openly declare it profitable to work their slaves so hard as to produce the death of the whole gang on an average of five years upon sugar plantations, and of seven upon cotton plantations; and to supply their places by other victims imported from the slave-breeding States. From official documents, it is estimated that thirty thousand human victims are thus sacrificed annually within the United States and Territories.

In the slave States it is not uncommon to see advertisements in the public papers offering a bounty for the head of a particular slave, who has absconded from his master. Even in Ohio, during the past year, a Government official deliberately murdered an absconding slave, and is yet protected from the gallows by those who administer the State laws in the county where the murder was perpetrated. Our Federal troops are often employed in the work of murdering those who are supposed to be fugitive slaves. A signal instance of this character occurred many years since. In a time of profound peace, General Jackson directed our Army to invade Florida, at that time a province of Spain, for the purpose of murdering a people who were born free, but whose ancestors had been slaves; and in one day nearly three hundred men, women, and children, were barbarously and wantonly murdered by American troops.

This system of murder is encouraged and maintained by the present Executive, and by all who support his Administration. They insist that the people of a State or Territory may rightfully enact laws giving to one man power over the life of his fellow-men who have committed no offense; that popular sovereignty is not limited by God's higher law; that it extends with propriety over the life, the liberty, and the happiness of a portion of the human family; that the whites may, with moral impunity, subject the colored people of a State or Territory to degrading servitude, close up the windows of their souls, shut out knowledge from their understanding, hold them in ignorance, and murder them if they assert the rights which God has given them.

This infidelity, within the last half century, has consigned more than a million of innocent and unoffending victims to untimely graves. The number is far greater than has perished under the infidelity of France in all past time. But this comparison of American with French infidelity does great injustice to the latter. In France the victims were uniformly sent to the guillotine under pretense that it was necessary for the public safety. They suffered but little: there was no flogging, no torture. But American infidelity consigns its vic-times to years of torture and suffering, and finally to death, for no higher purpose than to gratify the sordid passions of their individual oppressors.

These wholesale murders are but the outworkings of that infidelity which denies that God has endowed all men with the inalienable right to live. The enactments referred to, and their results, clearly demonstrate the views of those who sustain them, and are laboring in this Hall, and elsewhere, to extend them over our Territories, and wherever Congress holds exclusive jurisdiction. It is most obvious, that while the present Administration openly lends its influence to such crimes, every intelligent man who sustains and upholds its policy, or fails to oppose it so far as able, becomes involved in the guilt of the murders which it sanctions.

But I shall be told that these enactments are confined to the slave States, and that Congress holds no power to repeal or modify them. I reply that the people and statesmen of our southern States insist that slaveholders may carry their slaves, and all privileges which they hold of flogging and murdering them under State laws, into our Territories; and the President, and those who sustain him, declare that the Constitution extends and protects these crimes wherever Federal authority exists. They declare that this system of murder is established by the Federal Constitution, and that neither Congress nor the people of the Territories have the right to punish those who perpetrate such crimes under Federal jurisdiction. Not content with this avowal of doctrine, however, we are at this time sustaining a code of laws for the government of this District which holds to the blasphemy that men may become the property of their fellow-men—may be bought and sold like swine. In these, and in a thousand other modes, is the transcendent question of Christianity, or slaveholding heathenism, made the absorbing political issue in the nation.

But I shall be told that the Supreme Court of the United States have decided that our fathers did not intend to avow those self-evident truths which they solemnly proclaimed; that they really held to the doctrines of slavery which they did not avow. Our fathers could no more change the law of eternal right and wrong than we can. The ordained will of Heaven has existed through the eternity of the past, and will continue through all the future. Men may conform to this law, but they can never modify it or make it conform to the human will nor to human governments. Our fathers sought to make no such modification of the Creator's will.

Had such infidelity characterized their action, it would have imposed no obligation upon the present generation to sustain this system of murder. They have passed to that tribunal which will do them justice. They must answer for their conduct; we must account to God and posterity for our own stewardship, and not for theirs. God, through all his works, in all his laws, by every revelation to man, has prohibited us from murdering our fellow-beings; and woe to the nation, to the statesman, the legislator, the despot, the oligarch, the murderer, who disregards this law of the Most High! I feel humbled and mortified when I see statesmen, ministers, teachers of religion, in this land of bibles and Sabbaths and churches, maintain the doctrine that human authority can repeal this law of Heaven. To me, it is downright blasphemy; derogatory to the character of the Creator and offensive to the religious sense of mankind. Yet, this absurdity is the legitimate outworking of that infidelity which denies "that God has endowed all men with inalienable rights." If He has endowed our race with any right whatever, it surely is the right to live. If this right be denied, no other can be acknowledged. If there be exceptions to this central, this universal proposition, that all men, without respect to complexion or condition, hold from the Creator the right to live, who shall determine what portion of the community shall be slain? And who may perpetrate the murders? The Executive and his supporters say that white men may murder black men. The blacks deny this; God and Christianity and nature, and all religions, all patriotic, all moral men, deny it.

Yet this denial of the right of men to live, constitutes the mildest and least offensive phase of American infidelity. No intelligent person would desire to have the life of his body prolonged for the purpose of being subjected to physical torture, while his intellect shall be paralyzed, his soul enshrouded in ignorance, and his moral nature brutalized. Therefore the right to enjoy liberty, physical, moral, civil, and religious, is regarded even more important than life. Indeed, it is obvious to every mind that life itself cannot be protected unless the individual be permitted to support and defend the physical existence with which God has endowed him.

Religious and patriotic men regard the body as merely the temporary habitation of the spirit, the soul which constitutes the man; to be occupied during its infant state of existence, and used for the purpose of developing the mental faculties extending the sphere of thought and elevating his moral nature, thereby preparing him for a higher and holier state of existence. And when the body shall have performed this service, it is laid aside to mold and return to its mother earth, while the spirit shall live on and on while God himself exists. No injury to the body can, therefore, bear any comparison to the enslavement of the intellect, the degradation of the moral nature of man.

By the established laws of our existence, the body requires food, raiment, and habitation. To each individual are given limbs to bear him forth from place to place; hands to cultivate and gather the fruits of the earth, to feed the body, provide raiment and habitation for its protection; eyes to guide him, and ears to detect danger. These are all held in subjection to the mind, and are put in operation by the will of the individual. The mind itself is constrained to action by an inflexible law which God has ordained for its early unfoldment. Its first care is to nourish, and feed, and clothe the body, to render it a comfortable and pleasant habitation during occupancy. The spirit is constrained, in seeking food, to put the limbs, and hands, and all the physical faculties into operation to satisfy the hunger and thirst of the body, to provide raiment and habitation for its protection. That God has endowed each member of the human family with the inherent and inalienable right to use his own limbs and hands and bodily faculties for these purposes is, literally, a "self-evident truth." It is a truth that cannot be rendered more clear by argument; it cannot be enforced by logic, or made more beautiful by eloquence. But this care of the body constitutes the first lesson, the lowest exercise of the intellect, and is introductory to that eternal unfoldment which was designed by the Creator as the means of elevating man to higher and still higher happiness; for I lay it down as a religious axiom that in degree as man becomes wise, just, pure, and truthful, he approximates that happiness which constitutes the ulterior design of his existence.

That God has endowed every human being with the right thus to enlarge this sphere of thought, and elevate his moral nature, is so obviously, so self-evidently true, that he must indeed be a most arrant infidel who denies it. It constitutes a part of the fundamental proposition that "all men are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights." Its existence is, however, denied by "American infidels;" and this constitutes the second issue between the religious and irreligious portions of our people. This enslavement of the soul presents infidelity in its most revolting features. It paralyzes the moral nature of man; renders the soul sterile and unprepared for heaven. We must wait the day of final retribution to disclose the extent of its enormities.

Yet the body can only be held in bondage by enslaving the spirit, by surrounding it with mental darkness. Permit a man to understand the duties which he owes to himself, to mankind, and to God, and he cannot be a slave. Hence, the whole policy of slaveholding governments is arranged and adapted to the purpose of first enslaving the minds of their bondmen. In most slaveholding communities it is a statutory offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to teach slaves to read the gospel. They are not permitted to read the words of "Him who spake as never man spake;" who declared His mission on earth "to proclaim liberty to the captive;" to raise up the bowed down; enlighten the ignorant; who taught His disciples and followers "to do unto others as they would have others do unto them." A distinguished jurist of North Carolina, while discharging official duties, declared, "a slave is one doomed in his own person and posterity to live without knowledge." He is not permitted to understand the object of human existence. He can have no conception of justice, or wisdom, or purity, or truth. Slaves can have no correct idea of the duties which children owe to their parents; nor of those which are due from parents to children. The parent is not permitted to teach or govern his child; nor is the child permitted to honor or obey his parent.

It follows that the freedom of speech must be restricted among the free people of slaveholding communities. The public mind must be enslaved, in order to maintain the institution. No man is permitted in slaveholding communities to assert the doctrines I have referred to. They are not permitted publicly to utter the truths which lie at the basis of our Government. The policy of those communities is to circumscribe human thought, prevent a knowledge of the duties which men owe to themselves and to their fellow-men. This policy was for many years enforced in this body. Members were prohibited from speaking of the crimes and iniquities of slavery, lest the people should understand the subject, and refuse to sustain such infidelity.

The right of legal marriage is unknown among the slaves. They are not permitted to understand the relation nor the duties of husband and wife. The master sells him who is called husband, or her who calls herself wife, while he retains the other. He sells the parent, and retains the child; or he sells the child, and retains the parent. These separations are but the practical workings of that infidelity which denies to parents and children those inalienable rights which God and nature have bestowed upon them.

Slaves can have no proper conception of the rights of property. Robbed of their own earnings, told they have no claims to the food which they gather, it were impossible for them to conceive of any such right in others. Nor is it possible that such a state of society could exist among our southern population without greatly affecting the morals of the free people. Indeed, the existence of three millions of slaves among six millions of free people must, of necessity, characterize the morality of the entire population. One of the prominent vices of slaveholding communities is the rapid amalgamation of races. The evidence of this vice meets the eye of the traveler at every step in his progress through our southern States.

The legitimate heir of a plantation, on coming into possession of his estate, often sells the children of his father—his brothers and sisters of the half blood—denying that they "have any rights which white men are bound to respect." This infidelity denies the right of six hundred thousand females of our land to protect their own virtue and consigns them to practical prostitution. This state of society is but the outworking of that infidelity which denies the existence of man's inalienable right to liberty and to moral elevation.

It would be in vain for us to say to the Christians of Europe, or even the Mohammedans of Turkey, that religious men of our country support such a system of pollution. Yet thousands of church members, in the slave States, impiously charge Deity with authorizing these crimes, and sacrilegiously endeavor to pervert the holy Scriptures to the support of this infidelity. Newspapers professedly religious lend a silent, and some an active, support to these crimes; while others, even in our free States, openly oppose and denounce all who resist the extension, or expose the enormities, of slavery.

The number of heart-broken mothers, and the torture which they suffer on being separated from their children, the physical suffering from floggings, thumb screws, and all the various means of torture practiced in slaveholding communities, are matters of which we can speak, but of which we can form no estimate. This degradation and suffering constitute the legitimate sequence of American infidelity. If these God-given prerogatives of our race be abandoned, the mother can have no right to the child of her body; no right to the food which she gathers by her toil; no right to the intellect which God has given her; no right to be virtuous, pure, wise, and good; no right to live. I repeat that the religious men of our nation insist that these rights of human nature shall be held sacred, and their enjoyment secured to every individual; while the supporters of American infidelity deny their existence, and proclaim the duty

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 2, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 57.

of human governments to disregard them; and each party will, of course, carry their views into all their moral, social, and political conduct. Mr. Jefferson well exclaimed: "Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure when we have destroyed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that they are the gifts of God?—THAT THEY ARE NOT TO BE VIOLATED BUT WITH HIS WRATH?"

I now pass to the third important issue—the right of all men to enjoy happiness. I need not repeat that the ultimate beatitude of the race constituted the evident design of Deity in creating mankind. Such I understand to be the instinctive conviction of all men. This purpose, this hope, this intuition, is found in every human heart. Men in all ages, in all countries, of all languages, have regarded this as the ultimate object of their toils and labors, the great design of their existence. This beatitude can only be attained by moral culture; by extending the sphere of thought; by understanding the laws of nature, and of nature's God; by attaining a knowledge of His attributes, and conforming to them. To be wise, truthful, pure, and just, is to insure happiness in this life, and in the life to come; and it is a most beautiful feature in the law of our being, that to attain this happiness ourselves, we must respect the right of others to enjoy it; that, as we elevate our own moral natures we necessarily influence others; and as we labor for the welfare and the happiness of others, we most rapidly promote our own. The religious man delights in doing good; he seeks to instruct the ignorant, to elevate the degraded, to relieve the oppressed, to enlighten those who sit in moral darkness, to give to all that elevation of soul which alone can qualify them for happiness. For this purpose schools and academies are established, colleges are founded, tract and Bible and missionary societies are organized, teachers and ministers are employed; indeed, this work of elevating our race constitutes the highest and holiest employment of mankind. For success in this work, prayer is daily made at every family altar; and on the Sabbath our pulpits resound with the solemn, fervent supplication, that God will aid this work; that He will, by the irresistible power of His grace, convert the irreligious, enlighten those whose minds are enshrouded in the darkness of infidelity; that He will relieve the oppressed, comfort the afflicted, and hasten the day when all shall know His will, obey His law, and enjoy His approving smiles.

The infidelity which denies the right of men to attain happiness, that dooms a portion of our race to degradation and torture, to vice and crime and misery, which shuts out hope from the human soul, shocks the conscience and awakens the sensibilities of all religious men.

While Government legislates for the protection of these natural, these God-given rights, they will receive the approval, the support, of all good men, and their laws will be respected and obeyed; but when they legislate for the invasion of these rights, they call up the hostility, the resistance of those whom they seek to oppress. The just and wise and pure of all parties, sects, and denominations, feel the outrage and sympathize with the down-trodden. The great heart of Christendom now beats in sympathy with the enslaved of our land. We feel that sympathy in this Hall; and when we speak for justice and for freedom, we utter the voice of nature; we proclaim the law of Heaven, written in letters of living light upon the tablet of the moral universe. The curse of the Almighty against oppression is equally manifested in the moral and physical condition of every slaveholding community.

The difficulties respecting Kansas, which now shake our Union to its very center, constitute the legitimate outworkings of this infidelity. The right of all men in Kansas to live, to nourish and protect life, attain moral elevation and happiness, had been asserted by congressional law; and under this enactment peace blessed our nation. Infidels, however, said this was wrong; that such rights did not pertain to man; that one portion of the people there hold the power, and may if they choose rightfully enslave another, rob them of their toil, their intelligence, their hopes, their manhood, and murder them if they refuse to obey their masters. And this law of liberty was repealed, and men were enslaved, brutalized, sold like swine. The public conscience was outraged, and all good men sympathized with the oppressed. Usurpation and brute force were resorted to for the purpose of extending and supporting slavery; civil war, devastation and bloodshed followed, and will continue until justice be done, and the rights of human nature enjoyed in that unfortunate Territory.

This line of demarkation, which separates the natural rights of all men from human legislation, was clearly drawn by the founders of our Republic. They established the point at which the appropriate, the just powers of all human governments commence, whatever may be their form. They defined the boundaries of human authority; they acknowledged God as the author of life, the donor of liberty, the fountain from which human happiness is derived. On the denial of these religious, these self-evident truths, American slavery is founded. The slaveholder denies the right of his slave to cherish and protect his own life, to gain intelligence, to unfold his moral nature, to understand God's attributes, and enjoy that happiness for which he was created. To those primal truths he is infidel. To the rights of his fellow-mortal he is infidel. To God's higher law he is infidel. Against these he wages unceasing war. He seeks to rob Deity of His attributes, and man of his God-given prerogatives. He claims for human legislation that supreme sovereignty over the life, the liberty, and the happiness of mankind, which belongs only to the Creator. He thus places himself in hostility to Christianity, to civilization.

This contest is not confined to the United States. These truths are operating upon the hearts of the Russian people. Their Government is in advance of ours. Measures have already been taken for the emancipation of the serfs of that vast Empire, although their condition is far better than that of American slaves. Holland is also moved by these doctrines, and is giving freedom to her oppressed people in her West India islands. England and France have abolished slavery, regarding it as an institution unsuited to the age in which we live. We assert the rights of man wherever he exists. Ours is the cause of Christian civilization throughout the world. Our doctrines apply with equal force to other Governments, to other nations and people. The most illustrious monarch who sways the scepter of human power is really as much bound to respect the inalienable rights of every individual as is the President of the United States. Kings, potentates, and emperors, become despots whenever they invade the rights of the most humble to life, liberty, property, or happiness; kings, potentates, or emperors, who deny the existence of those rights, are as really infidels as are the slaveholders of our Government.

The mere name of "republicanism" gives us no claim to respect, so long as one sixth part of our population is held in degrading bondage. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that if the liberty enjoyed by one portion of our people, and the slavery suffered by the other, could be brought into common stock, and each individual constrained to take his aliquot proportion of each, ours would be regarded as the most perfect despotism among civilized nations. The only advantage which we possess over other nations consists in that feature of our Government which vests all political power in the people. They may, by use of the ballot-box, so modify and shape the administration of Government as best to secure the inalienable rights of each and of every individual.

It is with emotions of gratitude to God, and profound respect for the memory of those who established our Republic, that we refer to the period when, at the very font of our national baptism, our fathers vindicated their claims to national independence, solely upon the religious truths which constitute the central proposition referred to at the commencement of my remarks. They claimed for themselves no special privileges. They spoke, they fought, they bled to establish this universal, this eternal principle of man's inalienable right to live, to nourish his body, protect his life, to elevate his moral nature, and attain happiness. This they proclaimed the basis, the corner stone, not merely of our Republic, but of human Governments generally. The Constitution was framed and adopted upon this then universally admitted principle; but such was the anxious solicitude of our early patriots that, in two years after its adoption, it was amended, by declaring in explicit language: "That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law;" that is, except on trial and conviction before some judicial tribunal. In accordance with these truths one half of the States of our Union proceeded to give liberty to all their people, to protect the inalienable rights of all; but the other States embraced and cherished this infidelity which at length infused itself into our Federal Government, and spread among all classes of our people. Our teachers, our politicians, our statesmen, became unwilling to offend those who had embraced this infidelity. They were received into churches, elected to civil office, and finally obtained control of the Government. All classes of men became affected by this disbelief in God's law and in human rights. It was regarded as disreputable to examine the crimes which this system of oppression upheld; social and political ostracism awaited the man who dared speak disrespectfully of its iniquities.

Eventually individuals appeared who were willing to encounter odium in order to arouse the religious and moral sensibilities of the nation, and in 1856, a national convention met at Philadelphia to devise means for overcoming this moral and political scourge. It embraced as great a degree of talent, as much moral and religious worth, as great political intelligence, as any that ever convened upon the American continent. The members pledged themselves to each other and to the world, to maintain the truths to which I have alluded. These truths now constitute the platform of a large and increasing party.

That day was the dawning of a reformation more deep, more radical, more important in its religious, its moral, its social and political effects upon mankind, than has occurred since the sixteenth century. It is more deep and radical than that commenced by Calvin and his collaborators. It asserts the right of man to religious and moral elevation as superior to the just power of kings or potentates or of human Governments. The great reformers of that age dared put forth no such doctrine. Their lives would have constituted the price of such an avowal. They were constrained to admit the divine right of kings over the liberties of their people, and many of the usurped powers of the church.

The Philadelphia convention will be remembered in coming time as first in the history of the political parties of our nation to make religious truths the basis of its political action, and first to proclaim these rights of mankind as universal, to be enjoyed equally, by princes and people, by rulers and the most humble. It was the first to proclaim the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The result of the presidential election of 1856 showed the advocates of oppression that there was but one alternative for them to pursue. They were constrained to take distinct issue with the advocates of liberty by denying these religious truths, or disband their party in every free State.

The Supreme Court was selected as the instrument for officially avowing this undisguised infidelity. That tribunal was favorably constituted for such a purpose; a majority of its members were slaveholders. Other members had been appointed to office apparently on account of their uniform servility to the slave power; and every circumstance combined to render it the appropriate instrument for performing this work. The time, too, was a matter of importance. No sooner had the Thirty-Fourth Congress adjourned, than a majority of that tribunal, in violation of its own declared rules, digressed from the question before them, to utter its denial of those doctrines of the republican fathers.

But this decision, opposed as it is to the self-evident truths of our Declaration of Independence, to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, to the intelligence and conscience of the American people, is emphatically repudiated by them. The vanity and arrogance exhibited by a majority of the court in charging Hancock and Adams and Jefferson and Franklin, and their illustrious co-peers, with proclaiming doctrines which they did not intend to express, and of failing to utter principles which they intended to avow, has called forth from the popular mind indignant pity for the court, rather than doubts as to the intelligence and Christianity of those savans who founded our institutions.

I shall not argue the absurdity of this decision. Its falsehood is as self-evident as the truths which it denies. Arriving at the conclusion that the distinguished sages who signed our Declaration of Independence meant precisely the opposite of that which they solemnly proclaimed, the court proceeded to declare—in contradiction to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, to the history of the age, to the conscience and judgment of all Christian people—that black men were regarded as having no rights which white men were bound to respect; and on this basis founded their conclusion that Congress holds no constitutional authority to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people in our Territories where it holds exclusive jurisdiction. This atrocious decision attempts to outlaw one fourth part of the human race; to place them without the pale of legal protection; it affects to authorize any and every crime to be perpetrated against them. Under this decision they may be robbed and murdered; their females violated and murdered with impunity; in short, this decision would extend American infidelity, with all its attendant crimes, wherever Federal jurisdiction exists. Thus has the issue been made between the religious portion of the community and those who maintain this heathenism. This issue involved the entire American people. All denominations of men are now constrained to cast their influence on one side or the other. To sit silent, would merely aid the cause of infidelity and despotism. He who refuses to act, by such refusal, casts half his influence in favor of the crimes which I have enumerated. The functions of our Government for the time being, are prostituted to sustain and extend this infidelity. The Prophet of Mecca, nor his followers, ever sanctioned doctrines so barbarous as those which now rule the Administration of our Government. The Turk will be constrained to unite with the Christian in the maintenance of those rights which are sanctioned by the religion of Mohammed, as well as of Christ. Civilized and semi-civilized nations must feel a common interest in the overthrow of this infidelity, which aims a fatal blow at human rights, wherever the image of God is found.

I greatly rejoice that Christians in Europe are sensible of the existence of this war upon human nature. American Christians, patriots, and philanthropists feel the warmest gratitude toward the religious men of Scotland, of England, of France, and Germany for the kind sympathy which they express in this cause, for the very catholic remonstrances which they have addressed to our American Christians against this infidelity. Every lover of truth, every religious heart in our land, must have glowed with gratitude to God and love to man, as he read the eloquent and truthful address of the Christians of Geneva, once the home of Europe's great Reformer, to the Christians of the United States on this subject. And whose heart was not moved when noticing the action of the Protestants of France in relation to it? Nor is this Christian feeling confined to Protestants. The African Institute of Paris, formed for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the African race, embraces among its members distinguished laymen, ministers, bishops, and archbishops, belonging to the Papal Church. My own humble efforts in behalf of our common brotherhood, caused my name to become known to its directors, who placed it on the roll of its honorary members. I take this occasion to thank them for this honor. A Protestant by education, by feeling, I greet those Catholic Christians most cordially as good and worthy laborers in this holy work. Heartily do I thank them for all that they have done, and are yet doing, for the down-trodden of our race.

Could I hope that my remarks would meet the eye of British ministers, I would in an especial manner invoke their official influence against this infidelity. I would beseech them no more to sanction, by their action, that blasphemy which seeks to transform the image of God into property; which degrades man, with his undying aspirations, his eternal destiny, to the level of the brute.

I acknowledge that our Government was dishonored in the eyes of all Christians, when its Executive became the agent and solicitor of those pirates who claimed to own the fathers, the mothers, and children on board, certain slave ships wrecked on British islands, where, thanks to Christian civilization, no slavery exists. The President, espousing the cause of men who deserved the halter and the gallows, demanded compensation from the British Government for their loss of human flesh. Our representative at the court of St. James appears to have misled and deceived the British ministry. In one of his official communications he declared that, "our Government had determined more than once, in the most solemn manner, that slaves killed in the public service of the United States, even in a state of war, were to be regarded as property, and not as persons, and the Government held responsible for their value."

When referring to this assertion of our minister fifteen years since, I pronounced it unfounded and untrue. I said this in the presence of the delegation from Virginia, the State of which our minister, Mr. Stevenson, was a citizen, and I called on them, as his friends, to sustain his assertion by showing some one instance in which this Government had paid for slaves killed in the public service. I declared the whole history of Congress showed that we had in every instance refused such payment, and I defied them to show an exception to such practice. No man met the challenge. I now repeat the assertion. I pronounce the statement of Mr. Stevenson untrue, a libel upon our Government, and a slander upon the American people. I not only declare his assertion untrue, but I declare the opposite to be true. The British ministry, by complying with this demand, tacitly admitted that phase of American infidelity which seeks to degrade the human soul to the level of swine. More recently they paid the slave-dealers the estimated value of the fathers, mothers, and children, on board the Creole, who obtained their own liberty by gallantly taking possession of the vessel and landing on British soil.

The money—the dollars and cents—are of no importance; but concessions to this infidelity, at the present time, are important. It was an object with the slave power to obtain from the British ministry the admission that men are property. I would entreat the British Government, and all other Governments, to maintain the dignity of our common nature. In the language of one of the most eloquent of England's orators, I would say, "He who gave us the forms demands that we shall maintain the rights of men." The Christians of the United States and of other nations would rejoice to learn that the British ministry now, as in 1820, refuse even to correspond with our Executive on the subject of property in human flesh.

I would also warn the Spanish Crown and other continental Powers, that our present Executive is seeking, by all the various means and arts of diplomacy, to detach Cuba from its allegiance, to annex it to the United States in order to increase the influence of the slave power, and add strength to this American infidelity.

I hope and trust that this conspiracy may be defeated; that all Christian Governments may exert their power against the further extension of this scourge of our race. I would most earnestly invoke the Christians, philanthropists, and patriots of this and of every nation and kindred and language, to exert their moral influence, their legitimate powers, for the overthrow, the final eradication of this infidelity from the earth, for upholding the natural, Heaven-endowed rights of man, for the progress, the moral elevation of our race, until all shall understand the will and obey the laws of our common Father, and attain that happiness which constitutes the ultimate object of human existence.

Mr. BOCKOCK obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, debate is not limited, and the gentleman from Virginia, who has the floor, is willing that I shall press the pending bill to its passage to-night provided it is the understanding he shall have the floor on the next bill taken up in committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to submit some remarks on the present bill.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the committee on matters which have been debated before it by gentlemen on both sides of the House. At this late hour, and under the circumstances, I do not care to go on now. The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that he is desirous of having action on the pending bill this evening, and I am perfectly willing to yield for that purpose, with the understanding that I shall be entitled to my hour on the next bill which will come up for consideration in the committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The appeal I have to make is similar to the one I made a short time ago. It is very important that this bill should pass immediately. It appropriates $393,000 in fulfillment of the treaty between the United States and Denmark, the ratifications of which have been exchanged. The bill is not susceptible of amendment unless the House designs refusing to pay money agreed to be paid by the treaty-making power of this Government. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to submit a few remarks on the question. I will not occupy five minutes. I do not care to go on now and I am willing that the committee should rise with a view to an adjournment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman from Virginia be content to take five minutes in the House?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, sir; I will take it in committee. ["Go on! go on!"] My purpose is not to delay action upon this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. I rise to a question of order. There is no amendment pending, and debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Remarks are not in order unless to an amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then, if it is necessary to have an amendment pending, I move to strike out $350,000 of the appropriation in the bill.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the few remarks he made upon this subject when the question was whether we should take up the bill, laid down a doctrine which I cannot approve, and in reference to which I wish to say a word. He assumed that as this bill was the result of the treaty-making power, it was the duty of this House, as a matter of course, and without consideration, to appropriate the money called for by the bill. Sir, it is against that doctrine that I enter my protest.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must insist that my friend from Virginia confine his remarks to the amendment, unless he will allow me to say that he misunderstood me if he understood me to deny the power of this House to the extent that he represents. I will remind the gentleman that in a speech I delivered some three or four years ago, upon the bill to carry out the Mexican treaty, I took the same ground that I have taken to-day. I urged that as it was a bill to carry out a treaty stipulation, unless there was objection to the bill, the House should act speedily upon it. I did not mean to say that if the gentleman from Virginia had serious objection to the bill he had not the right to delay it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman says that he uttered the same sentiments three or four years ago. Three or four years ago! Is that to be regarded as settling the state of the gentleman's opinion now? Look around this House. Are the sentiments of gentlemen to-day the same that they were three or four years ago? I mean no disrespect, of course.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am an exception to that rule.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have no doubt the gentleman's whole course is consistent. I hold, however—and we have very melancholy evidence of it here—that the sentiments of to-day do not, by any means, harmonize with the sentiments of yesterday. But, without dwelling upon that branch of the subject, I will simply say that I recognize it as a clear constitutional right upon the part of this House, or any other branch of the Government, to exercise an independent consideration of every question requiring their official action. If the Senate, if the treaty-making power, if the judiciary, can get along without the aid of the other coordinate branches of the Government, very well. They are supreme within their respective spheres; but whenever this House is called upon to cooperate, and without whose cooperation a measure is inoperative and practically void, we have the right, under the Constitution, to exercise as independent a judgment as any other branch of the Government which calls for our action. Such was the doctrine I was taught by Mr. Jefferson, and such I understand to be the doctrine now.

There is another remark, Mr. Chairman, which I desire to make. This treaty is the first of a class which is wholly new in the action of this Government. We have, by this treaty, purchased the right of Denmark to the navigation of her waters—a right which inures to the advantage of one branch of industry of our people, and the whole people are called upon to pay for it.

Independent of that—independent of the question of justice and equality, it may be the inauguration of a new policy which, once established, will know no limit and no bounds, except that found in the limits of the globe itself. If we have the right to bargain with Denmark for a privilege which she claims as her own in the use of those waters, what prevents our making similar treaties with all the Powers on earth? Ought such a doctrine as that to find favor with the American Congress and the American people?

I make these remarks that it may not be considered hereafter that this policy is inaugurated now without any objection being made to it upon the part of any member of Congress.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859; and a bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark of the 11th April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues; and had directed him to report the same to the House, with a recommendation that they do pass.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question being on ordering the Indian appropriation bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPITALIZATION OF SOUND DUES.

The question now being upon ordering the bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues, to be engrossed and read the third time,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives the reports of the Secretaries of State, of War, of the Interior, and of the Attorney General, containing the information called for by the resolution of the House of the 27th ultimo, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives the information which gave rise to the military expeditions ordered to Utah Territory, the instructions to the Army officers in connection with the same, and all correspondence which has taken place with said Army officers, with Brigham Young and his followers, or with others, throwing light upon the question as to how far said Brigham Young and his followers are in a state of rebellion or resistance to the Government of the United States.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 23, 1858.

The message was referred to the Committee on Territories, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, moved that one thousand extra copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed.

The motion was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FLORENCE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CURRY called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays, and called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and AVERY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 46.

Mr. WHITELEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, Burton Craige, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dinmick, Dodd, Durée, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Gooch, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Hughes, Kellogg, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Mason, Miles, Edward Joy Morris, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Singleton, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Waldron, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, and Winslow—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Avery, Bockock, Brayton, Bufington, Burns, Chaffee, Cobb, Cockerill, Covode, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dean, Dowdell, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gilmer, Greenwood, Harlan, Houston, Howard, Buyler, Jackson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Morgan, Mott, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Phelps, Pike, Ready, Reilly, Robbins, Royce, Sandidge, Henry M. Shaw, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Walton, Warren, Whiteley, and Wortendyke—60.

So the motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, (at twenty minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1, 1858.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending 30th June, 1859; and

A bill (H. R. No. 271) to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the treaty stipulations contained in the third and sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the King of Denmark, of the 11th of April, 1857, for the discontinuance of the Sound dues.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. CLAY presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES PINCKNEY HENDERSON, chosen by the Legislature of Texas a Senator to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Thomas J. Rusk, for the term ending the 31 day of March, 1863; which were read; and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HENDERSON, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, relative to the proclamation of martial law over the counties of Pierce and Thurston, by Isaac I. Stevens, late Governor of that Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. JONES presented the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of restricting the sale of the public lands to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying for a donation of land to the Territory of Nebraska to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river, via the South Pass, to some point in Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GWIN presented resolutions of the Legislature of California in favor of the establishment of a mail route from San Bernardino to Fort Yuma, from Marysville to Forest City, from Auburn to Nevada City, from Sacramento City to Cacheville, from Sacramento City to Stockton, from Union to Orleans Bar, and from Union to San Francisco, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Fanny Tyler to a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of James H. Frost and Eliza A. Johnson, legal representatives of John A. Frost, deceased, late a boatswain in the South Sea exploring expedition, praying to be allowed the extra pay granted to the forward officers of that expedition; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of citizens of Barnstable county, Massachusetts, praying to be allowed bounty land for military services during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of the heirs and representatives of Christoval and Miguel De Armas, praying for the confirmation of certain land titles; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented a memorial of John C. F. Salomon and George W. Morris, inventors and patentees of certain improvements in the construction and fitting up of sailing vessels and steamers, by which the perils of oceanic navigation will be greatly lessened, praying that an appropriation may be made for a practical test of their invention; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWARD presented three petitions of citizens of New York, praying that pensions may be granted to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and the widows of those who have died; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH presented two petitions of citizens of Sandusky county, Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to each of the surviving officers and soldiers who have been in the regular or volunteer service of the United States prior to January, 1848; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of West Elkton, Ohio, praying that the land system may be so changed as to secure the public domain to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER presented the memorial of the board of marine underwriters of the city of Philadelphia, praying that the act of August 31, 1852, under which the light-house board was established, may not be altered; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART presented the memorial of the Michigan State Agricultural Society, praying that a grant of land may be made for the endowment of the agricultural college of that State, and similar institutions in each State in the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POLK presented the petition of Radford, Cabot & Co., praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of orders of the commander of the United States troops in Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the establishment of a territorial government in Carson Valley; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of the enactment of a law granting land to actual settlers in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin in favor of the erection of a light-house at the mouth of Keweenaw river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the erection of a light-house at Keweenaw, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial and remonstrance of the marine insurance companies of the city of New York against the repeal of the act of Congress of August 31, 1852, establishing the light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented the petition of citizens of West Manchester, Pennsylvania, praying that the public lands may no longer be held for purposes of public revenue, and that hereafter they may be reserved for actual settlers only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented four petitions from citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the public lands may no longer be held for purposes of public revenue, and that hereafter they may be reserved for actual settlers only; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee, in favor of such an amendment of the postage laws as will allow persons sending public documents or newspapers to indorse upon them their names; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HARLAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of the erection of a post office, United States court-house and custom-house at Burlington, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the northern boundary of Iowa, at or near its intersection by the St. Paul and Minneapolis railroad, to Sioux City, on the Missouri river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMERS TO BRAZIL.

Mr. BIGLER. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia, setting forth at considerable length what I think is a very powerful argument as to the importance of establishing mail facilities between the United States and the Empire of Brazil and the South American Republics. They regard such facilities as an important agency in advancing our commerce and improving our political and other relations with those people. They refer to an application which has been made to the Government by Dr. Thomas Rainey, for an allowance from the Treasury for the transportation of the mails in steamships between the cities of Philadelphia and Savannah in the United States, and Para in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, Barbadoes, and Demarara; and they say that the proposed line of steamers is a recognized necessity, not only to the city of Philadelphia and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, but to the nation at large, and to the industrial interests of the whole American people; they therefore urgently recommend to the Postmaster General, and to the two Houses of Congress, that the application for a contract and mail pay be granted, and that the line may be speedily established, according to the terms of the petition.

They go on to show that the commerce of the United States with the countries which such a line of communication would accommodate, now constitutes one seventh of the whole foreign trade of the country, reaching the sum of $100,000,000 annually, and that it is not accommodated or aided by a single line of steamers, or a single mail, except that to the city of Havana, Cuba; and that the trade with those countries would, if fostered, rapidly increase and ultimately become richly remunerative to American enterprise. They argue that our country occupies a geographical position, which, but for the absence of facilities of correspondence and communication, would enable our merchants, producers, and manufacturers, to obtain the control of the markets of the West Indies, Brazil, La Plata, the Spanish main, and of northern and eastern South America; and that, while the trade of our country is not rapidly increased with those regions except in our imports, that of Philadelphia, once large and remunerative, has positively greatly declined; and, as the board believe, in consequence of the total absence of business facilities. They regret that letters and passengers from our cities to Brazil, La Plata, and the Amazon, are compelled to go by way of England, Portugal, and the coast of Africa, from two to three times the distance required by the American line proposed, to reach the countries named, and by these means European merchants and manufacturers have an undue advantage of the enterprising classes in this country. The Board feel deeply impressed with the fact that the great city of Philadelphia has no line of ocean steamers; and that, while such lines are evidently essential to the producing, commercial, and manufacturing prospects of the whole country, it would be just to Philadelphia that she should enjoy at least a portion of the steam facilities essential to commercial cities, such as the one which is now proposed to be established. They believe that the plan which Dr. Rainey has proposed, to give equal mail facilities to the Atlantic and Gulf sea-board cities, making Savannah, in Georgia, an indispensable touching point, well calculated to promote the prosperity of the whole country; and they therefore earnestly recommend its adoption. I regard this subject as one of very great importance, and I commend it to the attention of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which I move that it be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Cranston Lammie, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CHART OF WAGON ROAD.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate, for the use of the Senate, any information within his reach concerning the late expedition of Lieutenant E. N. Beale, to open a wagon road from a point near Fort Defiance, in New Mexico, to the western borders of California; and that he be requested to furnish a map or chart of such road.

PAY OF DEPUTY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to inform the Senate the amount which has been allowed and paid to postmasters of distributing and separating offices, out of the postages collected at such offices, under the two provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the pay of deputy postmasters," approved June 22, 1854, authorizing the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to make extra allowances to such officers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register or enrollment to the vessel called the James McIndoe, now owned by Thomas Coatsworth, of Buffalo, New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of commissioners of emigration of the State of New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Dowd, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 171) for the relief of Otway H. Berryman. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William B. Mosely, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 172) for the relief of William B. Mosely. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Petery, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 173) for the relief of Mary Petery. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEARCE. Some days ago, a number of reports and bills from the Court of Claims were submitted to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims. Among them was a report on one claim which is strictly a revolutionary claim. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the case of Joseph Bigelow, administrator of Francis Cazeau, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BRIGHT. My name does not appear among the votes taken on Thursday on the Army bill. I desire to state the reason. It is due to myself that I should do so. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] being indisposed, I agreed to pair off with him, he being against the bill and I for it.

Mr. HARLAN. In justice to my colleague, [Mr. JONES,] I desire to state that I had promised him last Thursday, when the Army bill was pending, to state, if the vote should be taken, that he had paired off with the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] which I at the time neglected to do.

ROME ARSENAL.

Mr. KING. The Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred a memorial from commissioners appointed by the Legislature of the State of New York, in relation to their arsenals and armories, have instructed me to report a bill to grant Rome Arsenal to the State of New York on certain conditions. I should like to have it put on its passage now.

The bill (S. No. 170) was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING. There is a letter from the Secretary of War recommending it.

Mr. BIGGS. I should like to hear the bill read in full, for information.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants Rome arsenal and the grounds adjoining it, at Rome, in Oneida county, New York, to the State of New York, to be used as an arsenal, with the condition that they shall revert to the United States whenever they shall cease to be so used by that State.

Mr. KING. There is a letter from the Secretary of War, making a recommendation that this grant be made, which I will ask to have read. It is a very brief letter.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 28th ultimo, relative to the propriety of turning over the Rome arsenal to the authorities of the State of New York, I have the honor to submit the following views:

The Rome arsenal is no longer needed by the United States for military purposes, and has been, therefore, abandoned; but it is well situated for an arsenal for the State of New York, and for which use she now desires it. I think the general interests of the country would be subserved by turning all the property over to the State authorities, to be held as an arsenal, but to revert to the United States when no longer used by them for that purpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD,

Secretary of War.

Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, Senate.

Mr. KING. The bill, it will be perceived, is in entire accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABSENCE OF KANSAS OFFICIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I submitted, some days ago, a resolution of inquiry concerning the absence of Government officials from the Territory of Kansas. The Senate ordered the inquiry, but a motion was subsequently made for reconsideration. I should like to have that resolution taken up and disposed of at this time, in one way or the other. I move to take up that question.

The motion was agreed to; and the question was stated to be on reconsidering the vote agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BIGGS. I cannot exactly see the object to be attained, or any practical benefit that is to result to the country, by calling on the President for this information. It occurs to me, with due deference to the Senator from Massachusetts, that we are instituting an inquiry of the Executive about which there is some doubt of our constitutional power. This resolution calls on the Executive to ascertain what civil officers are absent from their posts in Kansas, and the reasons for their absence. Now, what practical good is to result from an inquiry of this kind? I inquire whether, in the present state of the question, a motion to lay on the table will be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. BIGGS. I move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. MASON. Will the Chair direct the resolution to be read?

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any officers in the civil service of the United States in the Territory of Kansas are absent from their posts in said Territory, and if so, the reasons therefor.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand that the Senator from North Carolina moves to lay the whole subject on the table?

Mr. BIGGS. Yes, sir. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to be heard, I will withdraw that motion.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot see any reason why the Senator from North Carolina, or any other Senator, should object to a call for this information. It is rumored that nearly all the Government officials in the Territory of Kansas are now absent, and have been absent for weeks from their posts of duty, to the neglect of the public business and to the injury of the people of that Territory. The surveyor general has been absent for weeks, if not for months. I learn that there are sixteen persons employed in his office; and, with one solitary exception, they are all absent from their posts of duty; and I understand that the interests of the people of that Territory are suffering by this neglect. I learn that the district attorney, one of the judges of the court, the mail agent between St. Louis and Leavenworth, the postmaster of Leavenworth—in fact, that nearly every officer in the Territory of Kansas has been absent for weeks, to the neglect of his official duties. I see no reason for this, and I wish to know what is the cause of their absence. I think the Senate and the country have a right to know this.

Mr. BIGGS. It seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts has given no reason why, for any practical use, this resolution should pass. I cannot see any benefit to be derived from it, so far as the public are concerned. It seems to me to be calculated, if not intended, to bring into the Senate of the United States the reasons that control certain officers, or the President, in the execution of his official duties. I do not propose to argue the question, but as the Senator from Massachusetts has now been heard, I renew my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I intended to make a point of order when the motion was made to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the passage of the Army bill. That is the first time, within my knowledge, when such a course has ever been attempted in the Senate, and I submit that it is entirely out of order. You cannot lay a motion on the table. It is not a thing that can be laid on the table, according to parliamentary law. To show the fallacy of it, let me ask what is its effect? This is a privileged question, and a motion to reconsider may be called up at any time when a member can get the floor. Suppose the Senate lay this motion on the table; any Senator can rise the next instant and move to take it from the table. It is a privileged question and will have precedence over everything else before the Senate. You may lay a resolution, a bill, a memorial, or any other such subject, on the table; but the effect of laying it on the table is simply to pass it by for the instant. The next instant, or at any time when there is nothing before the Senate, you may move to take it from the table, and proceed to its discussion. Can you lay a motion to adjourn on the table? I take it, no gentleman will say you can; nor can you lay on the table any other motion. If there is a subject that can be laid on the table, that is another thing. It is in order to move to lay this resolution on the table; and at any time when a Senator pleases, he can move to take it up on the motion to reconsider, that being a privileged question; but to lay the motion itself on the table is not within parliamentary law.

This is a proceeding which has grown up in the other House according to a usage and custom of their own, by which they defeat a measure. If it be moved to lay a subject on the table in the House of Representatives and the motion carries, it is fatal to the question. To move to reconsider a vote and lay that motion on the table is what is denominated clinching it; it can never afterwards be moved.

Mr. SEWARD. Why not?

Mr. STUART. Because the rules of the House of Representatives and the practice of that body prevent it.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it not because it requires two thirds?

Mr. STUART. No sir; it can never be moved; it is fatal to the bill. But, sir, in this body, where there is no rule on the subject except that which makes a reconsideration a privileged question, there certainly can be no such proceeding as moving to lay it on the table. I make the suggestion because the Senate will, I apprehend, find themselves involved in a great deal of difficulty if such sort of proceeding can gain a place here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan raises a question of order, that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is not in order. This resolution was agreed to, and a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to. That brings up the resolution; the two adhere together in such a manner that they cannot be separated, and are before the Senate. The Senator from North Carolina moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; that is to say, the Senate may not desire to dispose of the question to-day, and they have a right to lay it on the table with power to take it up. The two adhere together, and if the motion carries, the subject lies on the table, and is under the control of the Senate. The Chair does not doubt that that is the correct practice.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Chair decide it to be in order to move to take it up again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that it will be in order for any Senator to move to take up the subject again when there is no other special business before the Senate, as in any other case. That is in order, in reference to any business, at any time when there is no question before the Senate.

The vote being taken on Mr. Biggs's motion by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first business before the Senate is the motion to refer so much of the President's annual message as relates to the affairs of the Territory of Kansas to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. GREEN. I move to postpone all prior orders, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GWIN. The special order which has just been announced by the Chair, I believe, has passed away long ago. The first special order is the bill reported by the select committee on the Pacific railroad; and inasmuch as that is the regular order of business before the Senate, I shall vote against any motion to postpone it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say that I am rejoiced to find that the time has come when I can act with my friend from California in favor of his Pacific railroad bill. Some time ago I endeavored to get up the bill for the admission of Minnesota, and have that acted upon in advance of the railroad bill. I did that for reasons which I stated to the Senate at the time, and which are well understood. As between this question now and the Pacific railroad, I consider the Pacific railroad far the paramount question, and I firmly believe, unless that bill is first acted upon, it will be swamped during the whole session, and therefore the friends of the Pacific railroad bill ought to insist on its being taken up.

Mr. GREEN. I do not believe that questions concerning the order of business are debatable; but I beg leave merely to remark that the great question in which the whole country is deeply interested, affecting the peace and harmony of the entire Union, is the question of Kansas, and not one of mere policy with reference to railroads. I hope, therefore, that, according to the common understanding when the Kansas bill was made the special order for to-day, we shall proceed with it, and by so doing it will prove the means of expediting all other business.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will merely recall, on this subject, to the attention of the Senate the facts that occurred last Wednesday. I am perfectly willing to take up the Pacific railroad bill when the time shall come; but we had the Kansas bill before us last Wednesday, and were about to proceed with it, and the Senator from Missouri was to take the floor. There was a discussion between him and the Senator from Vermont as to who should open, and who should close, the debate; and finally, by common consent, (I did not hear a dissentient word in the Senate,) we were to go on to-day with the Kansas bill, the Senator from Missouri opening the debate; and I cannot conceive how we can, without violating the tacit pledge given by the Senate then, now reverse that order of business.

Mr. STUART. I had some informal participation in the circumstances referred to by the Senator from Louisiana. It was in my understanding at that time, that this bill, being made the special order for to-day, at one o'clock, the Senate would proceed to its consideration. In consequence of what I said, as I remarked, informally on that subject, I shall feel myself in honor bound to vote now to proceed to the consideration of that question. I think I may be pardoned for making another suggestion: that no matter what the other subjects are, just so long as the Kansas question stands here, just so long, in my judgment, you will do nothing else; and, therefore, it is good economy to dispose of it.

Mr. GWIN. I was not here when the arrangement was made to which Senators have referred. If I had been, I should have objected to it, as I do now, because I am in favor of proceeding with the regular order of business as it is on the Calendar.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must say that I did not consider there was any common consent, or ever could be a common consent given by the Senate, by all the members of it, that the Kansas bill would be taken up at any particular day, or have priority over any other business. I certainly understood no such thing. The Senator from Missouri moved to make it a special order for this day, as we have made innumerable special orders previously. We all understand, however, that the last special order does not override one before made, but it takes its place on the Calendar behind other special orders before made. There was no objection to the Kansas bill being made a special order for to-day; but certainly I never consented, and never intended to consent, that a proposition to put a constitution on a people against their will should override all other public business, and take priority to the exclusion of everything else. I do not agree with my friend from Missouri, that the peace of the country depends on this question. Every opponent of the Lecompton constitution in Kansas is now at peace, supporting the territorial government. There is no rebellion there, except by the Lecomptonites. Put them down, and peace will reign in Kansas. I shall vote with my friend from California for taking up the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. When the Kansas bill was made the special order for to-day, I did not understand that it was to take precedence of the Pacific railroad bill reported by my colleague. When the motion was made to give this bill precedence to-day, I saw that it created a general laugh on this side of the Senate. I expected my colleague to state the importance of his bill to California; I did not expect that he would take his seat quietly, after the laugh that I heard on this side of the Chamber. I recollect very well that in 1854 we should have had a Pacific railroad bill if it had not been for the Kansas-Nebraska act, which was then before the other House of Congress. The railroad bill was laid on the table for the purpose of taking up the Kansas-Nebraska bill; it remained on the table; it has been on the table ever since. I think if the Senate intend to pass any Pacific railroad bill this session, they had better consider the bill introduced by my colleague, and proceed with it at once.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not think there is any ground for serious complaint or misunderstanding about what has been done in regard to this question. It is understood certainly on this side of the House, that to a large extent the determination on the precedence of measures must originate on the other side of the Chamber to which majorities of the committees belong, and which furnishes the chairman of every committee. It is of very little value for us on this side of the House to propose a special order which involves debate, and we practice only a necessary modesty in abstaining from doing so, because there is always on the other side of the House a chairman to represent the views of the committee to which we belong.

Now, when this proposition to make a special order of the Kansas question for to-day was made by the gentleman who represents the Committee on Territories—the Senator from Missouri—no adverse or rival proposition was made, and therefore it would have seemed factious, as I think, on my part; at least, it would have seemed to indicate an unwillingness to meet the Kansas question, for which I certainly have no affection, if I had said, "No, we will not make it a special order for that day." No person having proposed any other special order for that day, I cheerfully consented that the Kansas question might be assigned for consideration to-day, and asked for myself an early place in the debate. But the honorable Senator from California, the chairman of the select committee on the Pacific railroad, [Mr. GWIN,] to which committee I belong, and whose business it was to interpose and claim precedence in behalf of the railroad, on whom the responsibility rests, and who only can speak to a majority of the Senate on that subject with any effect, seems to have been out of his place when the Kansas question was assigned for to-day; he comes now, however, and asks to have the railroad reinstated in the position to which it was entitled. I think that he is entitled to be heard, and I think that if the question is raised we are brought necessarily to substitute the railroad question, unless we are willing that our votes shall be misunderstood by the country, and unless we are willing to sacrifice a greater interest to a less on some principle of comity, or some idea of informal obligation contracted. I think those who are in favor of a Pacific railroad, are bound to support the chairman in bringing it up.

I quite agree in all that has been said—that if there is to be a Pacific railroad law passed by Congress this year it has got to have precedence; and I shall therefore not feel that I am at all bound to withhold my vote from sustaining the chairman in bringing up that question and in giving it precedence, if we have strength enough in the Senate to do so. At the same time, I hope it will not be considered that I am guilty of any discourtesy or any breach of honor and obligation towards the Senator from Missouri. It is a question on which we must vote according to our convictions, according to our sense of duty to the whole country.

Mr. GWIN. I am not so sensitive as my colleague is to any laugh that may occur in the Senate on a motion I make. I go on the principle that those may laugh who win, and I expect the Pacific railroad bill to pass. When he has been here as long as I have been, and will press the Pacific railroad bill so long and so frequently as I have done, he will find that speeches are not wanted on the subject. Every man, woman, and child in California is in favor of this project. It has been so announced here for six or eight years. That fact is well known. I was not here when the arrangement was made to take up the Kansas question to-day, or I certainly should have interposed; but it is well known to the Senate that when the Senator from Illinois proposed to take up the Minnesota bill, and put aside this special order, I then notified him and the Senate that I would fight him on that question; and it has been known all the time that I would insist on the regular order of business. It was not necessary for me to be present in order to have it known where I stood on this point, because it was known to the whole Senate that I intended, after the Army bill should be disposed of, to call up the Pacific railroad bill. If I had been in the Senate then, I should have given the notice; but I was not here at the time.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am very glad that my colleague is not so sensitive to a laugh that may occur on this side of the House; but I was present in my seat the other day when the Senator from Illinois moved to take up the Minnesota bill, and my colleague sprang to his feet at once, and objected to it, saying that he wanted the Pacific railroad bill to be considered first. If my colleague had allowed the two Senators from Minnesota to take their seats on this floor, he would have had two more votes for the Pacific railroad bill. I have discovered, Mr. President, by conversing with gentlemen on this side of the House that the Pacific railroad bill will receive very few votes on this side of the Chamber. I think it is the duty of my colleague, if he expects to pass this bill at the present session, to use every means in his power to take it from the table at an early day, particularly before the Kansas bill shall be considered; for I suppose that bill will occupy fifteen or twenty days of the session, and it will be idle after that to think of taking up the Pacific railroad bill and passing it through this body and the other House before the adjournment of Congress.

It is very true that I have not occupied a seat in this body as long as my colleague; and perhaps, when I have been here a few years, I shall not be so sensitive as I am at the present time. I am very thankful to my colleague for reminding me of that fact.

Mr. GREEN. I surely could not anticipate anything like opposition to the motion I made, because it is well known to every Senator present that there is no business affecting the public interests that can progress until we get the Kansas question out of the way. I expected to see the Senator from California [Mr. Gwin] interpose his objection to put himself right on the record; to be upright in court. That is well enough. I have no objection to that; but serious objection to the consideration of the Kansas bill to-day, according to the order made on last Thursday, is what I did not anticipate. I trust the vote will be taken, and that we shall see whether this question is to be gotten rid of or not.

Mr. POLK. I feel it due to my position in regard to the Pacific railroad bill to say that when the time comes to act on that subject, I trust I shall be found as warm a friend of that enterprise as any gentleman in this Chamber, on either side of the House; but I am well satisfied that the best and speediest way of obtaining the sense of the Senate on that measure, is to get out of its way the question of Kansas, that has stood in the way of every important measure that has been before the Senate at this session up to the present time. I hope, therefore, that the general understanding of last week, that the Kansas bill should be taken up to-day, will be adhered to; and when that is disposed of, we will go on with other important measures that have been defeated hitherto by that question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, which is as follows:

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas, by their representatives in convention assembled at Lecompton, in said Territory, on Monday, the 4th day of September, 1857, having the right of admission into the Union as one of the United States of America, consistent with the Federal Constitution, in virtue of the treaty of cession by France of the province of Louisiana, made and concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803, and in accordance with the act of Congress approved on the 30th of May, A. D. 1854, entitled, "An act to organize the Territory of Kansas and Nebraska," did form for themselves a constitution and State government, republican in form; and the said convention has, in their name and behalf, asked the Congress of the United States to admit the said Territory into the Union as a State, on an equal footing with the other States:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Kansas shall be, and is hereby, declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: beginning at a point on the western boundary of the State of Missouri, where the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the eastern boundary of the Territory of Utah, on the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning: Provided, That nothing herein contained respecting the boundary of said State shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with such Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territories shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the State of Kansas, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said State, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to make if this act had never passed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchasers and grantees thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever, upon them, or other property of the United States within the limits of said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance of the said constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants which were contained in the act of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 23, 1857.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken, and an apportionment of representatives made, the State of Kansas shall be entitled to one representative in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is in the usual form of bills admitting new States, without any peculiarity; and it does not require any extended explanation. The object designed to be accomplished is shown by its title to be to admit the State of Kansas into the Union as one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy. The bill is predicated upon a state of facts embodied and presented in the report of the Committee on Territories. These facts justifying the bill, make out a case themselves, and render any elaborate argument, or any extended explanation, wholly unnecessary. Indeed, so far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly willing to trust this question to the present judgment of the Senate. There are those, however, opposed to it, who would take it perhaps as rather unkind not to give them some pretext of justification for their speeches, by some opening remarks; and I therefore avail myself of the present occasion to do so, more out of deference to those who desire to reply to me than from any wish on my part to occupy a single moment of the time of the Senate.

I trust I shall never shrink from duty or shun responsibility; and if duty demands of me to make any explanation of the report further than it explains itself, I am ready to do so; but I do not conceive it to be necessary. It stands unassailed, the leading, controlling facts stated in it cannot be successfully controverted, though some of them have been evaded in publications, not by authority, but in the shape of minority views. I say they have been evaded; but I still think the positions assumed by the report of the committee stand unassailed, and it would look like a work of supererogation to add anything to what has been said in that report. I may, however, be permitted, on the present occasion, to make a personal explanation; and I do it because I do not like to obtrude myself on the attention of the Senate, except when I legitimately have the floor for debate.

I find in the New York Tribune some very severe strictures and some very false statements with regard to the action of the Committee on Territories. It is assumed that the majority of the committee made a positive promise to the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Vermont not to report until the succeeding Monday after the report was actually made; but that, in violation of this agreement, the report was precipitately hurried through, and those gentlemen were compelled to present their views without having had a fair opportunity, in violation of the agreement. I take this occasion to state what the understanding was. On Monday the committee met, and I was not quite ready with the majority report. We had been at work on it, but had not succeeded in completing it, though I had just added the last words of the first draft. I desired to have it copied. I had been urged to be ready. Not being ready, I desired a meeting on the succeeding Tuesday. On Tuesday the committee met. My report was ready; the Senator from Vermont had his ready; the Senator from Illinois said he was not ready, and he asked for a postponement. He said that we should have a meeting on Thursday, and he would, if he possibly could, be ready on Thursday; but he asked no extension of time beyond Monday, even if he should not be ready on Thursday. The Senator from Vermont made this remark immediately: "That is like the old preacher giving out a notice of his sermon. 'I will preach next Wednesday, the Lord willing; but on Sunday, whether or no.'" [Laughter.] I relate that matter here, because it will bring the circumstances to mind, showing this: the report will be made on Thursday, if possible; but on Monday, whether or no. The majority of the committee assembled together, and consulted the matter over. There was no positive postponement to Monday; there was a positive postponement to Thursday, when it was to be ready, if possible. We resolved that we would, if possible, report on Thursday. To stimulate the Senator from Illinois, and to keep him from being taken by surprise if we should insist upon a report, on that day, I voluntarily wrote him a note, after he had gone not over fifteen minutes, and had it sent to him by the first mail that went out. I did this, as I thought, out of extreme courtesy. I know I am sometimes censured for the extremes to which I go on that subject; but still, I think I did right then.

Having done so, to allow these garbled and false statements to go out that we violated agreements, took him by surprise, and perpetrated a fraud, is an injustice under which I am not willing to labor, or to submit to. That Senator was ready on Thursday morning; he was not only ready but he had sent off a copy of his report six hours before the committee met, and yet when the committee did meet, he voted against making a report on that day. I do not think we perpetrated any very serious wrong on him. I did not notify the Senator from Vermont. That, too, is commented upon. The reason of it was that he announced that his report was ready.

Mr. DOUGLAS. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I should like to put myself right on this point, if he has said all he intends to say on it.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. On the Tuesday to which the Senator refers, the question arose whether we should or should not be able to report on Thursday. I stated that I did not believe it would be possible for me to be ready at that time, and I referred to the circumstances that had prevented my attendance at the Senate, and had kept me up for many preceding nights. I said that I was worn out, and did not believe it was possible to go through the mental labor and be ready at that time, but that by Monday I should be, and that I would guaranty that the committee might report then, if sickness or any other cause should prevent me being ready before Monday. We agreed that we would meet on Thursday, and read over our reports so far as they might be completed. I stated that I thought I could have my argument blocked out, but still I should wish to go over and revise it, and be ready by Monday to make a report. My understanding when we separated was that we were not to report until Monday. I so stated to all who asked me, that we should meet on Thursday to read what we had prepared, but not to make a report until Monday. It is true, I received the notice from the Senator, as he states, on the evening of Tuesday.

Mr. COLLAMER. Please state that notice.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I requested you to get a copy of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I know; but I could not lay my hand on it. I believe I recollect the words. It was: "It is the unanimous opinion"—

Mr. GREEN. "Desire."

Mr. DOUGLAS. "Desire of the majority of the Committee on Territories"—underscoring the word "unanimous"—"to report finally on Thursday morning"—underscoring the word "finally"—"I deem it proper to give you this notice that you may not be taken by surprise." I think those are about the precise words.

Mr. GREEN. Very nearly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I saw at once that a change had taken place since the adjournment of the committee that day—first, it was the unanimous opinion of the majority; second, they were to report "finally" on Thursday, the word "finally" underscored; third, the notice was given to me that I might not be taken by surprise. I think it is very clear that this would not have been necessary, unless it had been the understanding of the committee that very day that we were not to report until Monday.

Mr. GREEN. Do you say it was the understanding not to report until Monday?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was my understanding that we should not be able to report on Thursday, and I so stated when I came out of the committee room, to all persons who inquired of me. That was my understanding; others have their understanding. I do not understand it for anybody but myself. I was asked if I could be ready by that time. I stated that I did not believe it was possible for me to be ready then. I said I would be ready, if possible; but I did not suppose it would be possible. On receiving this notice from the Senator, I went to work and labored night and day. I was at work on Tuesday night, and until about four o'clock on Wednesday morning. Again, on Wednesday night, and until between three and four o'clock on Thursday morning, when I stopped writing. I was not able to read it over to see if there were incongruities or not; for I had not time to revise it. There were two clerks, who followed me with each sheet as I wrote it; and between three and four o'clock in the morning of Thursday, I stopped. There were, however, three or four points omitted, that I had intended to discuss; and the report was left unfinished. I had worn myself out by writing a day and two nights constantly, without more than three hours' sleep, till I could not bear the fatigue; and I closed there, and said to those clerks, "I must send this; let it go in its rough state, if I cannot be permitted to revise it." I did want to read it over, and revise it. I did desire also to discuss one or two other points that were not noticed in the report. I stopped several pages short of where I intended to stop in the report, because of the notice from the Senator from Missouri. In regard to the article of which he speaks, I have not seen it. I know not what it contains.

When I came out of the committee room, I stated these facts in regard to the understanding that we should report the next Monday. I was coerced to report sooner, and I performed the duty as well as I could. The report was not exactly what I should wish it to have been. When the committee proposed to report, I voted against it. Being out-voted, I submitted, of course, as I was compelled to do. I saw, too, (what I did not know before,) that a new member of the committee had been appointed, so as to be sure to have a majority that could overrule me if I was not ready. That being the case, I brought my report to a conclusion, submitted it imperfect as it was, and allowed a clerk to follow me sheet by sheet, and take a copy for the press at the same time that I wrote it; but I had no time to run it over, and read it over again; and hence it went in the imperfect condition in which it was before the committee.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, there is not much difference in the statement of facts between the Senator from Illinois and myself, except on one point: his understanding was that we should report on Monday; the mere relation of the anecdote repeated by the Senator from Vermont disproves it. It was that we would report, if possible, on Thursday, but if not possible, on Monday anyhow. That was really the agreement. My note to him was extremely guarded. I did not say it was resolved by a majority; I did not say it was the opinion of the majority; but it was "the desire." It was to hurry him, if possible; and if he could not be ready, we should take no advantage of him. He having got ready, and sent off his report to the Tribune six hours before, still voted against presenting it to the Senate, in order to have a chance to read it over and smooth it off. I wonder who would examine the proof-sheet at the Tribune office, of the copy which had already been sent, and smooth that off? But enough of this. I have made a statement sufficient to show that no unfairness was practiced towards the Senator. I know that we were more anxious to report to the Senate, and get the subject up before this body, than he was; but I think he will do me the justice to say that I have extended to him every right that I would ask him to extend to me under similar circumstances.

The bill, however, is before us. I have a substitute to propose for the entire bill. I will now merely give notice of it; for, like the Senator, I desire to read it over, and see that it is what it purports to be; but I shall lay it on the table before the Senator from Vermont, who is to follow me, gets through. I will state now its purport and object. It is for the admission of Kansas, as the bill before us is; and, in conjunction with it, for the admission of the State of Minnesota. The two being united together, we shall have the consideration of both at once, and see if we cannot progress and expedite the business that has heretofore retarded the other business of the country.

Now, Mr. President, why need I detain the Senate with any explanation in regard to the position of affairs in Kansas? The Senator from Illinois, even on a motion affecting the priority of business, has to travel so far out of his way as to speak of Kansas, and to speak of our action as an attempt to force a constitution on her people against their will. It may be his opinion. When he undertakes to make a speech in opposition to it, or write a report in opposition to it, let him use such expressions if he chooses; but to travel out of his way, and voluntarily to thrust before our attention expressions like that, I take to be unpardonable. This is a Senate of equals, I trust; equal States represented, and equal men to maintain the rights of their respective States; and I do not like to be characterized with a side blow as attempting to exercise tyrannical power in forcing a constitution on a people against their will. It is a misapprehension of the power and duty of Congress. Congress forces no constitution upon Minnesota; Congress imposes no constitution upon Minnesota; Congress forces no constitution upon the people of Kansas; Congress imposes none upon them. Their constitutions are matters with themselves; and when presented here, we are not adopting a constitution for either one of those two States; and nothing but the most egregious error with regard to the political policy and constitutional rights of the Federal Government and the States, could lead one into the use of such language. Impose a constitution upon them! Adopt! Accept! These terms, too, have been falsely used in debate by Senators who know they are inapplicable to the subject, and inappropriate to convey the proper idea. Constitutions are presented; States make application for admission. In each case the question is, is this a State? Conceding our sovereignty, giving our assent, will it be a State? If a State, is the constitution republican? These questions being answered, we neither approve nor disapprove the constitution; we neither condemn, nor accept, nor adopt; we do not impose a constitution upon that people in any case whatever.

It is important to keep this distinction before our minds in the discussion of this subject. If the constitutions of all the States in the Federal Union should be brought before us to undergo our scrutiny, there would not be one but would have some provisions in it to condemn. But the constitution of Kansas is republican. That is not controverted. With regard to the sufficiency of her population to entitle her to a State organization, it is a conceded fact that the Constitution of the Federal Government stipulates no particular number. The ordinary practice of the Government is, to have a population equal to the ratio of Representatives in the House of Representatives; but I believe it will not be controverted that the population of Kansas is now sufficient to entitle her to a State organization. There are other reasons, strong and powerful and overwhelming, enough why, even if the population should not amount to the number of ninety-three thousand, we should depart and relax from the ordinary rule, for the sake of the peace and harmony of the country.

It is not, as the Senator from Illinois said, all peace and quiet in Kansas now. There are strifes and contentions, there are difficulties that are enough to harrow up the feelings of the human soul. There are perplexities besetting them on every hand; and without some action which will give them an organism of their own and prevent a reliance on external aid, either from Massachusetts, Missouri, the Federal Government, or elsewhere, these difficulties will be perpetuated. Even so late as this morning, I received information of murders and assassinations led on by the party favoring opposition to the Lecompton convention; and when the Senator from Massachusetts made his inquiry about the absence of officers there, I could hardly restrain myself from giving him a little piece of information which I received this morning. General Whitfield is a Federal officer there. This morning I learned the fact, and I state it in the Senate, that he received notice from the anti-Lecompton men to depart the Territory or they would assassinate him. This might give some little reason to account for the absence of some of the Federal officers.

It is useless to cry peace, when there is no peace; but there is an easy way to solve this difficulty. As their boundaries are not exceptionable, as the constitution presented is republican, as the population is sufficient, is it then a legal constitution? I say, yes. In the first place, it emanated from the people. The people are the source of power in all government; but the people, although they are the source of power, cannot, except through the forms of law and equality, exercise their power so as to make a constitution. It does not follow, because the people are the source of power, that they can abrogate all the forms of law. They can only exercise their power in and through the forms of law; and hence, in the State of Kansas, the people directed the first vote to be taken. To place this in contrast with what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has said, will, I think, turn the scale in favor of Kansas. He made use of these remarks:

"The people of a Territory which is about to be formed into a State, have a right, and so far as my examination has gone, Congress never violated this right, to say in the first place whether they desire to form a State government now or not."

This has been uniformly decided. Mark, he says the people have a right to decide it. I make this broad assertion—for I have, in the course of my examination on this subject, discovered nothing to the contrary—that in no single instance, except in Kansas, did the people first decide that question for themselves in the process of the change from a territorial to a State organization. In Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Minnesota, and all the other States where they had enabling acts, the enabling act said this preliminary question, as to whether they would have a State organization or not, should be decided by the convention. The Senator from Michigan assumes that to be of vital importance. If so, Kansas, in that respect, has consulted the people more fairly (if it be more fair to consult them in person than through their representatives) than any other Territory ever did before. This source of power thus deciding in favor of a State organization, the form of law had to be made use of to make it effective, equal, uniform, and just. The form of law was therefore given by the Territorial Legislature, their agents, and representatives. A convention act was passed providing for a registry of the voters, for a census of the people, and for the election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution. The registry was had. Complaints are now made that the registry was not fair. I have shown that nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one votes were registered. I have shown that less than three thousand votes remained unregistered. I have shown that the officers were driven out of some of the counties and prevented from executing the law. I have shown that many of the voters refused to permit themselves to be registered. I have shown that the whole wrong in the failure of a complete registration is with the anti-Lecompton party—the opposition to the admission of Kansas under the constitution adopted by the convention at Lecompton.

These are facts; but it is said, and said by the Senator from Illinois, and even by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who is usually so very fair that I seldom have anything to do with him except to differ in judgment, and not about facts, that nineteen counties were represented in the convention, and nineteen unrepresented. I hold it to be the duty of Senators, in the presentation of any case, not to make an impression to the prejudice of what might be the true state of facts when they are drawn out. When the remark is made simply that nineteen counties were represented, and nineteen unrepresented, what would the public think? That half were unrepresented; but that is not so. Of all the votes in the Territory, less than three thousand were not registered. The counties not registered, and the counties not represented, contain less than fifteen hundred votes. I state that in the report of the majority, and I adhere to it, for it is true. If you will take the list of counties in which no registration was had, and compare it even with the last vote returned on the 4th of January, you will find there were only one thousand four hundred and twenty-three in all of them together. On that occasion there was a different elective franchise for voting—no residence was required; the requirement was simply that they should be bona fide inhabitants, including citizens and aliens; whereas, under the convention law, under which this registration was made, the persons registered must be citizens of the United States, and they must have had their residence in the Territory from the 15th of March preceding. For the election of the 4th of January no qualification was required, except simply the fact of residence; you required them to be inhabitants; you did not even require them to be citizens of the United States, owing allegiance to our Government; you let all in, and with this increase brought to swell your numbers, you got but one thousand four hundred and twenty-three votes in these counties.

Thus I say, first, whatever wrong was done resulted from the misconduct of the opposition; second, that wrong is magnified by representing so many counties. Why, sir, I assert here to-day that Clay, Dickinson, and Washington counties have not a single inhabitant up to this hour. You include them in the nineteen, and they are to swell this equality in the comparison of registered and unregistered votes. Not one single inhabitant this day have these counties, nor did they ever have, according to my information. They were created at the close of the session of 1857. That fact will be found in the volume of Kansas laws before me, if it is desired to look at it. Then several other counties were attached to other counties that were represented, and had the privilege if they chose to make use of it. Weller county was attached to Shawnee; Anderson and Franklin counties had their officers driven off by Abolitionists; and Allen had attached to it Greenwood, Hunter, Dorn, Wilson, and Godfrey. (See page 183 of the statutes of 1855.) Breckinridge county had attached to it Wise. (See page 90, session acts of 1857.) So you will discover that but few districts were unrepresented, that many counties were attached to those which were represented, and that, whether this was so or not, only about one thousand four hundred and twenty-three votes could be mustered up in the counties which it is said were unrepresented, when under the loose, broad provision to which I have alluded, double the number voted that possessed the regular qualification to be registered.

These are facts. I am only stating them to counteract the false impression this loose statement is calculated to make on the public mind abroad, that nineteen counties were unrepresented, being half the Territory. That is not correct; the number is less than I have stated it. Whether this, however, were so or not, I say the law provided the legal means of registration. The law says the registration shall first be by the sheriffs, and in case of vacancy in that office, it shall be by the probate judge; and in case of vacancy of all these officers of the county, in the first instance, for the discharge of this duty the Governor has a right to appoint others. The then Governor of the Territory was not friendly to the party calling this convention; and surely if the other officers had declined to act, he had power to cause a full registration of his friends by the appointment of his own partisans to perform the duty of registration; but when the forms of law have given them the right, and they stand aloof and refuse to make use of that right, if law is to be respected, if rule is to be regarded, if system is to be consulted, we must turn a deaf ear to the complaints of those, who, from their own wrong, stood aloof, and afterwards raise the cry of injustice.

When this registration was completed the Governor of the Territory, who was then Mr. Stanton, made the apportionment. This apportionment, of course, was fair. He would hardly stultify himself, and of course his friends here will hardly take a position that would be dishonorable to Mr. Stanton. I take it, therefore, to have been done honestly and fairly. The whole sixty members of the convention were parceled out to the registered counties and those attached to them. The election was legally conducted; the members were legally elected; they assembled under legal authority; they met in convention.

Here, it is said that, from Anderson county, three members were elected and sent up, and they were refused admission. I answer, first, that the registration was not legal; second, if it had been legal, Mr. Stanton had omitted that county in parceling out the representatives, and the law limiting the number to sixty, beyond that number it would be impossible to go by the admission of others; and thirdly and finally, they were not refused admission. The application of these delegates were presented by Judge Elmore, I believe; it was referred to a committee of five; they reported in favor of admitting them, although the convention act had limited the number to sixty; they subsequently withdrew their application, and it was never passed upon by the convention. There was no expulsion, no refusal of seats.

One other fact, as I am giving a historical account of this matter, should not be overlooked. The law provided that, after the registry had been made, it should be copied, and put up in a number of public places in each precinct. The whole list, as made out by the officials, was open to public inspection; every man could go and examine it. If he himself was omitted, he had a right to go before a court, prove the fact, and have his name inserted. If any man was improperly listed, who ought not to be listed, who was not entitled to rights under the law, on proof of that fact before the court, his name would be stricken off. For one whole month there was an open court in every county where they desired to avail themselves of the benefits of this law. So far as I have examined, I have never seen a law that made more ample provisions for fairness, for justice, for equality.

As to the manner in which it was executed, of course we have differences of opinion; but the law itself was good and just. The convention, then, when it met, formed the constitution; they adopted it for themselves; they submitted it not to the vote of the people for ratification. It will be remembered that one of the causes of complaint against the convention is, that they did not submit the constitution to the popular vote. When the convention act was passed, Governor Geary vetoed the bill, because it did not require the convention to submit the constitution to a popular vote. Hence the public were notified; the public knew what to expect. It is of no use to tell me that the convention was under an obligation to submit the constitution to a popular vote; for the facts and the law are directly to the contrary. Governor Geary had vetoed it, and yet two thirds of both Houses passed it over his veto. What had the people a right to expect from this? The convention was under no obligation; it was a matter for the convention to consider; and, as I have heretofore said, I repeat, if the legislative authority of the Territory could dictate to the convention on one point, they might undertake to dictate as to other points; they might undertake to tell them what the constitution should be; and that would defeat the whole purpose of appealing to the people to elect a convention, in order to form a constitution. It must emanate from the people, not the Legislature. They, however, deemed it proper to submit the slave question. It was submitted. I know that the views of the minority represent this submission as being unfair and unjust—saying that each man was compelled to vote for the constitution, and was not allowed to vote against the constitution. That is incorrect; and it is a little surprising to me that the Senator from Illinois should so misunderstand the position of his own friends. He quotes largely from the subsequent action of the present dominant party in the Territorial Legislature of Kansas. He even sends up the preamble and resolutions passed by them; one of which resolutions disproves the position taken by that Senator, as well as by the Senator from Vermont. It is this:

"And whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in this acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof."

The complaint here is that they submitted it unfairly. The complaint there is that they refused to submit it. They did not submit it. The constitution was finally adopted, save and except one clause—that sanctioning African slavery. The article on the subject of slavery was submitted to a direct vote of the people. Here let it be borne in mind, that when the clause on the subject of slavery was submitted to a vote of the people, it was submitted to the whole people, whether they were registered under the registry law or not. There can be no complaint that nineteen counties, having no inhabitants, were disfranchised at this vote; there can be no complaint that any individual in the Territory was disfranchised. All had the unrestrained privilege of coming up and giving utterance to their thoughts and their wishes on this subject; and if any one did not choose to avail himself of that privilege, it is no reason why we should illegally undertake to correct what they have illegally been the cause of consummating. If the men opposed to slavery have the majority, as they assert, they could have voted out slavery; but it seems to me their object was to let it be voted in by the pro-slavery party, and then, if possible, defeat the whole constitution, and keep up turmoil and confusion, to answer the ends of wild speculation appealing to the fanaticism of the East. Speculation in Kansas, aided by fanatical societies in the East, the one feeding the other, is the mode of procedure on the part of this party in Kansas.

It is not my purpose and object to put a check to legitimate speculation. I have no objection to it. What is done fairly, without endangering the peace of the country, and without injustice to fellow-citizens, let it be done; but when town sites and the locations of capitals of new States are to be parceled out, and a wild furor is raised to rush in a population on the pretext of excluding slavery, and yet they will not exclude it when they have the power, but will keep the question open, this discloses the object with which the whole movement was undertaken, to wit: to fan the flames of excitement for political ends, for pecuniary reward, for speculation. To accomplish this, Governor Walker says they could not succeed simply by appealing to the common sense and judgment of the people, but they had hired mercenaries sent out there. When the legal authorities have extended the privilege of voting, of registering, of acting, of deciding, even to mercenaries; when they have had that privilege, and, by the dictation of their superiors, did not exercise it, shall we stay our action and perpetrate a still greater wrong? I trust not.

It has been said, however, that the vote of the 4th of January for State officers remains yet in doubt. Why, Mr. President, I should like to see the Senator who would rise in his place and say before the country that we have a right here, individually or collectively, to inquire what the vote of any State is for its State officers. Where is the man who will give utterance to such a fallacy as that? He cannot be found. Why, then, make a complaint over a subject with which you have nothing to do? The vote on the 4th of January, on the constitution, was an illegal vote. Why? The constitution was perfected, complete before. Can the Legislatures of New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia, annul their constitutions by submitting them to a vote of the people? They cannot. If the prior steps of the Lecompton constitution be binding, be legal, be such as we can sanction by admitting them into the Union, all the proceedings subsequent to the 21st of December last, when it was completed, are null and void.

It is, however, said that the vote on the 21st of December was an illegal vote. It is so said in the statement of the Senator from Illinois; and he says it is illegal for two reasons: one is, because the Territorial Legislature, on the 17th, had passed a law postponing it. Could the Territorial Legislature, on the 17th, interfere with the people? A convention of delegates is equal to the people, and it is just the same as if the people themselves were acting. They act not in their own name; they act as mere agents. The people cannot be interfered with by a Legislature. Neither can the people's agents be interfered with by a Legislature. The people had delegated special authority to the convention. No subsequent proceeding can annul it, until it is exhausted in its exercise. Then subsequent proceedings may be instituted, growing out of the like authority, conducted in like orderly, legal manner, for changing that constitution. That is another point.

But his other objection is, that the Lecompton convention had no right to pass an election law. I had supposed it was well settled and well understood by every Senator here, that a convention of the people, if a legal body at all, was clothed with power to perfect the ends for which it was brought into being. There can be no question about this. Hence, it had power to pass an election law, and every convention that has ever met in this Union has passed such laws. Even the Minnesota convention passed laws. It said, all laws of the Territory, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall be continued until altered, amended, or repealed, under the State government. Is not that legislation? Do you not, in the schedules of all the constitutions made by all the conventions in this whole Union, uniformly find the same provision? They are clothed by the people with the same power to perfect their work. The people have a right to continue in existence old laws under the new organization. The people delegate that power to the convention. It is invested with full power to perfect the end for which it was brought into being, and no other authority on the face of the globe can interfere with them. Not the whole Federal power brought together can stay their hand or check them in their career, when they legitimately proceed to the consummation of the end for which they were called into existence.

I know it is said, however, that this constitution does not embody the will of the people of Kansas; and this is made the great pretext for the opposition to the admission of that State. What is the public will, as contradistinguished from the making known of that will in the forms of law? I know no public will except as that public will comes through the channel of the law. Then it falls upon the ear with its commanding influence, and none of us can be deaf to its commands; but the wild cry of the infuriated mob is not the people's voice, and we can never in this method ascertain the people's will. It is through the channels of the law, purified, kept chaste, kept holy, that we are to ascertain the people's will. When the people go to the ballot-box and deposit their votes, the people's will is known—not always perfectly. Imperfection stamps all that is human; but, according to the common consent of the human race, it has been found by the wisest statesmen on the face of the earth that this approximates to the best method of certainty in ascertaining the people's will.

Here we have had first an opportunity in voting whether there should be a convention or no convention, and the people's will said, yes, there shall be a convention; second, there was an opportunity for the people to elect delegates to a convention, and the people elected their delegates, clothed with power unrestricted and unrestrained; third, the people had power to vote whether they would have slavery or no slavery, and we hear the voice of the majority again, six thousand seven hundred and ninety-five voting on that question. It may be, for aught I know, though I am not willing to concede it, that there are more opposed to it than six thousand seven hundred and ninety-five. There is one thing I am satisfied of, that the vote of the 4th of January, at which they pretend they had a large majority—ten thousand against the constitution—is not only void, as I before remarked, but that it is spurious; they have not the number in the Territory. The reason why I think so, I shall postpone until a future period, and present it in a more tangible shape, if it should be necessary.

Thus the people's will has been made known. The constitution, so far as we have a right to know anything legally on the subject, is the people's constitution, and embodies their will. The power of amendment I have heretofore spoken of. I have not a single doubt on that subject. The people have the right; but, mark, the people must exercise it in an orderly, legal manner. I know that some say it is an anti-republican constitution because the people's hands are tied up until the year 1864. When Indiana was admitted, that complaint was not made. Indiana said no change in her constitution should be made for twelve years after its adoption, and then after that, only once in twelve years thereafter, [Mr. JONES. Iowa said so, too,] and yet they were admitted. Why is it we cannot have as much liberality on these subjects towards Kansas—"bleeding Kansas," if you please—to heal her wounds and restore peace? Why not be just? Why not extend the same rule to her, and say it is a matter with the people, and with the government of that State, and not a matter for the supervision of Congress?

But look at the hypocrisy—I must use a harsh word, and apply it to those to whom it properly applies in Kansas—of those who say that is evidence of its being anti-republican, when their own Topeka constitution, in favor of which the honorable Senator from Vermont made an elaborate report, and thought the good of the country required the Topeka constitution to be here regarded as the constitution of the State of Kansas, and the State admitted under it, with a population then less than twenty-five thousand, said there should be no change in that constitution until the year 1863, one year longer than this of Lecompton. That was all right, proper, just, republican—peculiarly republican—and was supported not only by Republicans, but by those who have a Christian name (black) attached to them. Now, however, when Kansas comes up with a constitution which does not say it shall not be changed until 1864, what do we find? The constitution of the Topeka convention said no change should be made until the year 1865; the constitution of Kansas says after the year 1864 changes may be made in a certain method. Some argue that before the year 1864 they may be made in other methods than those mentioned in the constitution; but after the year 1864, they can be made only in a certain manner, as therein stated; but I care nothing about these legal quibbles. I have ever held this to be the true doctrine: that whenever a government undertakes to reform itself, it must comply with the constitution which prescribes the mode; but whenever the people, through their legal organization, choose to call a convention and exercise their original rights, they may disregard the constitution altogether.

The constitution does not consist of one clause only, but you must harmonize it all. One clause says the people have an inalienable right at all times to alter, change, amend, or abolish their constitution. Another clause says after the year 1864 the Legislature may do so, taking the initiative towards an amendment of the constitution. Give force and effect to these two provisions, and to what point do you arrive? That if the Government itself undertakes to change the constitution, it must follow the mode pointed out in the constitution; but if the people instruct their Legislature to call a convention, it is an exercise of original power declared sacred in the constitution. You must give force and effect to that provision as well as to the other, and giving force and effect to both those provisions, we necessarily come to the conclusions I have stated.

But again, the people cannot be cheated out of their original right by incorporating into the constitution the only mode in which the people can change it. I will illustrate: some constitutions say two thirds of each House, at two successive sessions, may make changes in the constitution. If the governing power undertakes to make a change, they must have two thirds of each House at two successive sessions, to comply with the constitution; but while this may be the mode in which the government may change itself, the Legislature can pass a law, at the instance of the people, saying the people may elect members to a convention representing themselves, and make their own constitution in their own way. This original right is clear and indisputable when I state it in this way; and they cannot be cheated out of it by incorporating into it the only mode in which the people can act; for their right is older than the constitution, anterior to the constitution, and cannot be tied up or conveyed away by the constitution. The right of self-government is not the right of a mob; but it is the right of change, of improvement, of amendment, to be exercised in a legal, orderly way. I cannot recognize the right of a body of men, gathered in a tumultuous assemblage, and disregarding the lawful authorities, undertaking to change their constitution; but, through their members in the Legislature, they have the right to call a convention, and in that convention they have the right to a voice that shall reform every provision which they deem obnoxious.

Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say on these subjects. I have discussed them fully before, and I have only said this much now, because I wish to treat the Senator from Vermont with no discourtesy, and he insisted that I should make some opening remarks; in other words, say something which should constitute a hook upon which he might hang his speech. Having done that, I shall wait further discussion, and before the close of the debate I may have occasion to meet objections that may be brought up in the further continuation of the debate. I ask leave to have printed the amendment I shall propose, and which I have already indicated.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has said that he very seldom has occasion to disagree with me in matters of fact. That may, perhaps, be somewhat complimentary; but I desire to ask him to turn to that portion of my report in which, as he says, I speak of nineteen counties not having been registered. I am indeed somewhat particular in relation to my asseverations of fact; and on that point I am a little sensitive, perhaps unnecessarily so. I think the gentleman must have confounded some other thing with that. In my report I said nothing about nineteen counties. I wish to put that statement right before I proceed with the case. What I did say on that point will be found at page 84 of the document containing the reports in this case.

Mr. GREEN. Here it is on page 66.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is not my report.

Mr. GREEN. I find, on examination, that page 66 is part of Judge DOUGLAS's report.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is another man's work. I said no such thing in my report.

Mr. GREEN. On page 84, in the report of the Senator from Vermont, I find this statement, in regard to the census and registration:

"This was, by accident or design, very imperfectly done in many counties; and in almost half of the counties, some of which were among the most populous of the Territory, it was entirely neglected."

This is still more objectionable than as I presented it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman said that I had stated that nineteen counties were not registered. I have made no such statement.

Mr. GREEN. The idea is there.

Mr. COLLAMER. I said nothing about any number. I said that the census and registration which was ordered to be made in Kansas was very imperfectly done in many counties, and that in almost one half the counties it was neglected entirely. That is not a matter of dispute. The gentleman says that I have declared that some of these counties were among the most populous counties of the Territory. They clearly were, some of them; and if the Senator will turn to the catalogue of votes which is quoted in the report of the Senator from Illinois, he will find that the counties not registered had some fourteen hundred votes. This point, however, is rather a digression; but I wished to set it right before proceeding with my remarks.

Mr. President, I am fully aware that a large part of the members of the Senate, and probably a considerable number of the community, regard this as a very worn out and threadbare subject; and they desire to have even the Lecompton constitution adopted, so that it may be ended. They desire that they may get rid of being troubled with this matter, not to examine into it carefully and see what they should do, but to avoid the examination of it at all. I must acknowledge that I participate a little in that species of feeling myself. I am, I will not say exactly lazy, but naturally a little tired; and I do not like long, tedious investigations; but, after all, I do not feel disposed to shove them aside merely for my ease. I remember an instance of that kind in a book which we all ought to know. A certain judge made a resolution that he would avenge a certain widow of her adversary, for a certain reason: that is, because by her much coming she troubled him. Some may say, "we will end this subject of Kansas in this way, because, by its much coming here, it will trouble us." Who was that character? He was called the unjust judge, that neither feared God nor regarded man. A just judge should proceed to the examination of the subject, though by much coming it wearies him.

Mr. President, there are, in the progress of nations and of men, occasional points of time, and occasional hill-tops of the journey, which present to us contrasts so very striking that they will command the attention even of a very indifferent observer. These hill-tops in our journey which thus arrest our attention and present their contrasts, afford us an opportunity to look back upon the progress we have made, and upon the footsteps by which we have advanced to it, and to look forward, too, from the same point to the progress which we may calculate upon in the future. The contrast which is presented to us in relation to the action of Congress on the subject of slavery in the Territories is between the present time and four years ago. How stood this subject on the 1st of March, 1854; and how stands it now? The contrast is a very great one; and it should command the attention even of an ordinary and casual observer. In order to have that contrast presented with some distinctness to the mind, and to enable us to view how we have obtained this difference of position, and to look forward from it to the degree of progress which we are calculating to make in the future, would require some considerable length of time; but still I think it ought to be presented.

Prior to the year 1854, Congress had, by acts of legislation at various periods, settled the subject of slavery in every inch of territory that this country owned. I do not say it was all done at one time, by one act; but by a succession of acts, making together an entire complete arrangement. How stood it then? In the territory which we acquired from France, all that portion of it south of the line of 36° 30' north latitude was open to slavery or not, as the people who might inhabit it should choose. In relation to all that country which we had acquired by our treaty with Mexico, it was arranged that the States formed out of that territory should be admitted as free States or slave States as their constitutions might prescribe at the time of admission. The condition of Oregon was settled and declared to be against slavery, and all the territory acquired from France in the Louisiana purchase north of the line of 36° 30' was dedicated to freedom, and had been for a third of a century.

Occupying that stand point, could any man, looking at it in its then condition, have anticipated that in four brief years the whole of this adjustment would be utterly destroyed, all these arrangements of peace obliterated, and that north of 36° 30', then almost utterly uninhabited, he would find what the President tells us is this day the State of Kansas, a slaveholding State, as absolutely such as South Carolina or Georgia? Is not that a very striking contrast? Is it not a contrast that must command the attention even of a casual observer, and demand of us that we should inquire how this has been effected?

In order to understand the nature of the arrangement of which I have spoken, we have to inquire who made it? from what authority did it spring? who exercised that authority? and how long had it been exercised? It was the action of Congress legislating on the subject of slavery in the territory beyond the limits of particular States. When did it begin? It began with the Government; and it was exercised at every stage of its existence, under the administration of almost every President that occupied the chair, by every political party that has ever been in power. I do not say that it has been exercised in any one particular way, but the power has been exercised; and it becomes us a little to ascertain how, in what manner, and at what period. I shall not go into any very great detail on this point; I have had occasion heretofore to do so. Beyond the Ohio, all things were settled according to the arrangement of the ordinance of 1787. That ordinance was ratified by Congress; and as new Territories were formed, in consequence of new States being admitted from that region, the ordinance was reënacted, and slavery was prohibited in every Territory formed northwest of the Ohio river. This was an exercise of the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the Territories.

When they came to legislate in relation to a country where slavery existed to any appreciable extent, did Congress leave it to the people there to be a topic of discord and contention among them in their infancy, and in the gristle of their youth? Not at all. To say nothing now about the case of the cession by North Carolina of that which now makes Tennessee, let me take the case of the Mississippi Territory ceded to the United States by Georgia. Slavery existed in that Territory, and did not Congress legislate about it? Certainly they did. Let it always be remembered that no principle on earth is better settled than this: that the power to regulate a thing includes the power to prohibit it. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to lay an embargo, and to lay an embargo unlimited in time: it has so been decided. Congress legislated on the subject of slavery in the Mississippi Territory in 1798, during the Presidency of the elder Adams. In forming the territorial government for Mississippi, where slavery existed, and where Georgia had ceded it on the condition that it should not be abolished, Congress regulated the matter and prohibited the importation into that Territory of slaves from abroad. Congress could not constitutionally do that in the States until 1808; but ten years before that time they prohibited it in that Territory. That was legislating directly and expressly on the subject of slavery in the Territories; regulating it.

In 1803, after the acquisition of Louisiana, Congress, in the formation of the Territory of Orleans, made three leading provisions on this subject. Slavery existed in that Territory. It existed extensively in the lower part of the Territory—extensively, I mean, in proportion to the population. Congress provided, in the first place, that no slaves should be taken into that Territory, except in families for settlement. Did they dream that they had no power to prohibit the introduction of slaves into that Territory? They never dreamed of it at that day; for it was further provided, that if slaves should be taken into that Territory for sale, they should be thereby freed, and the men bringing them in should be subject to penalties. Was not that directly regulating and prohibiting the importation of slaves into that Territory? Clearly. They went on further to provide that no slaves should be taken there even in the families of their masters for settlement, if they had been imported in the United States since 1798. The meaning of that was this: "We told you when we formed the Mississippi Territory, that we, the General Government of the United States, where we could lay our hands on the importation of slaves, would prohibit it; you understood that; and we now tell you that if you have brought any slaves into any of the States after that expression of our opinion, you shall not take them into this Territory of ours."

Little of trouble, little of controversy, between the different parts of the United States, arose on those occasions. They went on quietly by a sort of common consent until the admission of Missouri, in 1820. Then a difficulty arose; then there was a controversy; and what was done? Congress found great difficulty in settling it; but they followed a very early example. "Abraham said unto Lot, let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen, for we be brethren; if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or, if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." A line was drawn through where they stood, and Lot looked out upon the great plain—then a great and rich plain of Jordan—and he journeyed to the east and occupied it, and the controversy ceased. How did our fathers do in 1820? There was a controversy between their herdmen; and they said, let there be no strife between our children, for we are brethren. They ran a line and the strife ended. All was peace from that time until we got some more territory, which we acquired by the treaty of peace with Mexico. There had, however, in the mean time, been another acquisition—Texas—about which I do not propose to speak at large now; but on that occasion the same line was run, and no controversy existed on that point.

In regard to the acquisitions from Mexico, some difficulty arose; and it is said now, and much insisted upon, that on that occasion a principle was established which required the repeal of the Missouri compromise in 1854. I have even heard it repeated this session, that the reason why the Missouri compromise was ultimately repealed, by the exertions of the South and the northern friends who joined them, was because they proposed to extend that line through the territory acquired from Mexico, and the northern people would not agree to it. What a strange excuse is this! The question we are discussing in these days is, had Congress power to prohibit slavery in any part of any Territory? because, if they had, they could prohibit it in all. Did not those men who made the proposition to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, thereby agree that north of that line slavery should be prohibited? Certainly they did. They then granted and tried to exercise that very power. They seem to talk now, however, as if there were no reasonable excuse for the northern people not agreeing to the extension of that line. I do not know that they really desire to disguise the truth about that; but the whole truth should be told, if any is, because I hold that the truth half told is a lie.

In California and New Mexico—which were acquired from Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—slavery had been abolished. The law existing there was the law of freedom. In a conquered country all laws, except those which cannot be enforced on account of political relationship, remain; all those laws that describe, guide, fix titles to property of any kind. The country which we acquired from Mexico, including California, New Mexico, and Utah, was all dedicated to freedom. Can it be possible that gentlemen of the South can say there was anything unreasonable in the representatives of the free States declining to vote to dedicate it to slavery, when it was already free, and would remain so unless its status was changed? I observe that the Senator from Louisiana is making a suggestion; perhaps it is a very important one.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator's remarks in the slightest degree. I was merely suggesting to his colleague that his argument might be turned the other way. If he will reflect for a moment, he will see that we got Louisiana, all slave territory, and they took half of it; and it was not a very unreasonable thing for the South to ask for half of the Mexican acquisitions, that he says were all free.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no doubt that the gentleman's ingenuity can turn any argument against any man. The suggestion was more loud, perhaps, than was intended; and I did not know but that the gentleman was somewhat in the condition of the lawyer who kept talking loud after the decision of the judge. The judge told him there was no use of arguing after the decision had been made. He said he was not arguing, he was only cussing the decision. [Laughter.] The gentleman, it seems, does not like my argument. Suppose two men buy a field, and divide it by an east and west line; and they afterwards buy another field: does it necessarily follow that the same line should run through the second field, without regard to its locality, or the circumstances attending the case? Not at all. But that is not the main point. The point is this: because they could not agree upon the further extension of this line, does that furnish any reason why one side should say it would take back all that it ever agreed to give? Did that afford any reason to the South to say, "we agreed to the division of the Louisiana purchase; we have had our share; we have had Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana admitted as slave States; we have used up pretty much all our share; and now we tell you of the North that if you will not divide the new acquisitions in the same way, we will keep all we have got, and break up the old settlement too?" This constitutes no reason at all; there is nothing in it.

But, Mr. President, though there was controversy in relation to the territory acquired from Mexico, that was settled before we came to that point of time when the contrast of which I have spoken, as contradistinguished from the present time, is presented. In 1850, after various controversies, the disputes in reference to the territory acquired from Mexico were settled and arranged. California was admitted as a free State; and territorial governments were formed for Utah and New Mexico, declaring that, whenever the people of those Territories should be admitted into the Union as States, they should be received with or without slavery, as their constitutions might provide. These acts of 1850, with some coordinate acts passed at the same time, were insisted upon as a finality. The great point of that arrangement, its great virtue, consisted in the fact that it settled everything that had not been settled before. Though it might not be satisfactory to all the northern people, yet after all it was upon the whole reconciled to the people, because it was said it settled the matter, because it ended the controversy; because there was to be no more strife "between thy herdmen and my herdmen, for we be brethren."

There we stood in 1850; there we stood in 1854; all was peace, all was quiet. But, sir, in May, 1854, the Missouri compromise line was declared to be inoperative and void; not because it was unconstitutional, but because it was said to be inconsistent with the compromise measures of 1850. We are not left to imagine the reason for the declaration that the Missouri compromise line was inoperative and void, because the reason of the act was put into the belly of the act, and it was declared that it was repealed because it was inconsistent with the compromise measures of 1850, when the fact really was that the existence of that line was one of the compromises; it was the basis of them; it was that without which there could be no finality. I thought then, and I think now, that, to say the least of it, this act was a great blunder; and Tallcyrand said that in politics a blunder is worse than a crime. I have various reasons for thinking so; but the controversies which have resulted from it, the condition of the country ever since, and the condition of the country to-day, speak in a language more potent than any I could use, to show that it was a blunder. It is deeply to be regretted; but I suppose it cannot be corrected.

The essential qualities which enter into the objection to that act consist in this: there was a quid pro quo for the contract called the Missouri compromise. It was of the essence of a contract. The South received their part, and have kept it; they have got their cake. The North had barely entered on the wilderness which they took in the first place; they had formed a single State, Iowa, from it, and the rest yet remained a wilderness. It was the disregard of that agreement; it was saying, "we will get more, and not restore what we have had," which constituted the apparent immorality of it, and which leads the people of the North to view it as a breach of contract, a breach of faith. I know there was constitutional power to repeal it; and I have heard it argued sometimes by those in high authority, that, because Congress had power to repeal that compromise, nobody ought to complain when they did repeal it. A man who can reason in that way is a man who seems to have no moral sense, no standard of right and wrong, except that of the legal power to do anything. There is no reasoning with such a man. A moral sense so blunted as his cannot be reasoned with.

All the measures of which I have spoken were southern measures. The Missouri compromise particularly was essentially a southern measure. The way to decide whether any measure is the measure of any party, or any section, is to ascertain whether a majority of that party, or section, vote for it. A very large majority of the southern Representatives voted for the Missouri compromise line. It obtained a small minority from the North, enough to secure the requisite majority in Congress to pass it; but the majority of the southern Representatives supported the measure. That made it a southern measure, and it was clearly such. The compromise measures of 1850 were of a similar character; but they are now both disregarded, both broken up.

What was proposed in 1854 as a substitute for this legislation? All these measures were acts of Congress on the subject of slavery in the Territories, begun and continued from year to year, and from Presidency to Presidency, at different epochs, through the whole period of our political history. All this was to be set aside; and what was to be substituted in its place? We had had a great deal of difficulty on this subject in Congress; and it was not deemed advisable to agitate it in Congress any more; but instead of that it was proposed that the subject should be turned over to the people who might settle in the Territories, and that they should be left perfectly free to regulate their institutions in their own way. That was the substitute. It is sometimes called popular sovereignty and sometimes squatter sovereignty; but, at any rate, it was the substitute for the previous course of proceeding. From the words in which that principle was couched in the Kansas-Nebraska bill at the time it was passed, how did the world understand it, and how was it intended that the world should understand it?

It was declared that the Missouri compromise line, being inconsistent with the compromises of 1850, was inoperative and void, and that by this declaration it was not intended to legislate slavery into the Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form their institutions in their own way. How should the world understand that? How was it intended that it should be understood? Clearly, words cannot make it any plainer than those employed. It was that the people who go there to settle shall be left free as people of a Territory, to regulate their institutions in their own way. That was the version put upon it throughout all the free States, and by the Democracy. It was insisted everywhere that it commended itself particularly to the acceptance of a republican community, that that people should regulate their own affairs just as they pleased. It was said, "we do it here in Massachusetts, in Vermont, in Illinois, and why cannot the people of Kansas do it just as well as we?" Mr. Cass assured the people of Michigan that, as he understood it, slavery could not go into Kansas unless the people of Kansas made a law authorizing it. Not only do the words of the act imply that the question was to be left to the people, while a Territory, to settle for themselves, but that was the version put upon it everywhere, and the community were commanded to receive it with acceptance and delight, because of that principle.

Then what did it amount to? It was an invitation to the world, to all men everywhere, "come ye into this Territory of Kansas and there act together as a people, and arrange, discuss, and settle the condition of your domestic institutions as you please." That was the invitation. It was to leave it to be adjusted by the progress of emigration. Could any man seriously suppose that an agitating topic which had disturbed Congress until they were so tired of it that they must brush it off and get rid of it, would be quietly and peaceably settled by the people of the Territory? Could it be reasonably supposed that if that subject was to be left to those who should emigrate to that Territory, emigration would not be prompted by this very motive? It was a stimulus to emigration. It was saying to all the people of the East who were fond of the institutions of freedom and regard the institution of slavery as a great evil, "it is for you now to go there; here is an open, fair field for you; make your exertions; prosecute your emigration; exercise your legal powers; make the Territory, as a reward for all your exertions, a free Territory and a free State legally." At the same time it said to all those who regard the institution of slavery as a divine blessing, "go ye there, and prosecute your exertions; push forward your enterprise; stimulate your emigration; and as the reward of your exertions, lawfully put forth there, sanctify it if you can to the holy cause of slavery." That was the invitation given forth to the world, and after that invitation is given can any man fairly find fault because the people did go in accordance with it? Can he find fault that people associated themselves together, rendered aid and assistance to each other, material aid and comfort, in prosecuting that enterprise? It has been done in every quarter of the country—the North and the South. It was to be expected; it was invited.

What might a man further have calculated? It seems to me it required no very great length of foresight for a man to have calculated with certainty what would have been the result. Where lie the elements of emigration? Who have inducements to emigrate? What are their purposes? What is their character? What sentiments actuate them? The people of the South, especially those who are owners of slaves, are people of property, men who own land. The South, with six millions of white people, has not more than one person to every eight or ten square miles. They have no occasion to emigrate; they have not the elements of emigration; they have land enough where they are, unless, indeed, their system is of such a kind that they have to keep culling over new land all the time, because they have exhausted the old; but even for that purpose, they have enough for hundreds of years. No, sir; the material of emigration lies east.

I cannot but say, at times, that if we look at the subject of African slavery on a broad and liberal scale, and with reference to great periods in the progress of the world, it is after all a very small subject, a very little affair. I think from the foot-prints they have left behind, it is obvious that the family of man makes around this earth great cycles of revolution. They follow the setting sun. The human family are prompted by reasons which they cannot control and which they hardly understand. Their progress is from the East westward. At the present moment the great exodus of Europe which is throwing its avalanche on this continent, joined with the emigrants from the northern and eastern portions of this country, go to swell the great tide of emigration. The family of man is led out to possess its great patrimony. It is going around the earth; and the little, accidental colonization of a few Africans here, compared with this, is nothing but small edges along the margin of the great stream. It is a small matter in the long run; but it seems to be enough to agitate our day and our time, though I can hardly consider it worthy of the great attention and deep regard of philosophic statesmen.

But, sir, as I was saying, the emigration thus passing from east to west, the great current of the family of man going out in each cycle of revolution which it makes, partakes of the degree of civilization which in that period exists. The family of man now coming to this continent, and going out from our eastern and northern States, is deeply impressed with the love of individual independence, the love of freedom; the idea, too, that man, as a laboring being, having his destiny in his own hands, shall have his labor guided by the light of his own intellect; that we need no such formations of society as to require a hierarchy in the Church, or a lordship and aristocracy in the State; that labor and intellect shall be together; the laborer shall work by the light of his own intellect, guide his own destinies, participate in all the actions of his Government by his vote, and then he will appreciate the majesty of that system of which he is a member. Such people can never look upon the subject of slavery but with regret at least, and generally with displeasure. That is the kind of material that furnishes the emigration in this continent. It is of such elements that it is composed, and it is by such principles that it is actuated. Could any man, knowing this, when Kansas was open and the world invited to possess it and to mold its destinies, doubt what those destinies would be? Nothing could prevent it being free, if it was left to the ordinary course and operation of the laws that govern emigration. It could hardly have been imagined that those people living right along the border were going to possess the whole of it. That would be to suppose that it must suffer violence, and violent men must take it by force, because they were nearest to it. That would have been a violation of the promised principle and of the plighted faith which the words of the act contained, that the people of the Territory should be left free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way.

Mr. President, much has been said in relation to the motives and improper purposes with which some people went to Kansas. There can be no reasonable doubt that a very large portion of the emigrants who went there, among other purposes, to push their fortunes as emigrants, were invited there, many of them by this very assurance which the act of Congress contained. They went there not unlawfully, not with a view to make it a free State unlawfully, or by any force or violence; but because they understood they had a right to make it free lawfully; and that is the very reason they went there. I am of course aware that, when you enter upon an enterprise of this kind, many disturbing geninses, men who are fond of trouble and commotion, and who might naturally have anticipated there would be much of it there, may have been invited there on both sides—men of violence. There was indeed a great deal of truth contained in the remark of the man who was journeying through Arkansas, before we acquired Texas, with his family and cart. He was asked, "Where are you going?" "To Texas." "What for?" "To settle on land." "Well," said the Arkansas man, "there is land enough here; it is all around you; you can have as much of it as you want." That was rather a poser. Various views were started, until the man, finding himself much cornered, at last came to the point: "I am going," said he, "where I can fight for my rights." [Laughter.] There are some men who can never value rights they cannot fight for. To have them peaceably and lawfully is in no way satisfactory. Some such men, I have no doubt, have gone to Kansas; they have gone to fight for their rights. But that this sentiment pervaded any considerable portion of that community, is utterly without foundation.

Again, it is suggested that some of these people went from Massachusetts and other States, to do voting on a particular occasion, and go away. Where is the evidence of that? I know it is said, in the report of the committee here, that a man who was a candidate for Delegate to Congress, when he found that he lost his election, went away. I think they are apt to do that all over the country, particularly where a man is so badly beaten that there is no chance for him at all, he is likely to go and try his luck somewhere else. The people went there to make that a free Territory and a free State; and nothing would answer that purpose but to go there and vote, and to stay there to vote. There can be no foundation for the suggestion that they went there simply to vote, and then come away. It is utterly inconsistent with their purposes.

Such, sir, was the plighted faith of this country contained in the Kansas act. The next point we have to inquire into is, how far has that been carried out; how far has that plighted faith been redeemed; how far have that people been left free to form and mold their institutions in their own way? Why, Mr. President, we come now to a point which has been made a great point of issue from the beginning to the end of the controversy since the passage of this act. The formation of a Territory by Congress, is really nothing more nor less than passing an act of incorporation for a city, or borough, or town. A territorial government is nothing more nor less than a mere municipal corporation created by Congress. Congress are sovereign, I take it, in all territory beyond the limits of any particular State. They have jurisdiction of it; they are sovereign in it. I do not agree to a suggestion made in the report of the Committee on Territories two years ago, that Congress have a sovereignty over the Territories in abeyance. A sovereignty in abeyance is a paradox; it is no sovereignty at all; it is a sovereignty with no power. Even in the Dred Scott case the Supreme Court came to this conclusion: they say nothing about the country which fell within the old ordinance of 1787; but in the newly acquired territory they say Congress have plenary power for its government and are entirely sovereign over it within the limitations of the Constitution; they cannot, of course, violate any of the prohibitions of the Constitution; they cannot establish trial without jury, and so on.

When we held the whole of the Louisiana purchase, from the sources of the Mississippi down to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the banks of the river Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains, was this Government under obligations to create a territorial government in any particular part of it? We were under no obligation to make a Territory at all. What I mean by Territory now is the technical sense of Territory—a municipal corporation incorporated by law for the purpose of internal government. Congress had a perfect right to legislate for that whole country, keep it altogether as a body, make such laws as were necessary for it without calling in the instrumentalities of second means, and delegating power to them for this purpose. How, then, can people talk so much about the right of the people of a Territory to make a State? You might as well say that the people of a county in Virginia can make themselves into a State. They are organized for certain municipal purposes. This territorial incorporation is only for internal government and municipal purposes. Being a Territory is not an incipient stage to being a State; it vests no such power in them. It is only for present convenience, and for the administration of justice, and the preservation of peace in the easiest way. When this act of incorporation for Kansas was passed, and the terms and conditions were stated in it, and especially on this topic of which I have spoken, how was it organized? How did it go into effect? Laws, good laws, no matter how good they are, furnish no security to men, nor to the rights of men. It is only in the execution of the laws that that security can rightly be found.

How did they organize that corporation? Suppose an act of incorporation for a bank, a railway, a toll-bridge, a turnpike, is granted by any State to Messrs. A, B, C, D, and their associates, and it is provided that they may organize themselves at such a time and place, the first meeting to be called by the Secretary of State; and suppose that when the Secretary of State issues his notice for the meeting of the members of that corporation for the purpose of organization, instead of the Messrs. A, B, C, and D, mentioned in the charter, there should come Messrs. E, F, G, and H, and, impersonating them, take possession of the meeting and make themselves the corporation: that would be an attempt at organization under the act; but would it not be an entire usurpation? Would it be that corporation which the State created? Clearly it would not.

That was the case here in the very first meeting of the people to make an election of a Legislature for the Territory of Kansas. As authorized in the act, the Governor issued his proclamation to the people. He shaped out their districts; took a census of them; he called on them to make their election; and he appointed judges to preside over them and make returns to him—all according to the act. What then? We allege, and have always alleged, and have proved, that on that very occasion, with the then comparatively thin people, with only about two thousand voters, between four and five thousand people of Missouri went on the day before, encamping out on the previous night, and spread themselves, armed, over all that Territory, took possession of every voting precinct in it but one, drove the people from the polls, and made the organization. It was an utter, absolute, entire usurpation and military conquest, and the Territory never was organized according to the provisions of the act of Congress.

Now, sir, what sort of excuses have been made for this? How is it attempted to be got rid of? The actual residents of the Territory have, over and over again, insisted on having this wrong redressed or corrected in some form; but what have been the answers? President Pierce, in his message to Congress, said he could not correct it, because the Executive had no power to correct the laws made by the Legislature under the forms of law. I do not say that he could. Some have said that the courts could correct it. Sir, whatever is law for the Executive to carry into effect, is law for a court to administer. They cannot go behind the regular authentication. But when the President seemed to concede that there had been violence there, and said he had no power to correct it, why on earth did he not tell Congress to inquire into it and correct it? There can be but one answer—because he was gratified to take the possession and keeping of the stolen goods. The House of Representatives, however, did investigate it, and their committee examined under oath the very persons who carried on this invasion. The results of that examination are before the world, matters of history and certainty.

What did the Senate do? Did it pass the bill which the other House passed for a reorganization of the Territory? Nothing of the kind. It was said here that the invasion only extended to the few districts where the people entered protests to the Governor. The people had been driven off, scattered, and intimidated by force and arms; and, sparse as the population was in the largest part of the Territory, they gave it up; that is to say, they did not know how to take proceedings to correct it. In some portions they did, and in three or four districts they filed protests with Governor Reeder against these violent proceedings; but did they get redress? Not at all. Governor Reeder, to be sure, set them aside and ordered new elections; but the moment the Legislature which had been elected by means of this invasion came together, they set aside all the proceedings of his, and ratified the original invasion. Now it is said, that, inasmuch as all of them did not protest, and the Legislature passed upon that point, every defect is cured, and we are stopped from making complaint.

Here I cannot avoid noticing another thing. When the present President talks of anything of that kind, he says that the territorial government, which we say was never legally inducted there, has been recognized by the different departments of this Government, and it cannot be corrected or looked into. The same point is now insisted upon by the majority report in this case. That, to my mind, is a very extraordinary answer. What do you mean? "We cannot correct it and will not correct it." Why? "Because we never would. We will not now, because we told you we would not before." That is the very ground of complaint. It is nothing but one continued, protracted outrage, never examined into, never corrected by this body.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, it is known probably to the Senate that my colleague very recently has been suffering under somewhat severe indisposition, and that he has not yet even entirely recovered his ordinary degree of strength. He has been, in a measure, exhausted by his efforts thus far. He has not concluded the remarks that he desires to submit to the Senate. In the present condition of my colleague, therefore, in order to give him the rest which will be afforded by the time between now and our meeting to-morrow, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will withdraw that, I will move for an executive session.

Mr. FOOT. At the suggestion of Senators, I withdraw my motion, in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. B. N. BROWN.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following gentlemen as the select committee to whom was referred the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] in reference to Mr. MATTESON:

Messrs. SEWARD, HARRIS of Illinois, GROW, CURTIS, and BISHOP.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Do I understand that I have been placed upon the select committee on the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been placed upon the committee to which his own resolution was referred on motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to be excused from serving upon that committee.

The question was taken; and Mr. HARRIS was excused.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had this day approved and signed a bill for the relief of Whitmarsh B. Seabrook and others.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed an act (S. No. 170) to grant "Rome Arsenal" to the State of New York, on certain conditions; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MARTIAL LAW IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, relative to the proclamation of martial law over the counties of Pierce and Thurston, by Isaac I. Stevens, late Governor of the Territory of Washington; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF KANSAS LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER stated the question first in order to be a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following resolution, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN:]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House whether any money has been paid out of the Treasury of the United States, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, for the expenses of any Legislature, or alleged Legislative Assembly, of the Territory of Kansas; and if so, under what act or provision of law, and from what fund, said money has been paid.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. This is a mere resolution of inquiry, and should be adopted. I trust that whoever made the objection will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect who made the objection.

The question was taken, and the rules were suspended.

The question recurred on the resolution; and it was adopted.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back, without amendment, a bill fixing the number and compensation of clerks, messengers, pages, and laborers, of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RUSSELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. The committee has leave to report at any time.

Mr. MASON. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House with a statement of the reasons why the bill should pass just as it is. I will remark, however, that in 1842, some seventeen years ago, the same subject was examined by a committee of this House, which was then a Whig House. That select committee was raised for the purpose of investigating the extravagances of the former Democratic House. They reported at great length, and offered resolutions reducing the force. There had been previously twelve messengers employed by the Doorkeeper, at the rate of two and a half dollars per day. The committee considered that number too large, and reduced it to ten. There had been twelve pages previously employed. The Whig committee reported in favor of the dismissal of four of them, and directed that eight should be the number employed thereafter. The committee also regulated the list of clerks. In 1804 there were but one chief clerk and two assistants. In 1842 the number of assistants had largely increased. But the committee reduced the number to eight, and fixed the salary at $1,500 per annum. The number of these officers has largely increased since then. The Doorkeeper does not know how many messengers are employed under him. No member of the committee could find out. There are so many of them that the Doorkeeper was ashamed to present a regular list of them for the first six weeks after the session. There were twenty-eight in the folding-room, appointed in the place of five, drawing pay with nothing to do; and, as a gentleman remarked, only half doing that. The number of appointments authorized by law were made, and to others certificates were given that they had been appointed.

When the committee commenced to investigate this subject, we found everything in confusion. There was a joint resolution passed by both Houses some years ago, placing the officers of both Houses on the same footing as regards salary. By another act, the salaries of officers were increased twenty per cent. Some are paid one way, and some another; until it has become absolutely necessary to reorganize the whole thing. We want to have the matter fixed so definitely that the Clerk may know the number and pay of his assistants, and that the Doorkeeper and Postmaster may know the number and pay of theirs. It may be that the committee have come to a conclusion that the House may not agree to, in regard to the salaries to be paid and the number to be employed. But they certainly, if they know anything about it, or will listen to those who do know anything about it, must be aware of the fact that it is absolutely necessary to have a general act upon the subject, so that the officers who may be hereafter elected may know the number of their appointees and their salaries.

Now, sir, owing to the increased labor incident to removing from the old Hall to the new, the committee appointed specially to consider the subject have more than doubled the number of doorkeepers. Instead of twelve, which the committee of that Whig Congress thought were too many, and reduced to ten, this special committee have seen fit to increase to twenty-five. The Committee of Accounts, after a thorough examination of the duties to be performed, although many will think it too large, have concluded to recommend that number. We had some difficulty in fixing the prices which these messengers and doorkeepers are to have. That is a subject which gentlemen may differ about. Some of the members of the Committee of Accounts hesitated in putting these prices into operation during the present session of Congress. One member of the committee proposed—and if he is not present I will offer it for him—to offer a proviso to the bill, that it shall not take effect until the next session of Congress. As to the time when the bill shall go into operation, we are not particular. That the whole system needs reorganizing, no one doubts.

As to the prices which these employes should be paid, it is with me a matter of principle. It is a matter of principle, I presume, with other members. The question is, whether you will put their salaries at prices sufficient to command the services of good and reliable men, or whether you will put them at prices much higher than that, which shall have the effect of patronage. If you put them at too high prices, you will have hundreds of men coming here from a distance of five hundred or a thousand miles, and demanding of their members in the House that these positions shall be secured to them, not for the services they are to render, but for political services which they have already rendered. It is for this reason that these officers obtain their positions, and not for the labors they are to perform, or the duties they are to discharge.

Mr. BLISS. In relation to this point upon which the gentleman is speaking, I desire to ask him to state to the House the prices that these clerks and other officers have heretofore received, and the changes which it is proposed to make by this bill. Some of us here do not understand it.

Mr. MASON. The Clerk which the House elects receives, under this bill, just what he did before—$3,600 a year. The first and second clerks receive just what they did under the law of 1854—$2,160 each; and it gives to five other clerks just what they have been receiving—$1,800 each. We then give them three miscellaneous clerks, at $1,400 each, per annum; and we give them four copying clerks, at $1,200 each.

Now, the question is, whether these are salaries which will command the services of fair, competent men, who will discharge the duties attaching to the respective offices? If they are, then is it necessary to raise them any higher; and if so, for what purpose?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to know whether these three $1,400 clerks, and the four $1,200 clerks, are an increased force; and, if not, whether the salary is increased? Have we these officers now, or does this bill create them?

Mr. MASON. I will explain. Some years ago, in the Clerk's office, there used to be a few clerks, and a good many messengers, at $2 50 per day. Some of these messengers performed clerical duties. In the course of time, this latter class grew into clerks, with salaries at different prices. Now, sir, we have provided for a number of officers, sufficient to perform the duties to be performed, at salaries quite sufficient to command the services of fair, honest, and competent men—men who would be glad to obtain the positions in order to obtain a living. Now, sir, the clerical force which we have provided is ample to carry on the business of the clerk's office. No man who has any knowledge of the subject will deny it. It may be well enough to postpone the time when the bill shall take effect until the next session of Congress. It may be necessary at the close of the session for the Clerk of the House to obtain some additional clerical services, for the purpose of completing the index, and in bringing up the business of the session; and it may be well enough for a few days' labor to be authorized at the close of the session.

I see that my friend over the way has off red an amendment to increase the salaries of the first and second clerks to $2,500 per annum. Now, sir, it has been urged that salaries should be raised in particular instances for the purpose of continuing the services of particular officers who have been found to be competent. Now, sir, the effect of raising these salaries is to turn these men out of their offices. Their superior officers will turn them out, and put men in their places who come here and demand the places as perquisites for political services, and who will be found not to be qualified to discharge the duties attaching to the offices. Then it will become necessary for them to employ the old clerks to do the work at half the salary.

I say to gentlemen: If you have friends here or at home, who need money or want help, in the name of God, give it to them; but do not interfere with the regular duties of the House. I ask the House to let us put the matter in such a shape that the business of the House will be done.

I recollect, some years ago, there was a little messenger at $2 50 per day in the library. He had an almanac memory, and could remember where every book was. He was very useful in his place; and members having some feeling for him, raised his salary to $1,500, and the next time a Clerk of the House was elected, this man was turned out of his $1,500 place, and another man was put there who could not remember the name of a book, and the place has been a sinecure from that day to this. I venture to say that I never saw the Librarian of the House of Representatives, although I have had occasion frequently to refer to acts of Congress, and resolutions, and orders of the House; nor do I know that I could tell the clerk of the Librarian. The Librarian's place is a sinecure; you might as well give him $1,800 a year for doing nothing. And, sir, this affords irrefragable evidence of what takes place in these positions when the salaries are increased beyond the sum necessary to secure the service of useful men. The successor of the Clerk during whose term the increase was made, finding places commanding a salary of $1,400 or $1,800 a year, appoints those who are prominent political friends, above the discharge of the duties of their offices. I will relate an anecdote which was told me: A gentleman from Maine came to Washington, and while in the city visited a citizen of his own State, who was in one of the Departments holding a clerkship. He inquired how his friend was getting along? "Badly," was the reply, "for by the time I have paid for board and the services of the tailor, washerwoman, &c., and then thirty dollars the month for a fellow to do my work, I have not enough left out of the salary of $100 a month to take a buggy ride." [Laughter.] He could stand every charge except that of the thirty dollars a month for "a fellow to do his work."

Put the salaries of the subordinate places up to a higher figure, and they will attract office hunters from all sections of the country; and those who are appointed will get fellows to discharge their duties, and will, in the end, probably get the House to pay for these substitutes besides. Take an instance: A resolution was passed authorizing the Postmaster of this House to employ four persons as mail messengers, at a salary of $2 50 a day. This price at the time was deemed amply sufficient. These men learned the avenues and streets of Georgetown and Washington, and promptly and accurately discharged their duties. Members got their mails as soon as possible after their arrival in the city. The salaries of these mail-messengers were raised to $1,440 a year each. Immediately, applicants for these places were attracted from various sections of the Union, and men obtained them who knew nothing of the city, its avenues, or its streets. They got above handling documents and the mails of the House, and five mail boys were voted to them. Instead of paying these little fellows who discharge their duties, they are saved the expense, by having them paid by the House, out of the contingent fund. You might as well pay these men for doing nothing. If you want such officers to discharge nominal duties, why not station them in the old Hall. Let them be compelled to attend there in a body, and listen to the essays on every imaginable subject which, hour after hour and day after day consume the time of this House. [Laughter.] Their places would then no longer be sinecures, for if they were bored with the lectures on slavery, Abolitionism, Mormonism, and like subjects, as we are almost daily, few would deny that they earned their money. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the committee have labored diligently at the investigation which was confided to them. Their conclusion is that the employés of this House should be fixed in number, and paid according to the service rendered. We do not object to a fair and liberal compensation to those who perform the duties of the offices; but we do object to that extravagant increase of salaries that attracts applicants here by hundreds and thousands at each session of Congress. So numerous have these applicants grown at this day that members are unable to remain at their rooms without incessant annoyance by these parties. The members of the other side had their share of this annoyance at the last session. And, sir, why should not these places be reduced to the service required with a fair salary attached to them? Why not get rid of this annoying patronage which is of so much annoyance to us all?

The Doorkeeper of this House gives it as a reason why the best pages are not employed in the House, that he has to take those which are forced upon him by members. He cannot say whether they are smart and active and capable. Some come here from other cities, who know nothing of Washington. They do not know that it is their business to go to member's houses and to the committee rooms; and most of them who are here could not, if sent on a message, probably find their way to either. It is not their fault. I am not against the boys. They are fine, sprightly, little fellows. They have not yet been taught what they ought to do. Some of them, brought from other cities, probably never will learn, before their successors are appointed, what they ought to know.

Those members of the committee who were charged with the investigation of this matter, concluded that they would authorize the employment of twenty pages—double the number that I supposed would be necessary; for, according to my experience, when you get one boy you have a boy; when you get two, you have half a boy; and when you get three boys, you have no boy at all, for they go to playing. [Laughter.] I have no objection, however, to increasing the number of pages at two dollars a day. But the messengers are to have, by this bill, three dollars a day. There are now fourteen of them, permanently employed, at ninety dollars per month, all the year round; and you can get plenty of men, during the session of Congress, to perform these duties temporarily at three dollars a day.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Accounts, in reporting this bill, sought to accommodate the House, to some extent, in the desire which has been evinced here for economy. The House passed a resolution in favor of economy, some time since, almost unanimously, showing that members were nearly all in favor of being set down on the yeas and nays as in favor of economy. We want now to give them a fair chance of carrying their theoretical notions into practical effect. I know that the kindness of many gentlemen here—I mean what they call kindness—towards these employés, will induce some of them, for the present, at least, not to carry those theoretical notions into effect. I have some friends here myself, and I wish them all possible success, and a large share of the goods of this world; but the House required us to put this matter on a proper footing, and we have tried to do it, regardless whether it affects one employé or another. You will find plenty of men who will be willing to perform the duties of messengers for three dollars a day, or for ninety dollars a month.

Now, there are some gentlemen who will probably oppose this bill, who are not willing to give the poor old soldier, who is tottering to the grave, thirty cents a day to keep him out of the poor-house. You pay each of these messengers here three dollars a day, which would provide for ten of those poor old soldiers who have done good service heretofore in defense of the country; and yet you will not give these poor old soldiers enough to keep them out of the poor-house!

Now, sir, there are other matters of reformation needed, not only about this House, but in other departments of the Government. The Committee of Accounts have taken on themselves to discharge what they conceive to be their duty in their department. I hope the Military Committee, and the Naval Committee, and the Committee on Expenditures, and all the other committees will set their departments to rights. If they will do that, I will say, with all due deference to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, there will be plenty of money to spare to pay all the poor old soldiers of the country. Let us do these officers justice, and give them fair pay and compensation for all the duties they have to perform; that is all we propose; and there is no probability that there will be a stampede of the officers of this House, if this bill should go into operation to-morrow. But, as I remarked before, if gentlemen think this unfair, and that the bill should not go into operation until the commencement of next session, I have no objection. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPINNER,] who is a member of the committee, proposes to offer an amendment to that effect, and I have no objection to it, although I do not conceive that any of these officers have any vested rights in their salaries. They are subject to be turned out at any hour by their superiors. In the judgment of the majority of the committee, these changes ought to go into operation at once; but it is for the House to say whether they shall do so or not. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage.

Mr. SPINNER. I move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

And be it further enacted, That the reduction in the compensation of any of the employés mentioned in this act shall commence on the 1st day of December next; and that all the remaining provisions shall take effect at the end of the month in which this act shall become a law.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I move to lay that amendment upon the table.

Mr. SPINNER. What would be the effect of that motion?

The SPEAKER. It would carry the bill with it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPINNER. Although I agree in the general provisions of the bill as reported by the committee, still I gave notice to the committee that I should offer the amendment which I have sent up. I think it due in fairness to those employes who have come here, some of them from a great distance, that they should not be cut off instantly. I think they should be allowed to complete their terms of office, and then let the provisions of this bill go into operation.
